In Philadelphia, in the fourth ward, in the district represented now by the honorable Speaker of this House, at an election held upon the 10th of October, 1871, not a year when we elected members of Congress, Professor Octavius Cato, an educated colored man, going to the polls was set upon by repeaters and ruffians and murdered in cold blood. Other negroes on that occasion were followed by violence; confusion and disorder ran riot. Citizens, republicans and democrats, good citizens who desired peace at the polls, went to the United States marshal, then General Gregory, and asked him to bring there United States troops to keep the peace. It was done; and United States marines, under the command of a Colonel Forney, went to the polls and secured the peace, and a free, peaceful election was had on that day thereafter. Had the words "or to keep the peace at the polls" been stricken from this statute of 1865, as you now propose, in 1871 the call on the United States marshal to restore order and peace on that election day would have been in vain. It would have been a high criminal offense for him to have interfered with armed men to drive the rounder and the ruffian from the polls.

I could multiply instances in the history of the country where peace at an election could not be secured except by the advent of armed men to overawe the ruffian.

CONSTITUTIONALITY.

But, sir, much has been said about the unconstitutionality of this enactment. Why, sir, if it is unconstitutional, it is innocent. The question of its constitutionality can be tested before the Supreme Court of the country, and if it be unconstitutional, the decision of that tribunal will pronounce it void. But, sir, how is it unconstitutional? The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] and other lawyers upon the other side have sought to disturb us with the idea that men do not vote in the States by reason of any United States statute or by reason of the Constitution of the United States. I am not vexed upon that point. We understand that there would be no power under the Constitution of the United States to make any citizen of the State a voter when the State has designated the persons entitled to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. Such persons are also voters for members of Congress and President. We have the right to pass an act declaring that no State shall make any discrimination in respect to the right of suffrage by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. We have the right to provide for the punishment of any such discriminaton in State legislation or in the administration of State election laws. As a loyal citizen of the country and as a lawyer, I yield assent to the utterances of the Supreme Court in the case of Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wallace, 178, that the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one; that the United States have no voters of their own creation in the States.

So in United States vs. Reese, (2 Otto, 214,) the right to vote in the States comes from the States; but the National Constitution says, there shall be no discrimination by any State law among any citizens on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. It is by the fifteenth amendment made the duty of Congress to enforce this provision against discrimination by appropriate legislation. The question of who are the voters does not appropriately arise in this debate.

FREE ELECTIONS.

It is a question, however, of preserving elections free and peaceful to some extent. Congress can say when, where, and how members of Congress shall be elected. It can provide they shall all be elected on one day in the different States as it practically has done. It can provide the places and the manner. This latter would involve a provision for the necessary officers. This latter is not done, although it could constitutionally be done. Since, then, these provisions could be made, it is quite proper for Congress to see that the elections for United States officers shall be peaceful as well as free and pure. But, sir, the proposed legislation does not necessarily involve these considerations. This is a penal statute. A statute which makes it a high crime for an officer of the United States to have any armed men at an election whether called there by proper authority or not. The only exemption from the penalties of this statute is in case such armed men are called there "to repel enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls." You will now strike out "or to keep the peace at the polls," thus multiplying the prohibitions of the original statute. Should this pass, a riot, never so severe, may be flagrant in New York, Philadelphia, New Orleans, Charleston, or Mobile; the inoffensive citizen may be shot down; the colored man may be stoned and driven by a yelling mob from the polls in sight of a United States official or garrison; but the officer may not bring his command to the scene of violence to say "peace, be still," without incurring the severe penalties of this law as you propose to make it. On the appropriation bill of June last you provided in what is popularly known as the posse comitatus clause:

It shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus or otherwise for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said troops may be expressly authorized by the Constitution and the laws.

In view of this enactment, which has been somewhat complained of, not in a mere partisan spirit, by the Secretary of War in his last report, if you now pass the measure before us it will be impossible, without danger of conflict, for the Federal authority to send any troops to the polls to preserve peace at any election, even if a call should be made by the governor or Legislature of the State. I might pause and refer to possible annoyances, inconveniences, conflicts, and disorders which may result from this. We are familiar with the fact that the governor of West Virginia and the governor of Maryland, by reason of their inability to enforce the law, have within two years called upon the executive arm of the nation for aid. The trouble in that case was a riot incident to the labor confusions of the country; and in view of social conflicts and annoyances which have and may be repeated this enactment is unjust to the peace of the country. If you pass this measure it is a serious question whether the executive arm of the Federal Government could respond by sending troops during an election even to keep the peace, as there would then be no statute directly authorizing the employment of troops for that purpose. The posse comitatus clause would positively prohibit it.

But, sir, I will not pause to repeat the many contingencies when the repose of society, the security of the citizen, the peace and purity of elections in the Republic may require, with the assent of all good citizens, the moral presence, at least, of soldiers or some armed men under proper officers, United States officers being possibly the most convenient. Pass your measure. Such relief will be criminal. It is no argument to say such contingencies are not probable. Says Blackstone:

No practical systems of law are so perfect as to point out beforehand those eccentric remedies which national emergency will dictate and justify.

PARTISAN LEGISLATION.

But, Mr. Chairman, a good deal has been said about the partisan character of the legislation which it is here proposed to repeal. We on this side have listened to lectures from the other side of the Chamber ad nauseam. Much fault has been found with the republican party for its long exercise of power. The allegation has been made that our party has been running the Government for sixteen years in the interest of plunder, usurpation, and despotism. Sir, once for all we deny such assertions. Some mistakes may have been made by men in power in grappling with new and untried questions. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] undertook to rebuke this side of the Chamber for attempting to lecture the South. Sir, how long are we to remain silent under such lashings? I profess to be one of the most liberal men upon this side of the Chamber toward gentlemen from the South; I also am one of the frankest on this side toward those gentlemen.

I can multiply instances of the hauteur of the new power in this Chamber. I have before me some remarks made, near the close of last session, by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] who was so frank as to declare a short time ago here in the American Congress that his first allegiance was due to his State, his second to the country. He has been consistent. Being in the old Congress before the war, he left it, went to his State to help take her out of the Union, went into the rebel congress, and has now been here for some six years again. He took occasion to lecture us on this side of the Chamber, and I desire to read something that he then said, so that if he did not mean it he may set himself right. In talking about the sufferings of the South from the war, he said, (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, third session, Forty-fifth Congress, page 895:)

Its disastrous effects were felt everywhere. As to the losses of men in the respective sections I have but a word to say. While the North by hiring substitutes and giving bounties to enlisted men was incurring a large proportion of the debt we are now endeavoring to pay off, there was scarcely a household in all the South which was not draped in mourning for the loss of father, husband, brother, or son.

The fighting we did was at the cost of the best blood of the South, while you were enabled by reason of having control of the Treasury of the United States to give bounty money to foreigners who fought your battles. I reiterate the statement that I am not complaining; I am uttering no reproach; but only declaring what yourselves know to be true.

BEST BLOOD OF THE NORTH.

Mr. Chairman, with all the courtesy of debate, I deny the utterance. I know it to be untrue that the hired foreign mercenary fought our battles. The soldiers of the Union were gentlemen. They left their happy homes in the North for mortal conflict with defiant treason. A faith second only to faith in the Cross inspired the northern soldier to the duties of the camp and the battle. Youth and age, wealth and poverty, vied with each other for patriotic duty; the loving father, the fond mother, the devoted wife, gave their loved ones with heroic fortitude to the fray. The best blood of the North was shed and to-day enriches southern soil. Many a northern household still grieves because some darling came not back to the home circle but fell by the way in the "on to Richmond" or "from Atlanta to the sea." Sir, it was Americans fighting Americans. You found foemen worthy of your steel. It is but just I should resent any aspersion cast upon the soldiers of the Republic who carried our cause to triumph and made it possible for the members from the insurrectionary States to be here in their seats. I trust the gentleman from Mississippi will correct this utterance if he did not mean it.

Now, sir, yesterday the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] his colleague, [Mr. MULDROW,] and others directly charged the republican party with usurpation, despotism, plunder, and infidelity to the best interests of good government and kindred offenses for the past sixteen years. Are we to take all this? Must we be reviled and held up to public scandal and criticism, and no reply? In return for this harshness, must we spoon-feed these gentlemen? At the risk of being rash, I now and here rebuke such utterances. Quousque tandem abutere, Catilina, patientia nostra?

You speak of our young yet proud republican organization during the past sixteen years. I will not pause to utter mere political boast about its birth and achievements. The policy of this party has been the history of the country for the past eighteen years. Shall I remind you what it has done? It saved the nation. Do you gentlemen of the South regret this? It emancipated and enfranchised a race. Do you regret that? It directed your attention to educating your poor and dependent. Do you regret this? It has developed a liberal spirit of internal improvement that has made it possible for gentlemen of the South to be here to glorify "the old flag and go for big appropriations." I favor being reasonably liberal to you and your region in this respect, for that is the way to build up your country.

JEFF DAVIS.

I hold in my hand utterances of Jefferson Davis in a recent interview said to have been had with him. Possibly he is paving the way for a return to power. Be that as it may, he is reported to have expressed himself in this way. I read from the New York Herald of the 30th, purporting to publish an interview:

He conceded expressly that the abolition of slavery would prove an ultimate good to the country; that it was a manifest advantage to the white race, for it would lead to the development of the South and multiply her manufacturing and mechanical industries. From advantages of climate alone the future of the South was more promising than that of any other section of the country; but the condition of the present generation of the blacks, &c.

He acknowledged, however, that he had changed his mind entirely upon one question, namely, that the great staples of the South—cotton and sugar—could be produced with greater economy and in greater abundance by paid labor than by the labor of slaves. He remarked that the only disturbing elements to be discerned now were the efforts of extremists upon both sides to keep alive animosities and hatreds of the past.

This may not have been so intended, but he interprets the English language falsely who must not take this as a tribute to the progressive tendencies and the patriotic accomplishments of the republican party.

The concessions Mr. Davis makes have been the results of republican policy, of republican pluck, of republican enterprise. Gentlemen of the South, your whole social system has been changed, the debauching influences and enervating tendencies of slavery have been taken away from you; you have a new, or in the end, if proper counsels prevail, will have, a better and safer industrial system. I can see and feel this in the air. This has come from the sanitary influences of an enlightened republican policy. In view of these considerations, why should the Representatives from the South launch their thunderbolts of denunciation against the republican party of the country? Sir, I have no disguises here. It is said, let the past be buried. Let it be so. But you will not allow what we call the crimes of the South to be forgotten. You avow your purpose to wipe out all the enactments the war made necessary. The utterance of your threats awakens naturally the bitterest indignation of the northern people. While the northern sentiment upon many questions may be different as the billows, on this one question it is one as the sea. Sir, I am not one of those who believe rebellion was honorable. I consider it was infamously wicked. The Government, in again accepting in high places of authority the conspicuous characters of rebellion, has been generous beyond all precedent in history, ancient or modern. In my denunciations of rebellion I am not so unparliamentary as to speak personally of any individual. I speak of rebellion and treason as crimes still known to the jurisprudence of the country. I speak in a general sense. I find enacted under the administration of George Washington a statute which provides that "every person owing allegiance to the United States who levies war against them or adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, is guilty of treason." The men who levied war against the Government were subject to its penalties.

FIRST GUN OF REBELLION.

One of the gentlemen from Mississippi yesterday, in reply to a question from my friend before me, [Mr. PRICE,] who asked where the first gun was fired, to which doubtless the response was expected "at Fort Sumter," answered, "The first gun was fired by John Brown at Harper's Ferry." Now the gentleman from Mississippi did not recall, possibly, the historical fact that if John Brown actually did fire that gun, he was afterward arrested for having levied war against the sovereignty of Virginia, tried, and hung. If that was the first gun of the rebellion punishment to the criminal came swift and according to the law. We recognize, all liberal, judicious men recognize, that by reason of the magnitude of the conflict and the entirety of communities throughort great States involved in it, the technical penalties of the law could not be enforced. For reasons of great public policy, in our peculiar governmental system, constitutional amendments were enacted giving it into the power of the Representatives of the people to pardon men who had levied war against the Government; and in consequence of that we have the gentlemen of the other side, the more numerous branch of the democratic party upon this floor, as our equals, not as our superiors.

Somebody says, Are you afraid of another rebellion? Not a rebellion of arms—an armed effort of the South to destroy the Government. No, sir; our next trouble, and God forbid we should have any, will not come in that way. I have no fear that you gentlemen are again going to launch into the experiment of war. I think it was the Senator, George E. Badger, who, when making a speech before the people of North Carolina on the "fifty-four forty or fight" question, said, in sneering at the evils of war: "What is it? W-a-r—a very small word. It has only three letters." An Irishman in the audience promptly cried out, "Hell has only four."

The men who went into the rebellion, the men who controlled the fortunes of the insurrectionary States, discovered the enormity of war and will not again tread heedlessly the bloody road of armed resistance to law. They tell us their country was laid waste and they have felt the heavy sacrifices they have made. I do not doubt it, and they will not soon again launch into actual war. "What do you contend for, then?" say the other side. Is it a mere question of patronage? I trust not, sir, although there is much human nature about us in this respect. It is no easy matter to satisfactorily surrender all the patronage of this great Government to the representatives of the cause which recently struggled so hard to destroy it. I heard a few weeks ago two members of this House, southern members, too, tell a most illustrative incident in this behalf. They were coming to the Capitol in one of the street cars, in which were two crippled confederate soldiers, who are officers of this House, and two very badly wounded Union soldiers, both having lost legs, and out of employment. The Union soldiers got out where the Congressmen also got out. The Union soldiers immediately discoursed as follows, one saying to the other, "See here, did you see them two Johnnies going up in the car?" The reply was "Yes." "Well," said the first, "them fellows fought four years to destroy the Government; now they have good places under it, while we fought four years to save it, lost our legs, and are here on the street without proper support." There must be something wrong about this, they both agreed, as they shook their heads and walked away.

While such incidents may illustrate the logic of the situation in some respects, yet, sir, there are broader, more important considerations to the public man who would do his duty here, and before the people, in educating public sentiment. The great question is, Is it wise for the political organization whose policy carried and saved the nation through the fiery ordeal of battle to surrender all claim and efforts to administer its affairs? It is claimed by the gentlemen across the way that the Government is their birthright. By what divine right can this claim be sustained? Sir, the entire possession of the Government by those gentlemen would be dangerous to our political system.

I might pause and ask what gentleman of the opposition who was conspicuous in the war of rebellion, and those gentlemen from the South all were, has surrendered his heart's convictions of the right of peaceful secession? Which of them has surrendered his peculiar doctrines of State rights, which was the very foundation-stone of the confederacy? What portion of the southern people feel that the national credit is to them as the apple of their eye? What portion of the southern people do not feel the people of the North oppressed and despoiled them of their valuable estates and some of their most cherished rights? Considerations like these press upon us and suggest to an enlightened public sentiment of the country the wisdom of resisting to the utmost, by every legal and constitutional means, the repeal by the gentlemen across the way of those enactments the logic of events made necessary after the surrender at Appomattox. The effort now pending is the first attempt in this direction since the American Congress has passed entirely into the hands of the opposition, and I feel justified to resist it by every legitimate means.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (R. H. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. SPARKS. On consultation with a great many members of the House, it was thought best that we should have one night session before the close of the debate. I would therefore ask unanimous consent that a recess be taken to-morrow afternoon from half past four until half past seven.

Mr. BROWNE. I understand that by a resolution of the House it has been determined that the general debate shall close to-morrow.

Mr. SPARKS. No, the day after to-morrow.

Mr. BROWNE. Then I cheerfully assent to the proposition of the gentleman.

There being no further objection, the order was made.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HUMPHREY, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to L. L. Lancaster to withdraw from the files of the House his discharge, a bill having been passed for his relief the last session of Congress.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BAKER: Resolution of the Legislature of Indiana, asking that the national-banking law be so amended as to require national banks to sue in the State courts of the States in which they are located—to the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed.

Also, the petition of John Welch and other members of White Oak Grange, Kosciusko County, Indiana, for the passage of the Reagan interstate commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

Also, the petition of Alice Lynn, Emma A. Martin, Mattie E. Youson, and other women of Mechanicstown, Maryland, for legislation to make effective the anti-polygamy law—to the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed.

By Mr. VALENTINE: Memorial of the Legislature of Nebraska, urging the repeal by Congress of all laws which allow certain railroad corporations operating in said State to remove all suits between said corporations and citizens of said State from the State to the United States courts—to the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of Nebraska, relative to swamp and overflowed lands in said State and other States—to the Committee on Public Lands, when appointed.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of Nebraska, urging the settlement of the claim of said State to the 5 per cent. on sales of public lands sold therein—to the same committee, when appointed.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of Nebraska, asking such legislation as will forever prohibit the payment of southern war claims—to the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of Nebraska, urging the establishment of a camp and military post east of Fort Robinson on the Niobrara River, in said State, for the protection of the settlers of that section from invasions of hostile Indians—to the Committee on Indian Affairs, when appointed.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of Nebraska, urging the removal of the Santee Sioux Indians to the Ponca reservation, and for the restoration to their former condition as public lands of all other lands now occupied by them—to the same committee, when appointed.

By Mr. WELLS: Memorial of the Legislature of Missouri, asking for an appropriation for the immediate improvement of the Missouri River at Saint Charles, Glasgow, Cedar City, and Kansas City, Missouri—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

By Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee: The petition of William A. Carswell, M. D., of Memphis, Tennessee, for one month and twenty-five days' pay as assistant surgeon in the United States Army prior to the 25th of March, 1861—to the Committee of Claims, when appointed.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 3, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I should like to make a statement, so that the RECORD of yesterday may be corrected, if it is in order to have that done. When the vote was taken on the motion to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on the table, it escaped my memory at the time that I was paired on all political questions with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] who was then absent; and when my name was called I voted "yea." My vote made no difference any way in the result; but I desire now to retract my vote and to state that if the Senator from Kansas had been here he would have voted "nay" and I should have voted "yea." I make this statement in justice to myself and the Senator from Kansas.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WITHERS presented resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia, in favor of the speedy passage of measures by Congress looking to the prevention of the spread of diseases among cattle; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I present similar resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia and move that they be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Mrs. John Gillespie and other ladies, of the States of Kansas, Wisconsin, Nebraska, and Indiana, and the Territory of Wyoming, praying for the passage of a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, except for medicinal, mechanical, and scientific purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented the petition of W. H. Curtis and others, citizens of Guthrie County, Iowa, praying for the passage of a law granting a pension to Thomas Johnson, late private Company G, Twenty-seventh Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on account of injuries received during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Zenas Herrick, of Kenduskeag, Maine, praying that his pension be extended back to the time when his injuries were received; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of the passage of a law by Congress granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Missouri, instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives in Congress to procure, if possible, the enactment of a law or the submission of a constitutional amendment preventing the Federal courts from exercising or assuming jurisdiction in causes wherein any county or other subdivision of a State is or shall be a party; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 333) to grant homesteads to the Santee Indians residing upon their reservation in Knox County, State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 334) to authorize the Secretary of War to construct a bridge across the Potomac River at or near the Three Sisters Islands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 335) granting a pension to Simeon Crain; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KIRKWOOD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 336) granting a pension to Philip Braunstetter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 337) granting a pension to James H. Poland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 338) granting a pension to Dederick Blanck; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 339) granting a pension to A. W. Richards; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 340) granting a pension to Thomas J. Anthony; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 341) granting a pension to Peter Getert; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 342) granting a pension to Charles Reed; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 343) relating to printing impressions from portraits and vignettes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. TELLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 344) to provide for the disposal of public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. VOORHEES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 345) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint James Shields, of Missouri, a brigadier-general in the United States Army on the retired list; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALKER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 346) to carry into effect the tenth article of the treaty with the Pottawatomie Indians of February 27, 1867; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 347) for the relief of John B. Nix; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 348) to establish a National Board of Agriculture; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the name of Mr. KIRKWOOD, of Iowa, be placed upon the Committee on Pensions in the place of Mr. BRUCE, of Mississippi, who declines to serve.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be entered.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following orders, which were read:

Ordered, That the papers in the case of the claimants for damages arising from the collision of the United States sloop of war Vandalia with the Norwegian bark Atlantic (S. 1480, third session Forty-fifth Congress) be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of William Collins be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAMLIN. There have been no adverse reports in either case,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be entered in both cases.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Jacob D. Felthousen and the heirs of William H. Atkins be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Patents.

On motion of Mr. PENDLETON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of W. R. Fee, praying an extension of his patent, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HARRIS submitted the following order:

Ordered, That the memorial and papers in the matter of the claim of Callin Adams be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was there a favorable or an adverse report in that case?

Mr. HARRIS. There has been no report in the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be entered.

On motion of Mr. CARPENTER, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the application of Commodore William B. Whiting for a pension be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATOR FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further business of the morning hour, the Secretary will report the Calendar of resolutions and concurrent resolutions in their order.

Mr. HOAR. I think it was informally arranged yesterday that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] would call up the New Hampshire case to receive the attention of the Senate so far as to have the reports read; and I desire after the reading of the reports simply to address the Senate for about two minutes only. I shall be absent on Monday when the case would otherwise come up. If the Senator from Delaware sees fit to call it up for that purpose now, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will ask to have the case taken up now, if there is nothing before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is a privileged question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask first that the report of the committee be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate proceeds to the consideration of the New Hampshire case, and the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. SAULSBURY April 2:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Hon. Charles H. Bell, claiming a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, have had the same under consideration, and ask leave to make the following report:

The term of Bainbridge Wadleigh, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, expired by constitutional limitation on the 3d day of March, 1879, in a recess of the Legislature, and on the 13th day of March, 1879, Mr. Bell was appointed in his place by the executive.

By reason of a change in the constitution of that State, which took effect in October, 1878, two Legislatures were chosen in that year, one, under the old constitution, in March, whose term of office commenced in June, 1878, and will terminate in May, 1879; the other, under the new constitution, was chosen in November to serve for two years, the term commencing in June, 1879.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate in the Forty-fifth Congress, to whom was referred the question which of these two bodies had the right to choose a successor to Mr. Wadleigh, was of opinion, and so reported to the Senate, that under the act of 1866 (Revised Statutes, section 14) the last-named Legislature was entitled to elect, because it was the Legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term of service. In the opinion of the committee this report and the action of the Senate in adopting it are not important in the settlement of the question now presented.

The Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 3, provided as follows:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

"Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year; of the second class, at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class, at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

It has been noticed that this claimant bases his right to a seat in the Senate not upon the fact that a term filled by the Legislature of New Hampshire had become vacant during a recess of the Legislature, but upon the fact that the executive claims the right to make a temporary appointment at the beginning of a term which the Legislature has not undertaken to fill.

The committee cannot find in the Constitution any sufficient warrant for this claim. If we look at the provision authorizing the governor to make temporary appointments independently of its connection with the rest of the section, we think it is manifest that the authority is limited to filling vacancies which happen in a term which had been previously filled by the Legislature. If it was intended to vest in the executive the power to make temporary appointments to terms for which no person had been chosen by the Legislature, why should the words "happen by resignation or otherwise" have been added to the word "vacancies?" They certainly did not render it more comprehensive, and must have been designed to limit and restrict its meaning to vacancies occurring from accident or some unforeseen event. If any doubt, however, existed as to the meaning of the language referred to, when considered unconnected with the rest of the section, such doubts would be removed by construing the provisions of the section together. Applying to them the rules recognized for the construction of statutes and constitutional provisions, the committee are forced to the conclusion that the Legislature alone is empowered to choose a Senator upon the expiration of a senatorial term, and that the executive can only make temporary appointments to fill vacancies occurring in a term which has been previously filled. It is well known that in the convention which framed the Constitution this subject received careful consideration. After it had been determined that the States should have equal representation in the Senate, the manner of choosing Senators was considered; various propositions were submitted, and, among others, appointments by the executives of the States. Finally it was determined to vest in the Legislature the power of choosing Senators, and in the executive the power to make temporary appointments, if vacancies should happen in the office after it had been filled, until such time as the Legislature could again act. This, it seems to the committee, was the obvious intent of the Constitution, gathered, not only from the language of the entire section under consideration, but also from the debates in the convention in reference to its provisions.

Nothing in the history of the Senate for the last fifty years is at variance with the views here presented.

The records of the Senate show down to the year 1817 a number of appointments were made by State executives of persons to succeed Senators whose terms of service had expired, and that the persons so appointed were admitted to seats in the Senate.

The first case was that of William Cocke, of the State of Tennessee.

This State was admitted into the Union in 1796. In the month of August, of that year, William Cocke and William Blount were chosen Senators in Congress by the Legislature. By lot they were assigned to the first and second classes of the three classes directed to be formed by the article of the Constitution above quoted, and Mr. Cocke, having drawn the term which expired on the 3d day of March, 1797, during a recess of the Legislature, was appointed by the governor to be his own successor on the 22d of April, 1797, and he was admitted to a seat without objection.

The second case was that of Uriah Tracy, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, whose term expired on the 3d of March, 1801. Under an appointment by the governor he was admitted to a seat on the 4th day of March, 1801, after a heated discussion and by a party vote of 13 to 10.

This precedent was followed on the next day by the admission of Mr. Hindman, of Maryland; by the admission of Mr. Condit, of New Jersey, in 1803; Mr. Anderson, of Tennessee, and Mr. Smith, of Maryland, in 1809; Mr. Cutts, of New Hampshire, in 1813; and Mr. Williams, of Tennessee, in 1817; all executive appointments to fill places made vacant by the expiration of full terms of service during recesses of Legislatures, and all were admitted without discussion and without objection.

But in 1825 the term of James Lanman, of Connecticut, expired during a recess of the Legislature. In anticipation of the vacancy, he had been appointed by the governor as his own successor. His credentials were presented on the 4th day of March, 1825, and after a protracted debate the Senate refused to admit him to a seat. No record of this debate has been preserved, and the committee have not the advantage of the reasoning by which the Senate was guided in its action. Enough, however, remains to show that the Senate decided that a vacancy authorizing an appointment by the executive had not "happened" within the meaning of the Constitution. It was held, and, in the opinion of this committee, correctly, that the Constitution conferred upon the Legislature, and upon it alone, the power to appoint a Senator for the beginning of a new term; and it seems to the committee that this decision is clearly in accord with the spirit and meaning of the article of the Constitution already quoted.

This section confers upon the Legislature the right and imposes upon it the duty of choosing Senators who are to serve for six years.

In every one of the States a Legislature must be in session at some time preceding the expiration of a senatorial term. We know as a fact that at the time of the adoption of the Constitution these sessions were mostly annual, and, as now, those not annual were biennial. After the first assignment of Senators to classes the term of office was fixed, and, under the Constitution, would expire at a time certain. When, therefore, the first clause of the third section, first artiele, of the Constitution directed that Senators should be chosen by the Legislatures, it appears most manifestly to have been the purpose of its framers to give exclusive power to the Legislature to make the choice, unless, as provided by the last clause, vacancies should "happen" by resignation or otherwise during a recess of the Legislature, when the executive should make temporary appointments until the next session of the Legislature.

The power to make temporary appointments was conferred upon the executive because the accidents of death, resignation, expulsion, or acceptance of another office could not be foreseen or provided for by the Legislature. In the one class of cases the time when a term would expire was fixed by law and was well known. There could be no doubt or uncertainty in regard to it, and in such a case a vacancy could occur only by the willful disregard by the State in framing its organic law, or by the Legislature of constitutional obligations. In such case a vacancy could not "happen," or occur by chance, casualty, or other event that could not be guarded against.

The decision in Lanman's case has been for more than fifty years regarded as a correct exposition of the Constitution. During this long lapse of years its authority has not been questioned, and it has guided the action of legislatures and of executives of States.

Many cases have occurred when, under like circumstances, for months, and in some instances for one or two years, and even a longer time, States have been represented upon the floor of the Senate by a single Senator, and for the reason that the decision in Lanman's case was regarded as final and conclusive of the question. The following are cases of this character:

Cases of unfilled seats or vacancies at beginning of senatorial terms by reason of non-election.

Maine.—Vacancy from March 4, 1853, till February 23, 1854, when William Pitt Fessenden took the seat under an election.

Connecticut.—Vacancy from March 4, 1851, to May 12, 1852, when Isaac Toucey presented credentials of election by Legislature.

Pennsylvania.—Vacancy from March 4, 1855, to January 18, 1856, when William Bigler was seated on an election by the Legislature.

Maryland.—Vacancy from March 4, 1843, till January 2, 1844, when James Alfred Pearce, elected by the Legislature, took the seat.

North Carolina.—Vacancy from March 4, 1853, to December 6, 1854, when David S. Reid's certificate of election was presented.

Indiana.—Vacancy from March 4, 1855, to February 4, 1857, when Graham N. Fitch was admitted on credentials of legislative election, which was contested, and the contest not decided till late in the spring of 1858.

Missouri.—Vacancy from March 4, 1855, to January 12, 1857, when James S. Green was admitted on a legislative election.

California.—Vacancy from March 4, 1855, to February 15, 1857, when William M. Gwin presented himself under an election by the Legislature.

Oregon.—Vacancy from March 3, 1859, until December 5, 1860, when Edward D. Baker took the seat under a legislative election.

It is said, however, that the Senate departed from the rule in Lanman's case in the case of Mr. Sevier, appointed as his own successor by the governor of Arkansas in the year 1837.

The report in this case, made by a committee of the Senate, shows that the State of Arkansas was admitted into the Union in the year 1836, and in September of that year elected two Senators, Mr. Sevier and Mr. Fulton. Under the constitutional rule Mr. Fulton was allotted to the second class of Senators, and Mr. Sevier to the third, and his term of service expired on the 3d day of March, 1837, during a recess of the Legislature.

A committee of the Senate, to whom the credentials of Mr. Sevier were referred, after quoting the decision in Lanman's case, say:

"The decision seems to have been generally acquiesced in, nor is it intended by the committee to call its correctness in question. The principle asserted in that case is, that the Legislature of a State, by making an election themselves, shall provide for all vacancies that must occur at stated or known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution."

And the committee concludes by saying:

"The case under consideration is wholly different in principle. The time when Mr. Sevier was to go out of office under his election * * * was decided by lot under the provisions of the Constitution on that subject, * * * and therefore they recommend that Mr. Sevier be admitted."

The case in its facts was identical with that of Mr. Cocke, of Tennessee, settled in 1797, but in all material points differs from the one now under consideration.

The committee, from every view of the case, are forced to the conclusion that the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of the term of Senator Wadleigh cannot be filled by executive appointment, and therefore report the following resolution, and recommend its passage: -

Resolved, That Hon. Charles H. Bell is not entitled to a seat as a Senator by virtue of the appointment by the executive of New Hampshire.

E. SAULSBURY.
BENJ. H. HILL.
J. E. BAILEY.
F. KERNAN.
GEO. S. HOUSTON.
Z. B. VANCE.

Mr. COCKRELL. The minority report had better be read also.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The minority report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the views of the minority, submitted by Mr. HOAR, April 2, as follows:

The undersigned members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Hon. Charles H. Bell, claiming to be admitted as a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, dissent from the conclusions of a majority of the committee.

The Constitution, article 1, section 3, provides as follows:

1 A.

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

"Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year; of the second class, at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class, at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

The term of office of Hon. Bainbridge Wadleigh, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, expired on the 3d day of March, 1879.

By the statute of the United States, approved July 25, 1866, re-enacted Revised Statutes, 814, it is provided:

"The Legislature of each State, which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress, shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress."

Under the new constitution of New Hampshire, a Legislature was chosen in November, 1878, for a term to begin in June, 1879. That Legislature cannot elect a Senator until June, 1879, because, by the constitution of the State, its legislative powers will not vest until then. Its predecessor could not elect a Senator at its last session, and cannot now, if called together in special session, because it was not the Legislature last chosen before the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term.

The governor of New Hampshire, on the 13th of March, 1879, made temporary appointment of Hon. Charles H. Bell, until the next meeting of the Legislature. Mr. Bell now presents himself to claim the seat. The only question is, has a vacancy happened by "resignation or otherwise," so that the executive was authorized to make this appointment?

We are aided in determining this question by considering the leading purpose of the constitutional provision, the natural meaning of the words, and the uniform construction given to similar language used elsewhere in the Constitution, and the previous judgments of the Senate in like cases.

The purpose of the Constitution is to have the Senate always full. This is the interest not merely of the State whose right to elect is in question, but of the whole country, for whom the Senator is to legislate, whose servant he is, and to whom his service is due. To this end the Constitution provides that "the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State," and authorizes Congress to make regulations as to the time and manner of electing them. Congress has exercised this authority in the statutes cited, so that no failure of duty of either branch of the Legislature may interrupt the State's representation in the Senate. To meet the case of a vacancy happening in the recess of the State Legislature, the Constitution clothes the executive with the power of temporary appointment. The purpose to keep the representation of the State always full requires the construction which authorizes such appointment when the vacancy happens at the beginning of the term as much as if it happen at any other time. The authority given to the governor is to appoint "until the next meeting of the Legislature," which, literally construed, would require the Senator so appointed to vacate his seat on the day the Legislature meet. Yet the Senate, in furtherance of the controlling purpose of the Constitution that the place shall be always full, has uniformly held that the Senator so appointed retains his seat until the Legislature choose his successor or adjourn without making a choice.

The authority to appoint is vested in the executive, "if a vacancy happen." There is no distinction indicated between vacancies which happen when the term begins and vacancies which happen later. There can be no reason suggested for such a distinction. It is said that the term "vacancy" is not properly applied to offices whose term has expired by limitation at a fixed time, but only to terms which have once been filled.

But the Constitution expressly declares "the seats of the Senators shall be vacated at the expiration of the sixth year, &c. Did the Constitution mean to declare that to vacate a seat does not create a vacancy in it?

But it is said a vacancy which occurs at a certain time fixed by law is not a vacancy which "happens;" that the Constitution meant only to vest the appointing power in the executive in case of the vacancy occurring by reason of events which cannot be certainly foreseen; and this is the strong point of those who differ with us. On the contrary, we affirm that nothing is better settled in the construction of the Constitution and of legislation under it than that the words "vacancies happening" include the case of offices which have a fixed term which has expired, and which are vacant because no new appointment has been made. Article 2, section 2, of the Constitution, in its provision for the appointment of officers, declares:

"The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Under this provision the President exercises the undisputed power of filling offices which have a term fixed by law which expires in the recess of Congress. Most important rights of the people and of private citizens depend on the legality of such appointments, which the construction contended for by the majority of the committee must overturn. In Revised Statutes, section 1769, "the President is authorized to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate by reason of death, or resignation, or expiration of term of office."

It is not the ending of the term, but the absence from the office of any person authorized to fill it, to which the word "happen," which expresses contingency, is applied. It is certain that the term will end. It is still uncertain whether the office will be vacant, because that depends on the contingent event of the Legislature having filled it. It is in accordance with the custom of our language to apply the word "happen" to the simultaneous occurrence of two events, both of which are certain to take place. "If the fourth of July happen on Sunday, the next day shall be a legal holiday." "If the last day of grace happen to be a holiday, the note shall be payable on the day preceding." A fortiori the word may be appropriately used to express the occurrence at the same time of two events, one of which is contingent. If there happen to be no Senator in the office, the authority of the executive exists.

The question has frequently arisen for judgment in the Senate. By a line of decisions unbroken with one possible exception, it has been held that the governor of a State is authorized to fill a vacancy existing at the beginning of a senatorial term.

April 27, 1797, William Cocke was appointed a Senator from the State of Tennessee by the governor, his term having expired on the 3d of the preceding month. On the 15th of May, 1797, he presented his credentials, and was admitted to take the oath of office without objection or debate.

March 3, 1801, the seat of Uriah Tracy, of Connecticut, became vacant by the expiration of his term of office. On the 20th of February, 1801, the governor of Connecticut reappointed him a Senator. Objection being raised to his credentials, he was admitted to the oath by a vote of yeas 13, nays 10.

William Hindman, of Maryland, was afterward, on the next day, admitted to the oath on like credentials, without objection.

John Condit, of New Jersey, November 14, 1803, appointed a Senator from New Jersey, to fill the vacancy at the beginning of the term, was admitted to take the oath. Mr. Condit's credentials had been presented October 17, previous.

March 4, 1809, Samuel Smith, of Maryland, appointed on that day by the governor of his State to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of his own term, was admitted to his seat and sworn.

March 4, 1809, Joseph Anderson, of Tennessee, took his seat by virtue of an appointment from the governor of that State.

May 24, 1813, Charles Cutts, of New Hampshire, appointed by the executive to fill the vacancy during the recess of the Legislature, was, without question, admitted to the oath. This vacancy was at the beginning of the term.

March 4, 1817, John Williams, of Tennessee, appointed a Senator by the executive of the State, to hold said appointment until the meeting of the next session of the Legislature, was admitted. His credentials were filed on the 10th of the preceding February.

March 4, 1825, James Lanman, of Connecticut, presented his credentials of his appointment by the governor of that State, "to take effect immediately after the 3d of March, 1825, and to hold the seat until the next meeting of the Legislature." Mr. Lanman was refused the seat by a vote of 23 to 18. The case was referred to a select committee, who report the facts, but state neither reason nor conclusion. The committee say they have looked into the Journals of the Senate, and that the cases of Cocke, Tracy, Anderson, and Williams are the only analogous cases they could find. There is a brief sketch of the debate in Niles's Register, volume 28, page 32, but no statement of the reason on which any Senator proceeded. There is no historical evidence from which we can determine whether the Senate rejected Mr. Lanman on the ground that the governor could not fill a vacancy happening at the beginning of the term, or on the ground that the governor could not lawfully make the appointment in anticipation, before the vacancy occurred, and before he could possibly know whether the Legislature might be called together before that time. All the precedents which the committee cite, except that of Mr. Cocke, were cases where the appointment was made not when the vacancy happened in the recess of the Legislature, but only when the governor thought it might happen. In the case of Cocke, the date of the appointment is not given in the Journals, although in fact it was after the vacancy. The committee do not cite the case of Hindman, Smith, or Condit, nor the then recent case of Cutts, in deciding which some Senators then in office took part, where the appointments were made after the vacancy existed. There is, therefore, nothing to show whether the Senate meant to overrule all the precedents, some of which were not brought to its attention, or only so many of them as recognized the right of the executive to appoint when a vacancy had not happened.

Judge Story, Constitution, section 727, note 2, says:

"In the case of Mr. Lanman, a Senator from Connecticut, a question occurred whether the State executive could make an appointment in the recess of the State Legislature, in anticipation of the expiration of the term of office of an existing Senator. It was decided by the Senate that he could not make such an appointment. The facts were that Mr. Lanman's term of service as Senator expired on the 3d of March, 1825. The President had convoked the Senate to meet on the 4th of March. The governor of Connecticut, in the recess of the Legislature, (whose session would be in May,) on the 9th of the preceding February appointed Mr. Lanman as Senator, to sit in the Senate after the 3d of March. The Senate, by a vote of 23 to 18, decided that the appointment could not be constitutionally made until after the vacancy had actually occurred. (See Gordon's Digest of the Laws of the United States, 1827. Appendix, note 1, B.)"

In regard to the same case, the National Intelligencer of March 8, 1825, says, in an editorial note:

"An important constitutional question was yesterday decided in the Senate, by the refusal to admit Mr. Lanman to a seat in the Senate under a commission from the governor granted before the expiration of Mr. Lanman's late term of service. This is the first time the question has been adjudicated under such circumstances as to form a precedent; and we presume it may now be considered as a settled construction of the constitutional provision that a vacancy must have literally 'happened' or come to pass before an appointment can be made to fill it."

The State of Arkansas was admitted to the Union in 1836. In October, 1836, the Legislature of that State elected Ambrose H. Sevier and William S. Fulton Senators. On the allotment of the Arkansas Senators to their respective classes, as required by the third section of the first article of the Constitution, Mr. Sevier was placed in the class of Senators whose term of service expired on the 3d of March, 1837. The Legislature of Arkansas had no opportunity to fill the vacancy, and were not in session after the result of the allotment was known in that State. January 17, 1837, the governor of Arkansas appointed Mr. Sevier to fill the vacancy which would take place on the 3d of March. When Mr. Sevier's credentials were presented at the winter session, Mr. Webster suggested a doubt of the validity of the appointment, in which Mr. Sevier himself concurred. At the March session the credentials were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Grundy, from that committee, reported in favor of Mr. Sevier's admission, and he was admitted.

Mr. Grundy's report states that it is not intended by the committee to call in question the correctness of the decision in the Lanman case; that that case proceeded on the ground "that the Legislature should provide for all vacancies which must occur at stated and known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution."

The report further says:

"The case now under consideration is wholly different in principle. The time when Mr. Sevier was to go out of office was decided by lot."

From this review of the judgments of the Senate it appears that in every case in which a Senator has been appointed by the executive after the happening of a vacancy by the expiration of the term without an election of a successor by the Legislature, the person so appointed has been admitted to his seat. There is no indication that the Senate ever denied or doubted the correctness of this construction of the Constitution, except the unsupported statement of Mr. Grundy of the ground of a decision made twelve years before, a statement which nothing in the Journal or the debates confirms, and which is opposed to the understanding of Judge Story and the contemporaneous article in the Intelligencer.

The second section of the first article of the Constitution provides, "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." In 1837 the law of Mississippi fixed the time for the election of Representatives in November. The President having called a special session of Congress to meet in September, the governor of Mississippi, on the 13th of June, issued writs for an election in July for two Representatives to Congress to fill said vacancies until superseded by the members to be elected at the next regular election in November.

At this July election Messrs. Gholson and Claiborne were elected and claimed the seats. Their claim was referred to a committee, of which Andrew Buchanan was chairman, who reported in favor of their right to seats for the full term. They say in their report:

"The Constitution authorizes the executive power of the States respectively to order the filling of all vacancies which have actually happened, in the mode therein pointed out, no matter how the vacancy may have happened, whether by death, resignation, or expiration of the term of members previous to the election of their successors."

In the debate John Quincy Adams said he believed, in relation to offices, that every one happens to be vacant which is not full; and that, he believed, was the meaning and sense of the Constitution, whether the vacancy occurred from casualty, the regular course of events, expiration of term, or other cause.

The claimants were admitted to their seats. In November following, Messrs. Prentiss and Wood were elected for the same term. At the next December session the resolution declaring Gholson and Claiborne elected was rescinded, but a resolution was also adopted, by the casting vote of Speaker James K. Polk, that Prentiss and Wood were not members. So that no inference can properly be drawn from that case; and it is of no value, except so far as weight may be attached to the opinions of John Quincy Adams and James K. Polk, both favoring the construction of the Constitution for which we contend.

Appended to the report in the Mississippi case are opinions of two of the most distinguished Attorneys-General of the United States, Roger B. Taney and William Wirt, in which they discuss the meaning of the phrase "vacancies that may happen during the recess" with reference to the power of the President to fill an office which is vacant in the recess, because the Senate adjourned without acting on a nomination, the original vacancy having happened during the session. Both these eminent jurists agree that the term "happen" is equivalent to "happen to exist." "if it come to pass that there be a vacancy." Mr. Taney says:

"The Constitution was formed for practical purposes, and a construction that defeats the very object of the grant of power cannot be a true one. It was the intention of the Constitution that the offices created by law should always be full."

We submit, therefore, that the natural and ordinary meaning of the language employed, the purpose which the framers of the Constitution meant to accomplish, the unbroken current of decisions in like cases, and the uniform construction given to the same language when used elsewhere in the Constitution and in legislation in like cases, concur in supporting the interpretation which establishes Mr. Bell's claim. The office of Senator is a continuous office. When the Senator is duly elected by the Legislature beforehand no vacancy exists within the meaning of the Constitution. His taking the oath of office relates back to the beginning of the term and preserves the continuousness of the succession. He is when on his way to take the oath deemed to be a Senator and privileged from arrest. A vacancy happens, and only happens when the Legislature has failed to make due election, or the person chosen declines the appointment, or when the office once filled is vacated by death, resignation, or otherwise.

But if we adopt the narrowest possible construction imputed by Mr. Grundy in the Sevier report, the decision in the case of Lanman, the doctrine of the Sevier decision itself is enough for the purpose of this case. If the failure of the Arkansas Legislature to be in session after the expiration of Mr. Sevier's term was decided by lot, made the vacancy contingent in the narrowest sense of that term, so that the governor could appoint, certainly the fact that there is no Legislature in the State able to act constitutes such a contingency. Whether it so happens that the person once chosen is unable to remain in office, or it so happens that the Legislature cannot meet and choose, the contingency of a vacancy in the office has occurred. The six months at the end of the term are no more important than six months at its beginning. The Constitution makes equally careful provision for either.

GEO. F. HOAR.
ANGUS CAMERON.
JNO. J. INGALLS.

Mr. HOAR. I move to amend the resolution which is pending by striking out the word "not" before "entitled;" so as to read:

Resolved, That Hon. Charles H. Bell is entitled to a seat as a Senator by virtue of the appointment by the executive of New Hampshire.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I shall not have the good fortune to be present on Monday when this case is to be considered more fully, and I desire now merely to say a word or two in addition to the arguments which are made in the minority report, or rather to sum up what is there said.

I will state the precise question which this case presents. The Constitution providing that the office of Senator shall be vacated at the end of six years, goes on further to say that if there happen to be a vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise during the recess of the Legislature, the governor may appoint. Precisely the same phraseology is used with reference to the filling of vacancies in civil offices during the recess of the Senate by the President. Substantially the same phraseology is used with reference to the right of the governor of a State to issue writs for elections in cases of vacancy in the representation in the House of Representatives.

Now, there is scarcely a question which can arise under our Constitution in regard to which the authorities are so concurrent or of such weight. There are ten precedents of the Senate itself, beginning with a case which occurred in the year 1797, when many of the framers of the Constitution were in the Senate; and they all concur in holding that the governor may appoint if the vacancy happen by reason that the constitutional term of a Senator had ended when the Legislature was not in session and the Legislature has made no provision to fill it. There is one case, the case of Mr. Lanman, where there was a decision which is claimed to be different; but in the case of Mr. Lanman the governor not only made the appointment but he made the appointment before the vacancy arose, when he could not know whether the Legislature would be in session or not. The committee who reported in the case of Lanman express no opinion and state no reason, but simply say they have looked into the precedents and there are the following precedents bearing upon the case; and of the eight or ten precedents which had then been made in the Senate they cite the three where the governor made the appointment before the vacancy happened, and do not cite the others, one of which had occurred within six or eight years and when many men then in the Senate had been present. So the question arises whether the Senate in the Lanman case meant to decide that the governor could not fill a vacancy existing at the beginning of a senatorial term, or only meant to decide that the governor could not fill a vacancy before it existed and when he could not know whether the Legislature would be called together and be able to fill it themselves.

On which of those two grounds did the Lanman case proceed? Judge Story, in his treatise on the Constitution, declares that it proceeded on the former, that is, that the Senate held that the governor could not fill a vacancy before it arose. The National Intelligencer of the next day, as we have said in the views of the minority, in an editorial article, says that the question arose in the Senate the day before whether a vacancy could be filled by the governor before it arose, and it was held that it could not.

I hold in my hand Gordon's Digest of the laws of the United States, published in 1827, two years after the Lanman case was decided in the Senate. I am informed by the very highest judicial authority that Mr. Gordon was one of the most accomplished and able members of the Pennsylvania bar of his day, and that he was regarded in that State then, and is now, as one of the very highest authorities for accuracy and legal learning and ability, and for historical accuracy, which that State affords. I will read what Mr. Gordon says in his Digest:

Mr. CARPENTER. On what page?

Mr. HOAR. Page 735, appendix No. 1, note B. After reciting the facts, Mr. Gordon says:

> Upon these facts the question was raised whether the appointment of Mr. Lanman was constitutional, having been made before a vacancy in the representation of the State of Connecticut in the Senate of the United States had occurred. On the resolution offered to admit Mr. Lanman to be qualified and take his seat in the Senate, it was determined, 23 to 18, that he was not entitled to a seat.

To oppose this declaration of Judge Story, to oppose this contemporaneous newspaper report and this declaration of Mr. Gordon, is merely a statement in Mr. Grundy's report in the Sevier case, which he distinguishes from the Lanman case, made twelve years after, of his opinion that the Senate proceeded on the ground that the governor could not fill a vacancy arising at the beginning of a term. Therefore I think we are warranted in saying that the unbroken current of senatorial precedent from the beginning of the Government until to-day is that the governor is entitled to fill a vacancy whenever it happens, whether at the beginning or the end of the term, so that it happen when the Legislature is not in session, until the next meeting of the Legislature, when the right of the governor in the premises is determined.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do it for information. I want to vote with the Senator if I can on this question. The difficulty in my mind is that I think the emphatic word in the constitutional provision is "happen." Take the case of Wisconsin. Our Legislature assembles on the first Monday of January. It has to elect to fill up the vacancy that is to occur in March. The Legislature generally sits until about the last of April. Suppose they begin on the day fixed by the act of Congress to ballot for Senator; they make no choice; they ballot up to and past the 4th of March without making an election. A vacancy then occurs; by the Constitution the term expires, and the Legislature sits still, with that vacancy running on, balloting for thirty days and unable to make a choice, and finally adjourn without making a choice. Could the governor then appoint a Senator upon the ground that that was a vacancy happening in the recess of the Legislature?

Mr. HOAR. I think not; and for the reason not that it would not be a vacancy, but that the power is qualified by the other words, as uniformly construed, that the governor may appoint "until the next meeting of the Legislature." Therefore, if the Legislature should meet after the vacancy occurred, the governor not having appointed, and fail to elect, the literal answer would be that in the particular case the Senator supposes the vacancy would not have happened in the recess; but I suppose the Senator could easily vary that by supposing the Legislature not to be in session on a particular day, and therefore I make the other answer, which is that the governor's right to appoint until the next meeting of the Legislature is uniformly construed to mean that after the Legislature has met the entire constitutional authority of the governor, so far as relates to that vacancy, is gone.

To return, then, to the meaning of the term "happen," I do not propose to repeat the argument which is made in the printed views of the minority which have been read, which covers the question as far as I can understand it; but I simply call the attention of the Senate to the concurrence of authority upon this question. There is this unbroken, unshaken, unopposed series of senatorial precedents. In the next place, the language of the Constitution in regard to the filling of vacancies in civil offices being exactly the same verbatim, not only the uniform construction which is well known but the expression of opinion of some of the greatest legal authorities in favor of this construction is to be found. The question was submitted to Chief-Justice Taney when Attorney-General under Jackson, and Chief-Justice Taney replied:

> The Constitution was formed for practical purposes, and a construction that defeats the very object of the grant of power cannot be a true one. It was the intention of the Constitution that the offices created by law should always be full.
> The term "happen" is equivalent to "happen to exist" "if it come to pass that there should be a vacancy."

So that in regard to the meaning of this language in the Constitution we have the great authority of Chief-Justice Taney. William Wirt gave a like opinion, cited in the views of the minority. The question arose in the House of Representatives and John Quincy Adams and James K. Polk, agreeing in opinion in regard to almost nothing else under the sun, concurred in attributing to the Constitution the meaning which we attribute to it.

I do not see the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] in his seat, but I desire to appeal to his colleague. The Senator is now returning to his seat. I was about to state that I had very high authority for the declaration that among the most distinguished jurists of the State of Indiana is the late Judge Stuart. The question came up in regard to the meaning of a clause in the State constitution, and Judge Stuart, who I am informed is one of the very highest legal authorities in that State, discussed the meaning of the similar phrase in the Constitution of the United States, the one we are now discussing. Judge Stuart says:

> There is no technical or peculiar meaning to the word "vacant" as used in the Constitution. It means empty, unoccupied, as applied to an office without an incumbent. There is no basis for the distinction urged that it applies only to offices vacated by death, resignation, or otherwise. An existing office without an incumbent is vacant, whether it be a new or an old one.

That was in the case of Stocking vs. The State, 7 Indiana Reports, page 326, followed in the case of Collins vs. The State, 8 Indiana Reports, page 344.

I desired, Mr. President, to add these authorities to those cited in the minority report, not to discuss the general question to-day.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The understanding was yesterday, as stated by myself, that the question should come up on Monday next, but the Senator from Massachusetts had to go away and of course we agreed that the matter should come up temporarily to-day. If any other Senator desires to discuss the subject to-day I shall not move to postpone its further consideration until the time agreed upon.

My purpose in rising was simply to say that notwithstanding the agreement was that the matter should come up on Monday for consideration, I shall not now move the postponement of its consideration until that day if any other Senator desires to make a speech on it to-day, the agreement being that we would take the matter up on Monday for consideration. I do not know whether any other Senator desires to speak on the question to-day. So far as I know, on this side of the Chamber there is none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish to say at this time, in reference to what the Senator from Massachusetts has stated in quoting from the opinions of the Attorneys-General, that while I am at present inclined to agree in the conclusions to which the Senator from Massachusetts has come, very decidedly—I think he is right—I should not wish to have those opinions of Taney and Wirt taken as expressing the opinion that I hold about the power of the President of the United States to fill a vacancy by construing the words "and if vacancies happen" by inserting after the phrase the words "to exist," because that would carry to the President of the United States the power to fill all the offices of the United States by men of his own choice at all times when the Senate was not in session, and even with the very men year after year whom the Senate had declined to advise him to appoint when they had been nominated. Those opinions, the one of Taney in particular,—I do not remember about the other,—were given to sustain the power of the President after a vacancy had occurred during a recess of the Senate by expiration of term, and so far I entirely agree with him as to the power of the President to fill that until the termination of the next session of the Senate. But after that next session had occurred and somebody had been nominated to fill the place and rejected, and the Senate had then adjourned, I cannot agree that there still existed a power in the President of the United States to fill up the office again, under the original power as to a vacancy happening; and it could only be done in the way that the ingenious mind of Chief-Justice Taney suggested, the only way I think that could possibly have been invented, by importing into the Constitution the words "happen to exist" instead of "occur" or "happen." Therefore it was held that the President might continue to fill up, and by the same person, if you please, constitutionally considered of course by the same person, all the time. I do not believe in that.

I think the Senator from Massachusetts has pretty nearly demonstrated that the actual decisions of the Senate are not adverse to the claim of Mr. Bell from New Hampshire, but I think the error into which the public or the governors of the States have fallen is in talking about terms in senatorial office. Every Senator has a term; that is true; but the office is a continuous office. The office of two Senators from a State never expires, and it has not any periods in it as respects the office. It has periods as it respects the person who is to fill them, who must go again to his State that is to have the person renewed and again inducted; but the office is perpetual and continuous. Therefore, when the Constitution speaks of a vacancy happening in the office of Senator, it is not speaking of any particular period of six years or of three years or of one, if the Legislature has filled up the vacancy before, but it is speaking of a vacancy in the representation of the State, the filling of which is necessary to fulfill the purposes of the Government, and wherever that vacancy occurs or happens, (because in the Constitution I think the two expressions mean exactly the same thing,) from whatever cause, and as the Constitution says, "by resignation, or otherwise," without specification in any way, it is to be filled. The highest mission of constitutional duty is to have that vacancy filled, until, as the Constitution limits it, the governing power of the State, the Legislature next coming after the occurring of this vacancy, may have an opportunity to fill it; and there the Constitution limits the power of the executive, because——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Because it says (if the Senator will pardon me a moment until I finish my sentence) that the governor may fill until the next meeting of the Legislature. That having occurred, his power is of course exhausted, and he cannot fill again. Now I will listen to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont, knowing his ability as a lawyer, one or two questions, that for my own information I may learn his opinion. By the law of California the election for members of the House of Representatives for the Forty-sixth Congress does not occur until next September. By the Constitution, when a vacancy happens in the representation in the House, the governor must issue a writ of election and order that vacancy to be filled. Does the Senator from Vermont hold that the governor of California could issue a writ of election for the election of members of the House of Representatives previously to September next? Could he, after the 4th of March, have issued a writ for the election of Representatives to the Forty-sixth Congress, for this extra session?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, I hold that he can.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator one more question, and then he can give his reasons for both answers at his leisure. Does the Senator hold that the President, under the power to fill vacancies, could appoint a chief-justice or an associate justice of the Supreme Court, if there should happen to be a vacancy on the bench by death, during the recess of Congress? For instance, suppose Congress has adjourned, and during that recess, before the next session, a justice of the Supreme Court should die. Does the Senator hold that the President of the United States could appoint one to fill that vacancy until the meeting of Congress?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly have that impression, Mr. President.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I wish to know the Senator's opinion as a lawyer, knowing that he is able to give a good answer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not remember that there is any distinction in the Constitution as to the powers of the President as to the nature of the office that he is to fill. The Constitution says that the President "shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States," &c., and that whenever a vacancy occurs in any office during the recess of the Senate the President of the United States may fill that vacancy by granting a commission that shall expire at the end of the next session. There is no limitation or qualification.

Of course, I am not insensible to the argument implied in the question of my honorable friend as to the office of a judge, be he a judge of the supreme court or of the circuit court or of the district court, or any other of the judicial courts of the United States, which is to be held during good behavior and not on a definite term; but inasmuch as the interests of the administration of justice in my view fall just as clearly within the provisions of having somebody to carry on the administration of justice as the others do, although I never thought of it before, I should have no question, as a first impression, of the power of the President.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The question to which I wish to call the attention of the Senator (and he will see where it will lead to) is in the constitutional meaning of the word "vacancy;" is there such a thing as a vacancy on the supreme bench by the death of an incumbent?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I supposed there was, Mr. President. I had the impression that, when the first Congress established a Supreme Court of the United States, which the Constitution required them to establish by law, until the judges were nominated and confirmed and commissioned every one of those offices that had been created by law was vacant. If the offices had not been vacant, I am quite unable to see how the President and the Senate could fill them up.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I can see how the President may nominate to the Senate to fill a term. That I can understand; but the point I make is that if a judge of the Supreme Court or a judge of the circuit court or the district court should die during the recess of Congress, is there any instance where the President has appointed a judge to fill that place until the meeting of Congress, and where that judge has taken his seat?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know whether there are or not, but I think there are.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I ask for information; I have found no such case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am informed by a gentleman whose accuracy about historic knowledge as well as about everything else is well known here, and who sits very near me, that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] was appointed a judge of the Supreme Court by the President during a recess of the Senate. Is that true?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, nodded assent.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I understand in point of fact that Senator DAVIS was appointed, but that he did not take his seat until after his confirmation by the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be that he did not take his seat; he need not take his seat; he might never take his seat.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The President can designate whom he will nominate. The nomination is not the appointment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh yes.

Mr. HOAR. I simply wish to make one suggestion on the precise point of the question put, which also relates to the point about the filling of civil offices when a vacancy exists during a session of the Senate and then continues afterward. The question which arises on the matter suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] and the matter suggested by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is the same which arises on the question suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] and that is, of the controlling effect of other clauses in the Constitution. When the Constitution says that the governor of a State may appoint a Senator until the next meeting of the Legislature, is not that a limit of the entire authority over that vacancy? So when the Constitution says the judge shall hold his office during good behavior, is not that a limit on the power of appointment subject to the future confirmation by the Senate, which would make the judge in that case hold an office only until the Senate should meet? Whether that is a good or a bad argument, that is the clause of the Constitution which presents that point. So answering the Senator from Georgia that the judge would not have the right to take his seat, would not in the least impugn the general proposition. So in regard to the appointment to a vacancy which has occurred before a previous adjournment of the Senate, the President being only to appoint to fill during the recess, does not that imply a limit on the President's power? In all these three cases the ground being that the vacancy did not happen during the time specified, another expression of the Constitution limits the power of the President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I express my thanks to the Senator from Massachusetts for stating so much better than I could myself, exactly what I was going to say.

Mr. HOAR. I beg your pardon; I thought you had passed from that point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh no. And I need not add anything to what the Senator from Massachusetts has said upon that particular topic.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia, although I do not see that it has anything to do with this question at all, to what he has said about judicial offices which are for life when there is good behavior. The Constitution declares that the President "shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for." The very next clause says "The President shall have the power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

Now, then, if there is any force in human language, there is a complete grant of power, that is exhausted in respect of the field that it covers, to the President of the United States to fill every vacancy that happens during a recess of the Senate in every office of the United States. If the President of the United States cannot appoint a judicial officer whose general term happens to be during good behavior, because that is such, although the vacancy occurs by death during a recess of the Senate, being confessedly a vacancy that does happen in the very narrowest sense of the term, in the sense of my friend from Georgia, then you are obliged to import into the Constitution a limitation upon the power of the President to find somebody to carry on the administration of justice until the constitutional and permanent appointment can be made. As my friend from Wisconsin suggested privately a few moments ago, all these provisions for temporary appointments are exceptive and temporary, in order to provide always, in every branch of the Government, the means of keeping it alive and carrying it on.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator will understand that I am not debating the question; but I see that the whole point turns upon the meaning of the word "vacancy." What is a "vacancy" in the meaning of the Constitution? Now, my attention has been called to the historical fact that in one instance the President did appoint a judge of the Supreme Court in vacation, and he did take his seat.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no doubt there are many.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. An instance of that kind occurring without discussion would not amount to anything. The real question is what is the meaning of the word "vacancy." I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in relation to filling vacancies in the House of Representatives the language is much broader than it is in regard to the filling of vacancies in the Senate. If he will look at the Constitution he will find that the language is that when vacancies happen, not by death or otherwise, but when they happen at all in the representation in the House——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, may I ask my friend from Georgia——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. In a moment. "When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." I wish to know of the Senator if he holds that the governor of California could now issue a writ of election and bring on the election of Representatives from California to the Forty-sixth Congress?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask my friend from Georgia who says that the language about the House of Representatives is broader because it says "happen" and does not use the words "by resignation or otherwise," how it is possible that any vacancy shall happen unless it be "by resignation or otherwise?"

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is precisely my view, that a "vacancy" in the meaning of the Constitution does not "happen" ordinarily, especially in the case of a judge, unless it happens "by death, resignation, or otherwise." Now, the word "otherwise" there, as the Senator well knows, under the legal decisions has a meaning; it has a very definite and well-settled meaning; and that is this: a vacancy that happens otherwise is one that is similar to those which are enumerated. For instance a vacancy may happen by death, resignation, or otherwise. "Otherwise" how? In some similar method upon the incumbent. The vacancy occurs by death upon the incumbent; the vacancy occurs by resignation, the act of the incumbent; and so if it occurs in any other wise; the word means "any vacancy occurring otherwise, i. e., in a similar manner upon the incumbent; that is, if the incumbent shall be expelled; that is, if the incumbent should not take his seat after he has been elected. The word "otherwise" there evidently means a vacancy happening in a similar manner, by casualty, to those specified.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this is the first information I ever had that the word "otherwise" meant "in a similar manner." I thought it meant "in some other manner." That is the impression that I have always had; but I see I am mistaken——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator will find that is the definition given to it by the courts in many cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think I shall find that in the view we are now speaking of, with great respect to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I take great pleasure, then, in informing the Senator of something he had not known in the decisions of the courts. I thought he knew of everything on that subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I am not altogether ignorant of the decisions to which my friend refers; but we shall differ in respect to their application to this question.

Now, Mr. President, to come back again to the point, we will leave the question of judicial officers which has nothing to do with this that I can see, and we will come to what the Senator says about the House of Representatives, and about the difference in the Constitution not saying "by resignation or otherwise," in regard to vacancies there. Let us suppose that a statute of a State against malicious homicide, which is murder, should say "that if any person shall maliciously and with malice aforethought and by a gun kill another person," or it should say, "by a gun or otherwise kill another person he shall be guilty of murder," and it turned out that the other person in the case supposed was maliciously strangled, as people sometimes are by robbers, by being grasped by the throat in the strong grip of some stalwart thief who gets into your house at night and strangles you to death. The man is indicted for murder. Thereupon the counsel for the defense rises up and says "this statute says that if any person with malice aforethought shall kill anybody with a gun or otherwise he shall be guilty of murder. That is the statute; and that means the 'otherwise' is 'in some similar manner,' that is by the use of gunpowder or a pistol instead of a gun."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The word "otherwise" in that connection would mean "otherwise in a malicious manner" to make the offense murder.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly, and that is what it means here, whenever a vacancy occurs by resignation or in any other manner, so that you have the vacancy, just as in the case of a homicide you have the malicious killing.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I repeat with all deference, not meaning to interrupt the Senator, that the word "otherwise" there means this: the clause applies where a vacancy shall happen by death, resignation, or otherwise; that is, by the happening of any other event to the incumbent by which the incumbent does not remain in the place to which he was elected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Constitution is speaking of the vacant office, and not of the incumbent at all except in the first phrase. There is where the Senator from Georgia and I appear to differ. The Constitution is looking to have each State represented in this body all the time and by some method that the Constitution provides and looks to do it; and therefore when it uses the word "otherwise," it uses a comprehensive term, so that in whatever way a State ceases to have opportunity to express its full voice here in this council of States, it shall be filled up temporarily by the governor until the Legislature, the chief and the sovereign power in the State next meeting, can have an opportunity to fill it. Then if they fail in their constitutional duty, the Constitution as it was made has not thought fit to give the governor any other power. That is the state of the case.

But now to come back to all that I intended to say it was to call to the attention of Senators for their consideration what I think has been the error into which many people have fallen—the talking about terms in connection with this question. I submit to the consideration of Senators that the term of the particular person who fills the office has nothing to do with the continuity of the office itself, and that the Constitution is speaking of the time of the office, and cares nothing about terms; that whenever that office comes to be vacant so that the State is deprived of its voice, then if there be not a State Legislature present and in session to fill it the governor may fill it until the next session of the Legislature has an opportunity to do it, and it does not give the governor power to fill it any longer. It seems to me that if Senators will think of that distinction and thereby disembarrass themselves of the idea of personal terms as having anything to do with this question, it will go a great way to solve it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. According to the understanding of yesterday the further consideration of this matter goes over.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir; until Monday next.

Mr. HOAR. Before the matter goes over, I understand from gentlemen on the floor that in the case of Chief-Justice Rutledge, who was rejected by the Senate in John Adams's administration, he actually took his seat and held court. I mention this in answer to the question of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no doubt that if the precedents were examined it would be found that in the whole history of the Government judicial offices have been frequently, and constantly when a vacancy occurred during the recess of the Senate, filled by the President. Of course it would be very rare in the small body of men composing the Supreme Court; but if you take the whole judicial affairs of the country, I have no doubt that many instances will be found although I do not remember any.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The election question goes over until Monday, I believe.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Until Monday. The regular order is the call of the Calendar of general orders. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FERRY. Will not the Senator move an executive session?

Mr. CARPENTER. I withdraw the motion.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. PADDOCK. I submit the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Agriculture:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That a commission, to be composed of three Senators and four members of the House of Representatives, is hereby authorized to be appointed to devise a plan for the reorganization of the Department of Agriculture, with the view of extending its jurisdiction and increasing its efficiency. Such commission shall have authority to send for persons and papers, to sit during the recess, and to report by bill or otherwise, at the next regular session of the present Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest to my friend before his resolution is referred that he modify it so as to make the number of Senators and Representatives equal. A commission in which a majority is from one House places the other House entirely in the power of the majority.

Mr. PADDOCK. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island, and make the number three Senators and three Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

LEGISLATION ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to state that on Monday after the morning hour I shall move to take from the table the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] on the 21st of March, for the purpose of expressing some views on that subject.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 3, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to proceed with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment the question under discussion involves one of the most important principles that ever challenged the attention of the American Congress; a principle paramount to every conceivable consideration and mere party expedient; a principle in which every freeman of this country, whether republican or democrat, is profoundly and vitally interested; a principle which lies at the foundation of all republican institutions, and upon which their purity as well as their perpetuity depend; a principle recognized by our ancestors in their very earliest experiments in representative governments, and which has been cherished by their descendants with the most jealous vigilance for over six hundred years—in a word, the great fundamental principle of republican liberty that the ballot-box should be protected from the slightest approach of military power, and that the voter should be absolutely free in exercising at the polls the high prerogative of a sovereign citizen.

In order that gentlemen may understand the estimation in which this grand pivotal principle of free government has always been held by the great people from whom we derived our language, our laws, our traditions of liberty, and our ideas of constitutional limitations, I beg leave to call their attention to a statute enacted by the British Parliament over one hundred and fifty years ago, and which has remained in force from that time to the present hour. I allude to the statute passed in the eighth year of the reign of George II, the year 1735. It is an act entitled—

Anno octavo Georgii II, c. 30. [1735.]

CAP. XXX.

An act for regulating the quartering of soldiers during the time of the elections of members to serve in Parliament.

Whereas by the ancient common law of this land all elections ought to be free; and whereas by an act passed in the third year of the reign of King Edward the First, of famous memory, it is commanded, upon great forfeiture, that no man by force of arms, nor by malice, or menacing, shall disturb any to make free election; and forasmuch as the freedom of elections of members to serve in Parliament is of the utmost consequence to the preservation of the rights and liberties of this kingdom; and whereas it hath been the usage and practice to cause any regiment, troop, or company, or any number of soldiers which hath been quartered in any city, borough, town, or place where any election of members to serve in Parliament hath been appointed to be made to remove and continue out of the same during the time of such election, except in such particular cases as are hereinafter specified: To the end, therefore, that the said usage and practice may be settled and established for the future, be it enacted by the king's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal and commons in Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that when and as often as any election of any peer or peers to represent the peers of Scotland in Parliament, or of any member or members to serve in Parliament, shall be appointed to be made, the secretary at war for the time being, or in case there shall be no secretary at war, then such person who shall officiate in the place of the secretary at war, shall, and is hereby required, at some convenient time before the day appointed for such election, to issue and send forth proper orders in writing for the removal of every such regiment, troop, or company, or other number of soldiers as shall be quartered or billeted in any such city, borough, town, or place where such election shall be appointed to be made, out of every such city, borough, town, or place, one day at the least before the day appointed for such election, to the distance of two or more miles from such city, borough, town, or place, and not to make any nearer approach to such city, borough, town, or place, as aforesaid, until one day at the least after the poll to be taken at such election shall be ended and the poll-books closed.

II. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That in case the secretary at war for the time being, or such person who shall officiate in the place of the secretary at war, shall neglect or omit to issue or send forth such orders as aforesaid, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, and shall be thereof lawfully convicted upon any indictment to be preferred at the next assizes, or sessions of oyer and terminer, to be held for the county where such offense shall be committed, or on an information to be exhibited in the court of King's Bench, within six months after such offense committed, such secretary at war, or person who shall officiate in the place of the secretary at war, shall for such offense be discharged from their said respective offices, and shall from thenceforth be utterly disabled and made incapable to hold any office or employment, civil or military, in his majesty's service.

III. Provided, nevertheless, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to the city and liberty of Westminster, or the borough of Southwark, for and in respect of the guards of his majesty, his heirs or successors, nor to any city, borough, town, or place, where his majesty, his heirs or successors, or any of his royal family, shall happen to be or reside at the time of any such election as aforesaid, for or in respect of such number of troops or soldiers only, as shall be attendant as guards to his majesty, his heirs or successors, or to such other person of the royal family as is aforesaid; nor to any castle, fort, or fortified place where any garrison is usually kept, for or in respect of such number of troops or soldiers only whereof such garrison is composed.

IV. Provided likewise, That nothing in this act contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to any officer or soldier who shall have a right to vote at any such election, as aforesaid, but that every such officer and soldier may freely, and without interruption, attend and give his vote at such election; anything hereinbefore contained to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

V. Provided always, That the secretary at war, or in case there shall be no secretary at war, then such person who shall officiate in the place of the secretary at war, shall not be liable to any forfeiture or incapacity for not sending such order, as aforesaid, upon any election to be made of a member to serve in Parliament on vacancy of any seat there, unless notice of the making out any new writ for such election shall be given to him by the clerk of the crown in chancery or other officer making out any new writ for such election, which notice he is hereby directed and required to give with all convenient speed after making out the said writ.

Alluding to this statute, Mr. Blackstone, in the first book of his Commentaries, a work doubtless familiar to every gentleman in this House, as it is to every legal tyro throughout the country, says:

And as it is essential to the very being of Parliament that elections should be absolutely free, therefore all undue influences upon the electors are illegal and strongly prohibited. Mr. Locke ranks it among those breaches of trust in the executive magistrate which according to his notion amount to a dissolution of the government, if he employs the force, treasure, and offices of society to corrupt the representatives or openly to pre-engage the electors and prescribe what manner of persons shall be chosen.

"For thus to regulate the candidates of electors and new-model the ways of elections, what is it," says he "but to cut up the Government by the roots and poison every fountain of public security."

As soon, therefore, as the time and place of election, either in counties or boroughs, are fixed, all soldiers quartered in the place are to remove one day before the election to the distance of two miles or more, and not to return until one day after the poll is ended.

Such, sir, is the principle involved in the proposition under consideration, a principle which no man who is worthy to represent a generous and confiding constituency upon this floor—I care not from what section he may come or what his party affiliations or political predilections may be—can afford to treat with indifference, much less to sacrifice to any purpose of personal aggrandizement or party supremacy; for if gentlemen will reflect for a single moment upon the proneness of all men to abuse the power with which they may be intrusted by their fellow beings, if they will reflect upon the rapid and remarkable fluctuations which have heretofore taken place in the distribution of population in this country, and the frequent and sudden mutations to which representative governments like ours are constantly liable, they must be convinced of the possibility at least that the time may come when they will find themselves under the necessity of appealing to the very doctrine they may now affect to despise.

I had hoped, therefore, that in the discussion of this question neither party passion nor sectional prejudice would be invoked; that it would be discussed on the other side of the Chamber as upon this with a calmness, dignity, and judicial candor commensurate with its gravity and importance. In that, however, I am sorry to say I have been deeply and painfully disappointed, especially in the remarks submitted by my distinguished friend from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] I do not know, sir, that in the whole course of my life I have ever listened to a speech with feelings of profounder regret, not because it injured either myself or the party to which I belong in the remotest possible degree, but because I considered it decidedly injurious to himself. I regretted it because of my high appreciation of his ability as a lawyer and my extraordinary attachment to him as a friend, a sentiment which I sincerely trust is fully reciprocated by himself, and I hope, therefore, he will pardon me for saying, not in anger but in sorrow, that while it might have been appropriate, or at least pardonable, in some petty politician of his party at the cross-roads, or around the stove of the village bar-room, it was unjust to his own genial and generous nature as a man to indulge in a line of remark which could have no other effect, whatever might have been its purpose, than to wound the feelings of gentlemen who I am certain have hitherto entertained for him nothing but the kindliest feelings of friendship; it was unjust to his reputation as a statesman to assume the idle vaporing of an obscure country editor as a reflex of the principles and motives of a great political party, or a just expression of the sentiments of the intelligent portion of the community in which he may reside; it was unjust to his high standing as a lawyer and a legislator to abandon the discussion of a proposition involving grave questions of constitutional law and important principles of public policy and devote himself entirely to vehement declamation upon matters having no more relation to the question under consideration than the ancient feud between the pigmies and the cranes; and it was unjust to his character as a patriot to grope among the catacombs of the past for matters which had long since been buried out of sight and which could have no possible relevancy to the issue before us, or serve no other purpose in the present debate than to rekindle the fires of sectional strife which I hoped had, in the good providence of the Divine Being he so solemnly invoked, been allayed, and allayed forever.

It was for these reasons, sir, that I so profoundly regretted the gentleman's speech, to which I shall attempt no further answer. It would be as much to the purpose of this discussion, indeed, to reply to the roar of the surf that breaks upon his own rock-bound coast, or the howling of the storms that eddy around his hospitable home. I do not intend myself, and I trust that my friends on this side of the House do not intend to be diverted from the consideration of the question before us by the discussion of any collateral issue whatever, but mean to press straight forward to the accomplishment of the high purpose upon which we have resolved—

> Like to the Pontic sea,
> Whose icy current and compulsive course
> Ne'er feels retiring ebb, but keeps due on > To the Propontic, and the Hellespont.

What is that purpose, sir? To strike from two sections of the Revised Statutes a clause comprised in eight simple words, which imply an unlimited authority in the Government of the United States to interfere with the enforcement of the local laws of the several States for the preservation of the peace at the polls whether called upon for that purpose by the proper State authorities as prescribed in the Constitution or not; a power, as we contend, totally unauthorized by the organic law of the Union, except under certain plainly expressed conditions, but which has been repeatedly exercised, and is constantly liable to be employed in corrupting the ballot-box, destroying the freedom of elections, and thereby defeating the popular will. It is simply to strike from sections 2002 and 5528 of the Statutes the words "or to keep the peace at the polls," so that if any officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States shall bring, keep, or have under his control any troops or armed men at any place where any general or special election is held in any State of this Union for any purpose whatever except to repel the armed enemies of the United States, he shall be liable to the penalties therein prescribed.

I was astounded, sir, to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] repeat on yesterday a statement made in a somewhat different form perhaps, but equally to my amazement, by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] on Saturday last, to the effect that the author of this obnoxious clause, in our estimation so pregnant with danger to the liberties of the American people and the integrity of their institutions, was a Senator from Kentucky, now deceased, (Mr. Powell,) and it was supported by the unanimous vote of the democratic members of both Houses of the Thirty-seventh Congress, both statements evidently intended to convey the impression distinctly and emphatically that it was a democratic measure, passed against the will of a majority of the republicans then in the Senate and House of Representatives. I will not say that the gentlemen were disingenuous or uncandid in this. I would not insinuate that either of them could be guilty of a deliberate attempt to make a false impression either upon the House or the country with regard to this matter, I rather choose to suppose that they had overlooked or forgotten the facts, notwithstanding each of them had the record before him when making his statement and could have seen that the impression sought to be made was diametrically opposite to the truth, as I shall presently show to the exclusion of all possible doubt. Before proceeding to do so, however, it may not be impertinent to this discussion for me to call the attention of the House to the facts which led to the enactment of the law in which the clause now proposed to be repealed is found.

In the winter or early spring of 1863 a democratic convention, comprising many of the most distinguished and patriotic citizens of the Commonwealth, assembled at Frankfort, Kentucky, for the purpose of nominating candidates for the various State offices to be filled at the ensuing August election, as had been customary from the time that method of party organization was first resorted to in our country. Before that convention had nominated a single candidate, however; before it had adopted a solitary resolution or promulgated a single principle of its political faith, it was dispersed at the point of the bayonet at the command of a military officer of the United States by the name of Gilbert, I believe, who, having by that single act of brutal outrage upon the constitutional rights and liberties of American freemen achieved for himself an immortality of infamy, has, fortunately for the good of society and the reputation of the human family, sunk into the obscurity for which his Creator designed him, I trust never to be heard of again.

The delegates to that convention, having been thus forcibly deprived by the armed soldiery of the United States of the natural and inalienable right guaranteed to them by the Constitution of their country to peaceably assemble for a lawful purpose, and prevented from presenting a ticket for the free suffrages of the people of their State, thirty-one gentlemen, among them Hon. William F. Bullock, of Louisville; Hon. Joshua F. Bullett, a judge of the court of appeals; Hon. Nat Wolf, but recently before a leading member of the State senate; Hon. John H. Harney, the editor of the leading democratic newspaper in the Commonwealth; Dr. R. C. Palmer, at present an honored citizen of my own town, and others equally distinguished for their abilities and their patriotism, addressed a communication to Hon. Charles A. Wickliffe, on the 13th of June following, requesting him to become a candidate for the office of governor.

Every one of these gentlemen, sir, had been from the very beginning of the unfortunate strife between the two sections of our country among the very ablest and outspoken advocates and defenders of the cause of the Union. But lest there should be a doubt in the mind of any gentleman of their sentiments and opinions in that particular, I will read them as they are truly and pointedly expressed in a single brief paragraph in the communication to which I have referred. They say:

> We hold this rebellion utterly unjustifiable in its inception, and the dissolution of the Union the greatest of calamities. We would see all just and constitutional means adopted for the suppression of the one and the restoration of the other.

Of Governor Wickliffe, sir, it is perhaps unnecessary that I should say a single word in a presence like this. His name is historic. It is inscribed in imperishable characters alike upon the annals of his State and his country. During a long life of singular usefulness and honor, devoted almost entirely to the public service, many years of which he spent as a distinguished member of this House, occupying the seat I now have the honor to fill, he never occupied a position from that of representative in the Legislature of his native Commonwealth to that of Cabinet minister that he did not most signally adorn; and I trust it will not be indelicate in me to add that an abler statesman, a purer patriot, a truer, stancher friend to the Union of these States, or a nobler man, never breathed the vital air of heaven.

Yielding to the call which had thus been made upon him he announced himself as a candidate for governor of Kentucky, with other gentlemen, equally loyal with himself, filling the subordinate positions on the ticket; but it seems to have been predetermined that neither they nor any other candidate claiming to be a democrat, however devoted to the Union he might be, should be permitted to receive the untrammeled suffrages of the people of that State for any office or position of public trust whatever; and as an evidence of that predetermination on the part of the military authorities of the United States I will first read an extract from an order issued by General A. E. BURNSIDE, then in command of the military department embracing the State of Kentucky, dated July 31, 1863. It is as follows:

> As it is not the intention of the commanding general to interfere with the proper expression of public opinion, all discretion in the conduct of the election will be, as usual, in the hands of the legally appointed judges at the polls, who will be held strictly responsible that no disloyal person will be allowed to vote, and to this end the military power is ordered to give them its utmost support.

Sir, I will not pause here to comment upon this order in the terms it so richly deserves. I will leave it to the intelligent, dispassionate judgment of a liberty-loving people, irrespective of party, to determine the freedom of a "discretion" which was to be held "strictly responsible" to a military commission perhaps, if not exercised according to the arbitrary and licentious will of the "general commanding." I will not even characterize it as the most atrocious outrage ever perpetrated upon the freedom of election since the organization of republican governments among men, for I have before me the orders of other eminent military chieftains, high in command of the Army of our country, which prevented even "the legally appointed judges" from conducting the election and recording the votes of qualified electors according to the laws of my State; nay, more, which went so far as to prevent the proper authorities from appointing such judges of the election as the statutes of the Commonwealth required, and permitted no one to present himself as a candidate for any office whatever unless his political views conformed to those of the dominant party or the officer in command. On the 15th of July, Major-General Hurlbut, in command of the Sixteenth Army Corps, issued special orders, which was enforced throughout the first congressional district of Kentucky, at present represented by my friend [Mr. TURNER,] and enforced, too, in a manner that should thrill the bosom of every reflecting patriot with unutterable horror, as I will presently show:

> HEADQUARTERS SIXTEENTH ARMY CORPS,
> Memphis, Tennessee, July, 1863.
> In so much of the State of Kentucky as is within the district of Columbus it is ordered:
> 1. That no person be permitted to be a candidate for office who is not avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion.
> 2. That no person shall exercise the privilege of an elector and vote at said elections who is not avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion.
> 3. The military authorities in said district of Columbus shall see to it that this order be carried out. Judges of election will be governed by the principles herein set forth, and will demand evidence upon oaths in such cases as may be in doubt, and allow no person to exercise the franchise of voting who does not take the oath required.
> By order of Major-General S. A. Hurlbut.
> HENRY DINSMORE,
> Assistant Adjutant-General.

In order to place the meaning of the foregoing special order beyond all possible doubt, Brigadier-General Asboth, who had taken lessons in free government from the despotisms of Europe, issued an order dated at his headquarters, Columbus, Kentucky, July 29, 1863, which I will read:

> That no further doubt may exist as to the intents and meaning of special order No. 159, dated headquarters Sixteenth Army Corps, July 14, 1863, it is ordered that no person shall be permitted to be voted for or be a candidate for office who has been or is now under arrest or bonds by proper authority for uttering disloyal language or sentiments.

County judges within this district are hereby ordered to appoint as judges and clerks of the ensuing August elections only such persons as are avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion, and are further ordered to revoke and recall any appointment of judges and clerks already made who are not such loyal persons.

Judges and clerks of elections are hereby ordered not to place the name of any person upon the poll-books to be voted for at said election who is not avowedly and unconditionally for the Union and the suppression of the rebellion, or who may be opposed to furnishing men and money for the suppression of the rebellion.

Let it not be supposed, sir, that this order, atrocious as it is, stands without a parallel in the annals of that melancholy period in our history. I have before me similar orders issued by a certain Lieutenant-Colonel Johnson, whose name became a synonym of infamy in the estimation of respectable people of all parties in Kentucky long before the conclusion of the war; and also one issued by General Shackleford, who was in command of the United States forces at Russellville.

In pursuance of these orders, sir, county judges were required to violate the statutes of Kentucky, which required the officers of elections to be selected equally from the opposing political parties in the State, and troops with fixed bayonets were paraded at nearly every voting place throughout the Commonwealth, in order to see that no one should be voted for as a candidate, or exercise the elective franchise unless his political sentiments should fit the Procrustean bed laid down by the military authorities of the United States.

Mr. TUCKER. When was that?

Mr. KNOTT. In 1863, sir; after Morgan's cavalry had been pursued into Ohio and captured. When Kentucky had over fifty thousand volunteers in the Union Army, and when, I sincerely believe, there were not a hundred armed confederates within the entire limits of the State. I should remark also, sir, that these orders were issued and enforced without any demand by the governor or Legislature of the State upon the Federal authorities for assistance to repel invasion, suppress domestic violence, "keep the peace at the polls," or for any other purpose whatever."

A few instances will suffice to show, sir, how these orders were enforced, and the results of armed interference at the polls. In many places in various portions of the State the names of Governor Wickliffe and other democratic candidates upon the State and local tickets were stricken from the poll-books by order of the military officer in command of the troops present at the polls to keep the peace and give the officers of the election "their utmost support" in stifling the voice of the elector. Thousands were turned away from the ballot-box on the pretext of disloyalty, while thousands of others were kept away from it entirely under the terrors of military arrest and imprisonment, and the election officers compelled, under a like menace, simply to register the edict of a military despotism which they were powerless to resist and dare not disobey.

In the first congressional district, now represented by my friend and colleague, [Mr. TURNER,] Hon. Lawrence S. Trimble was the democratic candidate for a seat on this floor in opposition to one Lucien Anderson, who claimed to be "an unconditional Union man." Mr. Trimble had formerly served with distinction upon the circuit bench of the State. He was among the earliest, ablest, and most consistent advocates of the Union cause in the Commonwealth. He has been thrice elected to represent that district in this branch of the Federal Congress, and in the Fortieth Congress his loyalty was vindicated upon a square issue, fully investigated by a House overwhelmingly republican in politics, although at all times, before and since, a sterling, unflinching, unwavering democrat. Yet, sir, he was arrested by military authority and carried to a prison beyond the limits of his district, where he was kept until after the election, when he was released without trial and without accusation. True, sir, he was offered his liberty on condition that he would decline his candidacy and withdraw from the canvass; but I thank God he spurned the insulting proposal as a genuine Kentuckian will always spurn such indignity and outrage.

Mr. Martin, who had represented the counties of Lyon and Livingston in the State Legislature, who had always been a "Union man" though a democrat of the strictest sect, and who had periled his life for the cause of the Government in piloting the first Federal gunboat that ever ascended the Cumberland River, was also arrested and carried off to a military prison where he was detained until after the election for no other reason than that he was a democratic candidate for re-election to the seat he had already occupied in the lower house of the General Assembly.

Colonel John H. McHenry, who commanded a regiment in the Federal Army, who was among the first, and the bravest who left the endearments of home, and rushed to the red field of war in defense of his country's flag, and who bore himself on many a stricken field as a hero worthy of the blood that coursed through his veins, was a candidate for Congress in the second district now so ably represented by my colleague, [Mr. MCKENZIE.] Yet, as was the case with Governor Wickliffe, Judge Trimble, Mr. Martin, and other democratic candidates in various parts of the State, his name was in many places stricken from the poll-books, in others "Union men" were prohibited at the point of the bayonet from casting their suffrages for him, while hundreds of his democratic friends dared not to attempt the exercise of the constitutional franchise in his behalf, for fear of the menacing discipline of the guard-house or the millitary prison. And all, sir, because he was a democrat, and a defender of the Constitution of his country.

In order to show, sir, from record evidence how the election was conducted in my own district under this régime, I beg leave to call attention to the following documents. The first is a certificate signed by Moses D. Leeson, captain of Company B, Fifth Indiana Cavalry, who commanded a company at the polls in a precinct in Nelson County. It reads:

I, Moses D. Leeson, captain commanding Company B, Fifth Indiana Cavalry, hereby certify that under the orders and instructions of Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas H. Butler, commanding Fifth Indiana Cavalry, I ordered the polls to be opened by the regularly appointed judges, sheriff, and clerk, namely, W. R. Livers, T. C. Warren, Thomas Coron, and R. E. Harrele, and permitted no other candidates' names to appear on the poll-books but the following: For governor, Thomas E. Bramlette; for lieutenant-governor, R. T. Jacob; for attorney-general, John M. Harlan; for State treasurer, James Ganard; for auditor, W. T. Samuels; for register of land office, James A. Davidson; for superintendent of public instruction, Stevenson; for Congress, Aaron Harding; for Legislature, Dr. W. Elliott; for county attorney, G. W. Hite; for county clerk, W. T. Spalding and William M. Powell.

MOSES D. LEESON,
Captain commanding Company B, Fifth Indiana Cavalry.

And here, sir, are two others showing what was done in the county of Breckinridge:

We the undersigned do hereby certify, as officers of precinct No. 2 at Cloverport, Kentucky, that, after opening the polls, Captain Hernbrook, by authority from General Shackelford, ordered us to strike off the entire Wickliffe ticket, and also Milton Board's name from the poll-book; which was accordingly done in obedience to said order.

WILLIAM B. JONES,
WILLIAM S. ALLEN,
Judges.

Attest:

J. C. HEST, Clerk,
J. R. ALLEN, Sheriff.

Again, sir, Sergeant Brown tells the story for the Forks of Rough, in the same county, as follows:

FORKS OF ROUGH, August 3, 1863.

I do certify that at Rough Creek Spring precinct, district No. 4, there was a poll open for C. A. Wickliffe and others, forming a democratic ticket, and for State officers; that I suppressed the same by order of General Shackelford between seven and eight o'clock a. m.

WILLIAM BROWN,
Sergeant in Command.

It is needless to add, Mr. Chairman, that under such auspices as these the elections in Kentucky in 1863 amounted to nothing more than the mere registration of the edicts of military authority, nor is it necessary that I should multiply evidences such as I have already adduced in order to show the danger and impropriety of permitting the presence or interference of the armed forces of the United States at the polls under the pretext of keeping the peace, or for any other purpose whatever. If what I have already shown is not sufficient to thrill the bosom of every thinking, patriotic American citizen with indignation and horror, I confess I am at a loss to conceive what possible condition of circumstances could excite their solicitude for the safety of their liberties or the perpetuity of their republican institutions.

But fortunately, sir, for the State, fortunately for the country, fortunately for the cause of human freedom everywhere, Kentucky was represented in the other end of this Capitol during the dark days of which I have been speaking by her honored and illustrious son, the lamented Lazarus W. Powell. When that sterling patriot, that sagacious statesman, that undaunted champion of popular liberty, saw the atrocious outrages against free elections which were perpetrated in his own State under the auspices of the military power of the Federal Government, he determined at once to prevent, if possible, the recurrence of such scenes by congressional enactment under the sanction of appropriate penalties. Accordingly, at the very earliest opportunity that presented itself after the opening of the ensuing session of Congress, he introduced a bill for that purpose. And this brings me back, sir, to the statements of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which I will ask the House to examine side by side with the record, which was open before them when they addressed the House.

If gentlemen will turn to page 101 of volume 50 of the Congressional Globe they will find the bill, No. 37, word for word as it was introduced by Mr. Powell, but so far from finding in that bill the clause which it is now proposed to repeal they will discover that it does not contain one single word or syllable with reference to keeping the peace at the polls; not a syllable, sir. It is true that the bill was, against the earnest protest of Mr. Powell, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and it is also true that the Committee on Military Affairs returned it to the Senate with an adverse report which the impartial patriots of coming generations will perhaps regard as one of the darkest stains upon the annals of the American Congress. But, sir, undaunted by a single reverse, Mr. Powell, notwithstanding the adverse report of the committee, continued day after day, and week after week, earnestly and persistently urging the consideration of the bill until finally the Senate, at the request of Senator Trumbull, consented to take it up, whereupon Mr. Powell proposed to amend it by adding the words, "unless it shall be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States." Still not a syllable about keeping the peace.

But now, sir, I will read directly from the record, on page 3159, volume 53, Congressional Globe:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment inserting after the word "America," in line 9 of the first section, the words "unless it shall be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States."

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to amend that amendment by adding to it "or to keep the peace at the polls."

Mr. POWELL. I object to that. It would destroy the effect of the bill. The State authorities can keep the peace at the polls.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is the very pretext on which the outrages were committed in my State, and it is the very pretext that will be put forward again.

Does this look like there is any ground for an insinuation that Senator Powell was the author or approved in the slightest degree of the obnoxious clause which we now seek to strike from the statute-books? But again, sir, on the next page we find that on Mr. Pomeroy's amendment proposing to add the words "or to keep the peace at the polls" the yeas and nays were called, and Mr. Powell and every other democratic Senator present voted against it. The record says:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Pomeroy] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Foot, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wade—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Foster, Hale, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, McDougall, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Willey, and Wilson—15.

So the amendment prevailed, every democratic Senator voting against it; and the question recurring upon the passage of the bill as amended, Mr. McDougall, a democratic Senator, moved to postpone the bill indefinitely; whereupon Mr. Powell said:

I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion.

Mr. MCDOUGALL. Very well; if the Senator wishes to press the bill in its present shape, I withdraw the motion.

The ayes and noes were then taken on the passage of the bill as amended, and every democratic Senator voted in the affirmative. They voted for it, as I presume I would have done had I been in their place, as a step at least in the direction of security to human rights and human liberty.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me to remind him? Did not Mr. Powell and every other democratic Senator vote at that time for Mr. Powell's amendment thus amended by the proposition of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. KNOTT. Whether they did or not I do not know. The yeas and nays were not called upon that question.

Mr. WHITE. Does not the record show it was unanimously supported by all the Senators?

Mr. KNOTT. The record shows no such thing.

Mr. WHITE. Does not the parliamentary presumption arise——

Mr. KNOTT. Oh, the gentleman may presume whatever he pleases.

Mr. WHITE. Does not the parliamentary presumption arise that when the yeas and nays are not called on an amendment which is adopted every Senator votes for it?

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman can indulge whatever presumption he pleases and I can indulge mine.

Mr. WHITE. I am not indulging any presumptions. I want legislative facts.

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman asserted in his speech in emphatic terms that Mr. Powell and other democratic Senators voted for this amendment which incorporated these words into the statutes. I have shown by the record that they did nothing of the kind.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me to explain?

Mr. KNOTT. I do not desire to yield further to this interruption.

Mr. WHITE. I do not want to be misrepresented. The gentleman's statement of what I said is not correct. I did not say that. I said that Mr. Powell voted for the amendment as amended.

Mr. KNOTT. How do you know that?

Mr. WHITE. Because the record says that it was unanimously passed by the Senate.

Mr. KNOTT. I say the record does not show how the Senators voted.

Mr. WHITE. It shows that there was not a yea-and-nay vote, and therefore there were no noes against it.

Mr. KNOTT. That is a quibble.

Mr. WHITE. It is not a quibble.

Mr. KNOTT. As I have said, the gentleman may indulge whatever presumption he pleases, and I can indulge mine.

Now, sir, when the bill came over to the House it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, from which it was reported back by the chairman, Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, and passed under the operation of the previous question, so that no democratic member had an opportunity to amend it even had he desired to do so. They all voted for it, actuated, I presume, by the same motive I ascribed to the democrats who supported it, the desire to accomplish something at least in favor of free elections and the non-interference of the military at the polls. There, sir, is the whole history of the passage of the law and the manner in which the objectionable words came to be inserted in it, and I leave the House and the country to determine the value of any insinuation or statement that their insertion was ever, under any circumstances, a democratic measure, or favored by any democrat in either branch of the Thirty-seventh Congress.

Sir, Kentucky is justly proud of her Clay and her Crittenden, her Wickliffes, her Hardins, her Breckinridges, her Marshalls, and others of her distinguished sons, whose fame is a part of the history and the heritage of our common country; but in that long line of illustrious names which constitute the brightest jewels in her diadem of glory none sheds more luster upon her maternal brow than that of Lazarus W. Powell, and if every other act of his long and useful career could be erased forever from the memory of his grateful and admiring countrymen, the gallant, persistent, patriotic fight he made in the other end of this Capitol for the protection of the ballot-box from military interference would alone secure for him in the affections of the lovers of human liberty everywhere a memorial as enduring as the everlasting hills. He is dead and gone, sir. "After life's fitful fever he sleeps well."

> But little he'll reck if they let him sleep on
> In the grave where his people have laid him.

But when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] and others of his party "come to dump their little dirt-carts" upon his moldering ashes, I ask them to at least remember that the only accusation his most malignant foe could bring against him, and the one which they would now insinuate, was spurned and repudiated by an overwhelming majority in a republican Senate, and that, too, when the "still small voice" of justice was almost stifled by the partisan passion and prejudice which ruled the hour.

But, sir, to return to the question. It is now proposed to strike this dangerous and objectionable clause from the law upon which it was ingrafted against the vote and the protest of Senator Powell and his democratic associates in the Thirty-seventh Congress. And why, sir? First, because, as I said awhile ago, it is in violation of the Constitution and purports to authorize the use of the United States for purposes and under circumstances not contemplated in that instrument.

It is true, sir, that the argument upon this point has been gone into somewhat elaborately, yet there are, in my judgment, some reasons which seem to be conclusive of the question, but which I have not yet heard suggested, and as they may be embraced in a nutshell I trust I shall be pardoned for stating them. It will not be denied that before the adoption of the present Constitution the power to preserve the peace within their respective limits belonged exclusively to the several States, to be exercised under their own laws and through their own agencies. It is also true that when the Constitution was submitted to the several States for their ratification, it was discovered that a number of amendments were necessary in order more effectually to protect the rights of the individual and to preserve the autonomy of the States themselves. Among the most striking and important of those amendments was the tenth, by which it was provided that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the people were reserved to the States respectively or to the people. That provision stands to-day the chief bulwark of the several States against Federal aggression or any unwarranted interference with their domestic concerns by the General Government.

Now, the power and the duty to keep the peace within their respective borders is certainly not prohibited to the several States, and the question therefore presents itself, whether that power is anywhere delegated to or that duty is anywhere imposed upon the Federal Government, and, if so, to what extent and under what circumstances. Referring, therefore, to the text of the Constitution, I have been able to find but two clauses which to my mind can be of any service in the solution of the question. The first is the fourth section of the fourth article, which authorizes and in fact makes it the duty of the General Government to protect each State against domestic violence on the application of the Legislature, or of the governor in case the Legislature cannot be convened.

But it will be observed, sir, that the power to intervene even to protect a State against domestic violence is conferred upon and can only be exercised by the General Government under certain conditions, and even when these conditions exist it can only exercise that power in pursuance of the laws which Congress is authorized to enact by the other constitutional provision to which I have alluded, namely, the last clause of the eighth section of article 1. Unless those conditions exist, therefore, that is, unless an application is made by the Legislature, or the governor when the Legislature cannot be convened, it is evident that the Government of the United States has no more authority to assume to keep the peace in any State either at the polls or elsewhere, either through the instrumentality of its Army or its Navy or its marshals or any other agency, than it has to interfere in the administration of the municipal laws of any other country on earth.

It is claimed on the other side, however, that although it may be unconstitutional, yet the clause in question is harmless; but, sir, it cannot be harmless if it is unconstitutional. It may never be enforced, it is true, though in the light of the past we cannot promise ourselves any such immunity from its baneful consequences. On the contrary, we may expect to see it resorted to, as it has been repeatedly, for the very purpose of subverting the will of the people and defrauding them of their free choice. But grant that it will not be enforced, still

> 'Twill be recorded for a precedent;
> And many an error, by the same example,
> Will rush into the state—until finally our whole fabric of constitutional government will topple into ruin. It may be the first, almost imperceptible leak in the embankment, which, gradually widening, will ultimately become the crevasse through which will pour a deluge of usurped military authority to destroy the liberties of the people forever.

Sir, the history of our race is full of examples warning us of the danger of permitting the ballot-box to be approached by the military, and our ancestry, from the days of Edward the First, have exhibited a most commendable wisdom in precautions they have taken to guard their elections from the destructive consequences of any such contaminating influences. The statute of George the Second, which I read awhile ago, was enacted not to establish a new rule, but to make prominent a principle of law which had been in force for five hundred years and to give efficacy by prescribing a proper penalty for its violation, and all, sir, because at the election of Scottish peers, in 1784, a battalion of the king's troops was drawn up in the court of Edinburgh contrary to custom, and with no other apparent reason but for the purpose of overawing the electors. But were all other human history silent upon the subject the few facts I have exhibited, drawn from the experience of my own State in 1863, furnish an argument against allowing the presence of troops at the polls for any purpose whatever which no amount of sophistry can countervail, and no mere vociferous declamation can overturn.

But, Mr. Chairman, objection is made to the method which the majority in this House has thought it proper to pursue in order to effect the repeal of this dangerous and unconstitutional provision in our statutes—the more dangerous because it is unconstitutional—and our action in that regard has been repeatedly characterized on the other side as revolutionary and wrong. As to that matter it is sufficient to say that there is nothing in the method we have adopted prohibited either by the Constitution or the rules of the House. It is a method which has not only been repeatedly resorted to in this House, but has always been claimed as the right of the House of Commons in England, after which this House was modeled. Sir, the right to tack bills for the redress of grievances upon money bills, which can originate only in the House of Commons, was not only the means which in the first instance secured to that House the privilege of participating in the general legislation of the kingdom, but the means by which it has achieved its greatest triumphs in favor of the liberty of the subject. I ask leave here to refer the House to a paragraph or two in De Lolme's admirable treatise on the constitution of England, which places this matter in a clearer light than I could possibly hope to do myself. He says:

> And indeed we see that since the establishment of this right of the representatives of the people to grant or refuse subsidies to the Crown, their other privileges have been continually increasing. Though these representatives were not in the beginning admitted into Parliament but upon the most disadvantageous terms, yet they soon found means by joining petitions to their money bills to have a share in framing those laws by which they were in future to be governed; and this method of proceeding, which at first was only tolerated by the king, they afterward converted into an express right by declaring, under Henry the Fourth, that they would not thenceforward come to any resolutions with regard to subsidies before the king had given a precise answer to their petitions.
> In subsequent times we see the Commons constantly successful, by their exertions of the same privilege, in their endeavors to lop off the despotic powers which still made a part of the regal prerogative. Whenever abuses of power had taken place, which they were seriously determined to correct, they made grievances and supplies (to use the expression of Sir Thomas Wentworth) go hand in hand together, which always produced the redress of them. And in general, when a bill in consequence of its being judged by the Commons essential to the public welfare has been joined by them to a money bill, it has seldom failed to pass in that agreeable company.

Yet, sir, this proceeding, which all admit is perfectly within the constitutional powers of this House, and in accordance with numerous precedents, not only here but in the popular branch of the British Parliament, is wildly denounced as revolutionary, notwithstanding it does not in the slightest degree alter or affect the constitutional powers or duties of any department of the Government whatever. I will simply add, sir, with all proper deference to gentlemen on the other side who seem to have delighted in indulging it, that this empty iteration of revolution is to my mind too baldly absurd to be ridiculous, and nothing in my judgment could possibly be more contemptible than the coward who could be influenced by it.

But, sir, it is claimed that this provision should be permitted to remain in the statutes in order to secure the purity of our elections; and I will not question the sincerity of those who profess to believe that it is essential to that most desirable end; but I will say to them, here and now, that until they can point to one single expedient, either forcible or fraudulent, to which their party has not repeatedly resorted to destroy the purity of elections and defeat the popular will, the people of this country will be slow to believe that they will not use this for the same nefarious purpose.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to my distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] that I have the same devout belief in the existence of a divinity which shapes the destinies of nations as well as of individuals that he himself professes, and I have an abiding faith that the same Divine Being who led His chosen people through all the vicissitudes of their forty years of dreary prilgrimage will so order the affairs of this country that the democratic party will indeed "capture the Capitol." But I beg him and his friends to dismiss those dark forebodings which seem to weigh upon their excited imaginations. I can assure him that there will be no general sack and pillage when that consummation so devoutly to be wished shall have been accomplished.

The democracy will "capture the Capitol," but when they plant their banner upon its Dome he will find emblazoned on its ample folds as they float out upon the breeze the golden legend formulated by the hand of the illustrious Jefferson, "Equal and exact justice to all men, exclusive privileges to none." Yes, sir, the democracy will "capture the Capitol," and they intend when they do so to restore this great Government to its original purity, to strip from the limbs of this great people the "shackles of usurped control and hew them link from link." They intend that the ballot-box, the palladium of free government and popular liberty, shall be free from the contaminations of force and fraud, and that the military shall at all times and under all circumstances be subordinate to the civil power. They intend that the ancient trial by jury, the birthright of the American freeman, shall be preserved in all its purity, integrity, and efficacy. They intend that there shall be "the strictest economy in the public expenditures that labor may be lightly burdened." They intend that there shall be "a rigid arraignment of all abuses of power and public trust in the established tribunals of justice as well as before the great bar of public opinion," and that the ringmasters, peculators, and plunderers who infest the Government shall be scourged from their places, as the Saviour of mankind scourged the money-changers from the temple. They intend that the autonomy of the several States shall be preserved, "with all their rights, dignity, and equality unimpaired," as the safest administrators of our domestic concerns and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies. They intend that the supremacy of the General Government within its legitimate limitations shall be sedulously maintained, and every orb in our splendid constellation of coequal sovereignties move onward in its own appointed path with the harmony and precision that marked the music of the spheres "when the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy."

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree altogether with those gentlemen who have intimated that the provisions of the United States Constitution in relation to the Army and Navy, and to the President of the United States as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, are self-executing. I believe that when the Constitution of the United States was adopted it created out of the colonies or the original States a nation to be governed by law. It established the Congress of the United States as the legislative body, for the purpose of making laws and carrying into execution all the powers, principles, and purposes of the Constitution as designed by its framers.

And I do not believe that the President of the United States has the right, under that clause of the Constitution which declares that the Government of the United States shall guarantee to each State a republican form of government, to take the authority into his hands for the purpose of making and maintaining peace at the polls. I do not believe that under any provision of the Constitution the President of the United States can use the Army for the purpose of any police power, either at the polls or elsewhere, without the authority of congressional enactment, except perhaps in the one single instance where the executive of a State or the Legislature of a State shall call upon the President for troops with which to suppress insurrection or to repel invasion. And even then, in the view I take of the Constitution and of the powers vested in the President of the United States by its provisions, the Congress of the United States has power and authority, under the express letter of the Constitution, to prescribe the manner and the methods and the means by which such requisitions shall be answered and responded to by the President of the United States.

My reasons for this view of the Constitution grow out of the provisions of the instrument itself. The eighth clause of the first article declares that among other enumerated powers of Congress "it shall have power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." This is one of the enumerated powers of the Congress of the United States. The last clause of the same article declares that "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

I therefore maintain that under the Constitution the Army can be used by the President of the United States only as prescribed by law, and under such laws and regulations as Congress may make for that purpose, and I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that it was under this view that Congress, when the law now proposed to be repealed was enacted, in accordance with these provisions of the Constitution of the United States, did enact the identical laws that are now proposed to be repealed by these amendments, attached as they are to appropriation bills.

To my mind the question does not arise in this debate as to the policy or impolicy of the law at the time it was enacted. It is unnecessary for us to stand here debating whether the gentlemen then constituting the Congress of the United States did right or did wrong. The question is, and that which we are to vote upon on our oath and our duty as Representatives on this floor, whether there is any necessity or reason for this law remaining and standing where it is to-day. To that question, whether it shall be retained or whether it shall be wiped out, I propose to devote what time I shall occupy in discussing the question on this occasion.

We all know, every gentleman upon this floor knows, that at the conclusion of that unfortunate war through which we have all passed disturbing elements appeared in various sections of the country—perhaps confined to no particular section or locality North or South, with the exception that under the processes of reconstruction as they were hurriedly carried on these disturbing elements proved themselves strongest where the democratic party was the strongest, and especially did these disturbing elements prove themselves strongest wherever there was a large number of colored voters adhering to republican principles and where a large proportion of the white population were against them. I will not stop in this connection to say whether democrats or republicans enacted this law. It is immaterial either to a statesman or a patriot who enacted it, but in the processes of reconstruction, when these disturbing elements appeared and interfered with that free ballot which every American citizen under the Constitution of this country is of right entitled to, it was a republican administration that for the first time found it necessary to enforce this law that was then found standing upon the statute-books of the nation.

And, Mr. Chairman, when this law was enforced (as I trust in God the time will come when it will be enforced again) we had fair elections in the South. I undertake to say that the only fair elections that have ever been held in many of the Southern States since reconstruction, were when the President of the United States saw proper to give protection to all classes of people under the provisions of this law that they might go freely to the ballot-box and vote and none dare to molest or make them afraid.

I desire to ask (I appeal to the other side of the House) what harm can these laws do, what harm have they done? When has a Federal soldier in all the South ever interfered with the freedom of the ballot-box or prevented a democrat from voting? Born and raised in the South, having lived in the South all the days of my life, representing a southern constituency as I now do upon this floor, all my sympathies and affinities being tinged with a degree of preference for the people among whom I have thus lived, I have for years, as gentlemen on the other side of the House of different political opinions well know, anxiously awaited the day and the hour when these laws and all other laws making any distinction on account of politics between the people of this great country should be wiped from the statute-books. When the President of the United States inaugurated his policy of conciliation, when he withdrew the troops from the South, when he commenced that policy of civil-service reform in which political distinctions were no longer to be recognized, I fondly trusted, and I believe men all over this country trusted that the era of good feeling was rapidly approaching, when "the lion and the lamb should lie down together," and we should all "shake hands across the bloody chasm" and be friends forever. I expected "peace like a river" to spread over the South. But in this I was mistaken. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, in this connection, that if the reasonable expectations of the President and his friends had been realized, if his policy of conciliation had been met half way, if his overtures to the South had been responded to by peace instead of riot and bloodshed, I declare here in my place to-day that I would have been found standing here lifting my voice, casting my vote, not only to repeal these laws, but to wipe out and obliterate every conceivable character of political distinction on account of the rebellion. This Government is great enough to be magnanimous to all, and its loyal citizens and their Representatives can afford to forgive all who prove true to the Constitution and laws.

But, sir, how has this effort at conciliation been met? I appeal to this House to say how has it been met? Why, another gentleman in illustrating another point on this floor on a former day enforced his argument by a thought that will enforce the idea I desire to present to the House on this occasion, and I adopt it. I call the attention of the House and the country, and of every element that desired conciliation and peace in this country, to the fact that when the President of the United States was offering peace and reconciliation, offering to meet the democratic party in the South, shake hands with them and have peace—when "he has asked for bread they have given him a stone; when he has asked for a fish they have given him a serpent;" when he has plead for peace, the response has been riot and bloodshed.

Why, Mr. Chairman, unless all human testimony is to be disbelieved, unless the current history of the times written in blood in many parts of the South is to be discarded and go for naught, unless the sworn testimony of the best men of the country is that of perjured wretches and rascals, instead of peace and conciliation, rifle clubs, red shirts, bulldozers, White Leagues and the like have taken possession of the ballot-box and controlled the elections in many localities in the South, instead of giving that protection which was reasonably expected under the policy of the President of the United States.

Why, Mr. Chairman, ten years ago—I want to emphasize this before this House—ten years ago the South was republican. She sent republican Representatives to represent her interests. To-day, under a fair election and an honest count, a majority of the States of the South are republican, as every man of intelligence knows. [Applause.] But what has been the result? Where are these republican Representatives, and how do we account for their absence from this floor to-day? Why, under a false and sickly notion, the democratic party attempted to educate the people of the North to the idea that there were no republicans in the South but the negroes, and carpet-baggers, and scalawags. It was said in this debate yesterday, or the day before, that a certain oath could not be taken by the decent people of the South in one instance, I believe, out of every thousand. Well, the gentleman who made that statement does not live in my part of the country. In the part of the country where I live the people are as loyal and devoted to this Union as in Massachusetts herself.

I should dislike to live in a country or State, or a part of the country, where not one in a thousand could swear they had been loyal to the government under whose protection they had been born and bred. But I say, under this false education, (and the gentlemen on the other side very well understand how they have manufactured it and wrought it up,) as an offshoot of that false theory which was sent forth in regard to the people of the South, we had the Greeley campaign. Under this notion, (I want to call the attention of northern Representatives to this thought,) under this idea that the wealth, intelligence, and respectability of the South were all in opposition to the republican party, even the loyal North almost went back on the republicans of the South; and in 1875, I believe it was, under bad advice the hero of the war made a mistake. General Grant, under the advice of his Attorney-General, refused to protect the republicans of the State of Mississippi, and the result was that the rifle clubs succeeded. Having succeeded in Mississippi, they spread over and subverted the republican party all over the South, and that accounts for the absence of republicans from the South in this Hall to-day.

And to-day, under these influences, under a power more hateful and odious than all the bayonets of the land, the semi-civil and military organizations of the South have overturned the rights of the people, until to-day, as was said the other day, not a single colored man remains a Representative upon this floor. When I look around me I see, Mr. Chairman, but three republicans from the seceded States of the South. That is the logical result of the policy commenced in the State of Mississippi, where it should have been checked under these laws at the time, but where it was allowed to spread over the South and invade the rights of the people.

And I desire to say in my place here, Mr. Chairman, as a Representative, that for one—others may place their opposition to this repeal upon whatever ground they please—but for one, my opposition to the amendments put upon these appropriation bills to repeal the laws referred to I place upon the broad ground of the merits of these laws and the injustice of their repeal. If permitted to stand, and the President of the United States will enforce them, we will have fair elections and republicans will be returned to Congress by the voice of the free people undriven by "bulldozers" and other organizations. [Applause on the republican side.]

I want to say for one that others may do as they please, but never while I have a seat and a vote upon this floor will I vote to repeal these statutes until every man in the South, whether white or black, whether carpet-bagger from the North or so-called scalawag from the South, has a free and untrammeled and a fair, equal chance at the ballot-box. [Applause on the republican side.] I want it distinctly understood, Mr. Chairman, we do not need any of this election machinery in my district. Not a bit of it. The republicans of the second district of Tennessee are capable of taking care of themselves, and I would hold my seat on this floor if every colored man in that district had been polled for my competitor. Further south, however, where I concede the great majority of the white people went into this democratic rebellion because it was only the democratic party on horseback that wielded artillery and small arms during the war——

Mr. McMILLIN. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. HOUK. I promised to give a portion of my time to another gentleman, and while I should like to answer my colleague's question, I cannot do it. He will have a full and fair chance, and I had a terrible struggle to get the floor.

Mr. McMILLIN asked a question which Mr. HOUK did not hear and therefore did not answer.

Mr. HOUK. I cannot yield, or I would yield to you cheerfully and cheer you every time you said a good thing. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. So I will cheer the gentleman when he says a good thing

Mr. HOUK. I decline to yield, but thank the gentleman for his promised compliment, though I fear it will result like other promises made by democrats—I fear he will "dodge the responsibility" of complimenting a republican.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that we do not need this election machinery in my district.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman indicated that he would give half of his time to the gentleman from New Jersey, and he has now spoken for thirty minutes.

Mr. ROBESON. I prefer the gentleman from Tennessee should proceed until he has closed.

Mr. HOUK. I will soon close, as I wish to accommodate my friend from New Jersey, but I have two or three things further which I desire to say. [Cries of "Go on!"] I was about saying, and I believe I did say, that we do not need this election machinery in my district, but every intelligent gentleman of the House and the country very well knows there are districts in the South where the republican party is composed, a large majority of it, of that class of persons who were held in democratic bondage for more than two hundred years, and they are timid and easily driven from the polls. For the purpose of restoring freedom at the ballot-box to these people in the Southern States, and in the Northern States if it be needed, I shall stand here and continue, day by day and time after time, voting against the repeal of these measures which, when "wiped out," will give an opportunity to carry the elections by the favored democratic methods which we all understand.

But these people, not content with the fraud of force, resorted to "tissue ballots" in order to increase democratic majorities in the South. We have one man in the Tennessee penitentiary now for stuffing ballot-boxes, and others ought to be there. [Laughter.] He was a democrat, and he stuffed the ballot-boxes in the interest of a democrat. [Laughter.]

But, sir, they tell us these laws are unconstitutional. Well, perhaps I am too young a man to claim to be a great constitutional lawyer, but I never saw a democrat in my life who did not understand the Constitution, whether he could read it or not. [Laughter and applause on the republican side.] They tell us these laws should be "wiped out" because they are unconstitutional. Go back, sir, in your recollection to 1861. Did they not tell us it was unconstitutional for Abraham Lincoln to put down the rebellion? Did they not tell us it was not constitutional to call out the troops to preserve the flag and the country? The same cry is now raised that these laws are unconstitutional.

I had intended to reply to one gentleman from Ohio, but my time is running out. [Cries of "Go on!"] The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. HURD, I believe it was, said:

> Have gentlemen who have considered this question read recently section 2, article 1, of the Constitution, which declares that the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualification requisite for an elector of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature?

The gentleman, I am told, is a good lawyer. He read this clause from the Constitution, and then, with an air of triumph, added:

> It is the most numerous branch of the State Legislature that determines the qualifications of electors, and not the Constitution of the United States.

Why, my dear sir, if it is not the Constitution of the United States that determines the qualification what did you read the Constitution of the United States for in order to support your proposition? [Laughter and applause on the republican side.] Is it the most numerous branch of the State Legislature that qualifies and determines an elector? Not at all; but the Constitution of the United States, by the voluntary act of its framers, selects the elector for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature as a standard by which to prescribe the qualification of electors for the House of Representatives. The State has nothing to do with it; the State constitutions have nothing to do with it; the Legislatures of the States have nothing to do with it. It all reaches back and centers and grounds itself in the Constitution of the United States, and from that it is impossible for you to get away.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that every lawyer on this floor must come to this conclusion, and I am satisfied that the gentleman himself, after he cooled down and got to thinking about the Constitution and its powers, had come to the conclusion that every legal mind must come to, that his position is illegal, illogical, and absurd. But I have not time to pursue this thought.

Now, again, Mr. Chairman, as in 1861-'5, the democracy must rule or the Government is to be wrecked. When the people voted—and I tell my democratic friends that I do not claim this as original—when the people voted a want of confidence in the democratic party and decided to transfer the administration of the Government to other hands, they went to war for four years for the purpose of destroying the Government in which they could no longer rule. And now when, by the methods and policies to which I have adverted, the republican seats upon this floor from the South are about empty, and when the same men, who started in search of their rights in 1861 and who are in a large measure in search of the same rights to-day by a little different method, have returned to this floor, they do not propose an armed resistance. Not at all. I do not believe there will be another armed rebellion in fifty years. While I will not tell the anecdote, I will suggest—and several gentlemen on the other side will appreciate it—that they have seen enough through the cracks to satisfy them on that subject, and they will not try it again. But the policy is, Mr. Chairman, to come back here at the end of eighteen years, and unless they can rule just precisely in the way and by the methods and through the channels that they desire to rule, they propose now, as was stated by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, to starve the Government to death.

The intimation, sir, has been thrown out that the President of the United States, unless he adopts the policy that the democratic Congress may adopt, will become a revolutionist and violate the Constitution. It was said by one gentleman the other day that the veto power was vested in the President for the purpose of preventing unconstitutional legislation. Now I do not deny that the President may consider the question of the unconstitutionality of any measure in considering a bill whether he shall approve or disapprove of it. I do not deny but that the President may veto a bill simply because he believes it is unconstitutional. But I have always understood, and I so understand now, that the veto power is vested in the President of the United States for the purpose of clothing him with the right to prevent what he may regard impolitic legislation being ingrafted upon the policy of the country unless the judgment of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress should be recorded against him.

And, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the whole argument in this case is boiled down to this: that when a conflict comes between Congress and the President it is not a question of power, it is not a question of unusual methods, it is not a question of coercion, but it is a question of arithmetic as to which shall succeed. When he sees proper to veto a measure, if two-thirds of both Houses of Congress pass it over his veto, under the oath he has taken to support and enforce the Constitution he is bound to execute it, and would stand in the attitude of a revolutionist if he dared refuse. On the other hand, when more than one-third of either branch of Congress believe the President right in the exercise of his veto power, and that the measure ought not to pass over his veto, then it is the duty and the stern obligation of every gentleman who takes an oath as a member of this body to yield and to pass the necessary laws to carry on the Government without tacking on to appropriation bills measures that are known to be unacceptable to the Executive, and which he will be compelled to veto, or approve contrary to his judgment and conscience.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is a logical and legal proposition. There is another question to which I desire to address myself for a moment. The apology that is offered for this tacking process is untenable and illogical. The apology offered is that the republican party has been in the habit of attaching legislation of a similar character to appropriation bills. Well, now, if that were true as stated, two wrongs never made a right. But it is untrue in point of fact, if I have not searched in vain. As I understand it, whenever the republican party has attached other legislation than that germane to the appropriation bills, or that were not a part and parcel of the appropriations, it has been at a time when there was either no conflict, no difference of opinion between Congress and the President, or at a time when the republican party had a sufficient majority in both branches of Congress to pass such legislation over the President's veto; and then as a matter of economy, a saving of time, there would be nothing improper in it. But here the question is presented very differently. The two Houses of Congress perhaps differ from the President. I am not authorized to speak for him; I know if he is a good republican, which I believe he is, he will veto this bill if it passes; but I am not authorized to speak for him. Perhaps here the two Houses of Congress and the President disagree, and for the purpose of compelling the President to sanction a measure that his conscience disapproves, that the Constitution tells him he has a right to veto, they tack it on to an appropriation bill and propose to starve or to smoke out the officers of the Government and the Government itself.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to repeat, and I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact, that the right of the President to veto a measure is just as clearly defined in the Constitution as the right of this House or the other to pass a bill; and whether by subterfuge or any other legerdemain to coerce the President, to take from him that free choice which we as Representatives of the people claim for ourselves, is revolution against the Government just as much as an armed rebellion would be revolution.

But it may be our State-rights friends will say that the Government has no power to keep the peace at the polls of a State election. I do not understand that to be the proposition. I do not understand that this law was ever enforced, except in military times, at a State election. A congressional election is not a State election; it is an election under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and I want to call attention to the two provisions of the Constitution upon which I base my opinion. Sections 4 and 5 of Article 1 of the United States Constitution settle this question. I will read:

> The times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof.

If the Constitution had stopped there our democratic friends would be right, but it does not do it. It goes on to say:

> But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations.

This gives Congress plenary power over the subject of the election of Representatives to this House and of Senators.

Now, sir, I ask every lawyer, every logical-minded man upon this floor, if under this provision of the Constitution and under the next section, which declares that—

> Each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

I ask every candid man upon this floor, regardless of party, if under these provisions of the Constitution Congress has not a right, as a part of the "manner" and machinery of holding elections, to elect members of its own body, to prescribe that wherever there is a mob, whether it be through the instrumentalities of a State or a mob composed of the citizens of a State, the troops shall keep the peace at the polls, as a part of the "manner" of holding the election? And may not the President of the United States be authorized by Congress to use the Army to keep the peace at the polls and to put down the mob?

Mr. Chairman, is this a nation or is it a league of States? Our democratic friends are tremendously sensitive in regard to the presence of United States soldiers about election precincts. Is it possible that the democratic party is afraid of nobody but United States soldiers? They want United States soldiers kept from the polls, but they have not a word to say about the ku klux or the "red-shirts," "white-liners," "white-leaguers," "rifle clubs," and their like being kept from the polls. Why not amend the law so as to drive these from the ballot-box and from the polls as well as Union soldiers?

The United States soldiers are under the restraint of the law. The red-shirts are independent in their sphere and can do as they please. Now, we might all vote for the bill, I do not say that I would—if the democratic party would insert a provision that the "red-shirts" and "rifle clubs" and other attachés of the democratic party would be sent to the penitentiary if they appeared at the polls. [Laughter and applause on the republican side; and cries of "Go on!" on the democratic side of the House.] I know that the gentlemen on the other side like to hear me talk because they know I tell the truth about these things and about the democratic party. [Applause and laughter on the republican side.]

I now ask the question, is this a nation? If it is, has the one thirty-eighth part of the United States more power than the thirty-eight States combined and cemented together by the bonds of a written constitution, with one federal head; having executive, legislative, and judicial departments of a common government? Is it not a paradox? Is it not a caricature of all our conceptions of nationality for the party in the majority in both branches of the American Congress to seek to enforce a doctrine that would make a little petty State superior to the union of all the States in one grand whole? Sections 4 and 5 of the first article of the Constitution to which I have referred give the power that I claim, but I want to submit this solemn inquiry to this House in conclusion of what I have to say: Is it possible that this great Government of which we boast can protect its citizens upon every foreign soil under the shining sun of heaven, and cannot protect them in South Carolina and other States of the Union?

I want to see this Government made so strong—I maintain that it is already so strong that it has the power under the Constitution and the laws to carry protection to the door of every man's house, whether it is in South Carolina, Tennessee, or elsewhere, the same as it can carry protection to an American citizen even under a foreign flag.

Why, sir, suppose—and I put it to you upon this side of the House and to the gentlemen upon the other side of the House—suppose that a foreign government should treat an American citizen as men are treated in many of the Southern States about election times; suppose a foreign government should treat an American citizen thus, would not a million of men spring to arms and avenge the insult?

Here is a great country, that can make foreign nations tremble in its presence, and when it turns within its own borders has to bow to the tyranny of a petty State and stand powerless in deference to the cry of "State rights." [Applause and cries of "Go on!" by the republicans.]

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has not expired.

Mr. HOUK. You are getting scared at the wrong place. I am done shaking the "bloody shirt" now. [Laughter.] I will say to the other side of the House that if they had not bloodied the shirt in the beginning we would never have had it to shake at them. If you will never bloody it any more, we will quit shaking it. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I had my way—I do not expect to get it until after 1880—I am satisfied that I will have it then, in a very large measure, because I can say to the gentlemen on the other side of the House that after that time the places that know them now will know many of them no more forever in their representative character—I say if I had my way I would have Congress take this subject of national elections in its own hands. I want to see one general law passed, and if such a measure comes before this body while I am a member, providing for the holding of national elections under and by authority of the United States, I shall vote for it to the exclusion of the States entirely.

I now desire to yield the floor, and if the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] will take the scrap of time I have left I will yield to him; if not I will yield to some other gentleman. [Cries on the democratic side, "Go on!" "Go on!"] Now, gentlemen, behave yourselves [laughter on the republican side] while I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.]

Mr. ROBESON. How much time is left of the gentleman's hour?

The CHAIRMAN. But two minutes.

Mr. ROBESON. Then I will occupy that time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask unanimous consent that a reasonable time be accorded to the gentleman from New Jersey, if he will indicate how much time he wants.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] occupying a half hour, it having been understood that he would have that much of the time of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUK.]

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBESON. I am very glad, Mr. Chairman, that I have not consumed any of the time which of right belonged to the gentleman from Tennessee who has just taken his seat, [Mr. HOUK.] The remarks which he made come with appropriateness and force from him, but from our stand-point at the North they would be neither so appropriate nor so effective.

I shall myself consume none of the time for which I am indebted to the courtesy of this House in any appeal to feeling or in any suggestion of facts with which I am not myself familiar, but shall confine myself wholly, if possible, to the consideration of the questions of law which seem to be involved in this discussion.

It seems to have been assumed on the other side of this Chamber that this is nothing but the repeal of a section of a law enacted in 1865; that it is a negative and not an affirmative provision. Let us see exactly what it is:

That section 2002 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows: "No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States."

This omits the other exception contained in the original law. "or to keep the peace at the polls." This, then, refers to civil officers and is an affirmative repeal of the right of the civil officers of the Government to keep the peace at the polls. We are not standing here on this side of the House resisting a proposition to take away a real or imaginary power of a standing army to crush the rights of freemen at the polls. We are resisting an affirmative enactment, for the repeal of an exception in a restricting law is itself an affirmative enactment. We are, then, resisting an affirmative enactment which designs to take away the power, not of the officers of the Army alone, not of the officers at all, because they under that law as it now stands only have power as they may be ordered or summoned forth by the civil officer to whom the peace of his bailiwick is intrusted.

What, then, is intended by this provision? To restrain the civil officers of the United States Government from keeping the peace at any election in any State whether it be a United States election or not. By what means? By civil means, not by military means, for the rights of the civil officer, the marshal of the district if you please, to summon the posse comitatus, his right to summon any military organizations if they be within the body of his bailiwick, the right to summon armed troops to sustain his civil power, is a civil and not a military right, and is in the interest of the inviolability and the strengthening of the law against, if need be, armed military force. Can that be denied by any lawyer? Can it be controverted by any man?

Mr. KIMMEL. Will the gentleman describe the bailiwick of United States officers?

Mr. ROBESON. The jurisdiction of the United States runs into the States whenever it has a United States duty to perform. That is not only good logic but good law.

Mr. KIMMEL. To preserve the peace of an election at a State election?

Mr. ROBESON. Wherever the United States has guaranteed a right; wherever a right is derived from the Constitution of the United States and is guaranteed or is secured by it, there the United States has the right and must have the power to enforce and carry out that right.

Mr. KIMMEL. What right has it guaranteed in this respect?

Mr. ROBESON. It has guaranteed the right to every man in the State of Maryland, who has the right to vote for the most numerous branch of the Maryland Legislature, to vote at a peaceable election for members of Congress. [Applause on the republican side.]

I know what the decisions of the Supreme Court are upon that subject, and I will meet them fairly. I love the law and its principles, and I shall not shrink from the full effect of the decisions as they are pronounced by the highest tribunals of the country.

I know that the Supreme Court of the United States has declared that the United States has no voter "of its own creation" in the States. I know that it has declared that the right of suffrage is not given in the States by the Constitution of the United States. But that does not cover the case. What does the Constitution say?

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature.

The right to vote for that most numerous branch of the Legislature is given by the States. The qualifications are made by the States. The United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon these individuals, but it adopts to its right of suffrage and takes as its voters a class which have already the right of suffrage given it by the States. It makes them its voters for the election of its officers, and if it does its duty it is bound to guarantee to them a free and fair election. [Applause.]

Let me be fully understood. It is technically and verbally true that the Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon the individuals who vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. That right of suffrage and the qualifications necessary to it are prescribed by the State. But the Constitution of the United States does say that every man who does belong to that class, every man who has that qualification shall be an elector for members of this House. That is the right which it guarantees. It does not give to any individual the right to belong to that class; but when he belongs to that class it gives him the right to vote at an election for a member of Congress.

Mr. McLANE. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. ROBESON. I have but little time remaining, and perhaps I may in the course of my remarks meet the suggestion which the gentleman desires to put. If not, I hope he will call my attention to the point.

Mr. McLANE. I have no question to make with the gentleman as to his argument upon the proposition that suffrage is given by the States, and that by the Constitution of the United States the elector made such by the States is made an elector for Representatives in Congress. The question I desire to put to the gentleman is with reference to the part of his discussion preceding that point. Do I understand him to say that the Government of the United States has the right to keep the peace anywhere within a State? Do I understand him to say that there is any "peace of the United States" at all recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly I do.

Mr. McLANE. Then I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey to give this Committee of the Whole any such decision of the Supreme Court. There is none such in existence.

Mr. ROBESON. I read from the opinion of Attorney-General Cushing——

Mr. McLANE. That is not an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. ROBESON. No, sir; the question has never arisen so as to be decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. McLANE. My question is whether the gentleman can refer to a decision of the Supreme Court which recognizes any peace at all as "peace of the United States."

Mr. ROBESON. Why, does the gentleman from Maryland mean to say that where the Constitution of the United States has guaranteed a public right, and where the Congress of the United States has passed a law to enforce that right—when that right is about to be exercised by the proper persons, and it is interfered with by riot and disturbance—does the gentleman mean to say that it is not within the power of the marshal of the bailiwick to use the force of that bailiwick to restrain and repress that riot?

Mr. McLANE. I have too much respect for the character of the gentleman from New Jersey——

Several MEMBERS, (to Mr. ROBESON.) Oh, go on.

Mr. ROBESON. I have been treated very fairly in this debate, and I hope the gentleman from Maryland will proceed.

Mr. McLANE. If the gentleman from New Jersey supposes that I am confounding the right of the Government of the United States to send its Army to support its marshal in the execution of a process, with the right to "keep the peace," the latter being a technical and legal term understood by every lawyer in the country—I say if the gentleman supposes that I am confounding those two questions, I cannot have any respect at all for his intelligence.

Mr. ROBESON. I recognize the distinction between the power of the marshal in the execution of the process of the courts, and the power of the marshal in the execution of other duties; but I say that the power of the marshal to summon his posse comitatus to execute process depends upon the power given to the courts by the Constitution of the United States and the act of Congress which authorizes him to do that; and there stands to-day upon our statute-book, not yet repealed, a law which says that the United States marshals, for the purpose of carrying out the election law, shall use the power of their bailiwicks.

Mr. McLANE. I again ask the gentleman whether there has ever been any ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States which recognizes the right of the United States to "keep the peace?"

Mr. ROBESON. I have said, and I say again, I never knew the question to arise in that form; but there have been rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States to the effect that wherever there was a right guaranteed or secured by the Constitution of the United States there rested with the United States the authority and power to enforce and secure it.

Mr. McLANE. A totally different question.

Mr. ROBESON. I am not now saying there is any decision of the Supreme Court upon that subject; once again I say that I know of none which covers that exact point. But I ask gentlemen what is the power of the Government of the United States worth if it is not clothed with authority to carry out and execute it against all interference or resistance?

Now let me read upon this subject from the decision of Mr. Justice Story in the case of Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania—the original fugitive-slave case in this country:

> If the Constitution guarantees the right and requires the delivery on the claim of the owner, as cannot be well doubted, the natural inference necessarily is that the National Government is clothed with the necessary authority and functions to enforce it. The fundamental principle of law applicable to all this class of cases is that where the end is required the means and the power are also given.

Mr. McLANE rose.

Mr. ROBESON. Pardon me, but I cannot yield further unless there is consent that it shall not be taken out of my time. If it is not to come out of my time I will yield to the gentleman as long as he wishes.

Mr. McLANE. I submit, after the gentleman has undertaken to discuss the law of this case, it is not reasonable that he should refuse to answer the direct question I have asked.

Mr. MITCHELL. I insist the gentleman from Maryland shall not interrupt the gentleman from New Jersey, out of order and without his consent.

Mr. ROBESON. I hope that point of order will not be insisted upon. We have had nothing on this side of the House to complain of in the conduct of this bill. The gentleman who has charge of it has conducted it in good temper and courtesy.

Mr. McLANE. I should think it very extraordinary that, as a return for the courtesy extended to the gentleman from New Jersey, any man on either side of the House should attempt to withhold the same courtesy from another.

Mr. MITCHELL. The gentleman from Maryland ought not, after the courtesy has been extended to him of asking a question, proceed to take up the whole time of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt the House will make up whatever time the gentleman from New Jersey has lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will see that the gentleman from New Jersey is protected in his right.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, there are other gentlemen who desire to speak upon this question, and the time under the rule cannot be extended by anybody.

Mr. ROBESON. It is true that by order of this House the time has been fixed for debate upon these measures, and that time has been divided among members who are to follow me, and it would therefore not become me to ask any further courtesy to the injury of those whose rights are involved. That is the only objection I have to yielding further to the gentleman from Maryland. I will go on and answer the gentleman by this suggestion, that if the Constitution gives the power to the United States to summon its armed posse, through its civil officer, to excute its law under the fugitive-slave act, does the gentleman mean to say that if it is at a United States election—and that perhaps is the point in dispute—if it is at a United States election that the right and interference occurs, the officer of the United States might not summon the posse and use the power of the country to insure that it shall be a free election? That is the whole point.

Mr. McLANE. I do not mean anything of the kind, but I do mean to say that the gentleman from New Jersey understands very well that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that it has no power or jurisdiction.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman will have a chance to speak on this subject in his own time.

Mr. WILBER. I insist it is hardly fair that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] shall insist upon taking up the time of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. ROBESON. I try to be fair, and the gentleman sees it. I will now return to the point I first made and repeat it, namely, that what we are resisting here is an attempt to take away the power not of the officers of the Army, not of the commanding general, not of anybody clothed with military authority, but of the civil officers of the Government to keep the peace at the polls if need be by summoning all the power of his bailiwick, including any armed force there may be in it. That is what we are resisting here. We are not here in advocacy of a war measure, but we are here to resist this restraint of civil right.

My friend, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] the other day said the danger of republics came from military usurpation; that all that had perished had fallen by the sword. Well, sir, and if this be true, how do they fall by the sword? They fall by the sword when the laws are nugatory, when civil rights are denied, when the civil power of the Government cannot be enforced. This right which we are now defending is a civil power given to the officers of the law, which should in time of peace be superior to the military power of a country. It is a power which may be exercised in an extreme case to summon the brave hearts and strong arms of the citizen soldiery of any section to put down any attempt of an armed usurping power to interfere with free elections. This is not a fight we are making in behalf of a standing army; it is a fight in behalf of civil process and the power which must lie behind it, if it is to be effective.

It has also been said, Mr. Chairman, that these laws should be repealed because they are unconstitutional. How are they unconstitutional? I have already stated that the Supreme Court declares that the United States has no voters of its own, none "of its own creation," not that it has no voters, but that it has no "voters of its own creation" in the States; and I suppose it is upon that point that gentlemen stand when they say the United States has and can have no election the peace of which it can guarantee within the States.

It has also been said, Mr. Chairman, and I must be hasty and suggestive only in my remarks, for so much of my time has been necessarily taken up in interruptions and properly consumed that it is almost all gone—it has also been said that this House of Representatives, by the analogy of its nature and power to that of the English House of Commons, has the right and the power to put upon an appropriation bill these clauses. I admit they have the power to put them on; but do they not go one step further? I have no right to speak for any gentleman on the other side of this Chamber. I have no right to speak for the President of the United States, but it has been given out here in debate; it has been given out through channels more or less authorized; it speaks to the common sense of the country when we see these clauses put upon an appropriation bill, that the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber mean to say to us and to the President, "Take the whole dose or none;" that they mean to say, "Pass this affirmative repealing clause taking away the powers of civil officers to keep the peace at the polls, or do not take the appropriations of the bill. We do not want peace at the polls; take away the power of the law to enforce peace there or we shall refuse your supplies."

It was argued by my friend from Ohio the other day that this position was right and proper, and he said that if this should be done, there never was a case where it was more called for. Mr. Chairman, we are here members of a government under a written constitution which defines and limits the powers of all branches of the Government. One branch is hardly more popular than another. We have neither King nor Lords nor Commons. We have elements of popular government co-ordinate under our Constitution; three of them are responsible more or less directly to the people. The President of the United States goes to the people every four years to answer for his conduct and to receive their condemnation or their approval. This House goes every two years. Both are popular, both represent the people within those co-ordinate spheres and those limits which the Constitution has assigned. There is no analogy with the organization of the English government, which has a monarch with kingly and royal prerogatives, who represents himself, his family, his royalty, his prerogative, and his inheritance, and a house of peers which represents their property, their dignity, and their peerage, and the House of Commons, which alone is elected by the people and alone is responsible to them. Here all the branches of our popular Government respond to the bidding and are dependent on the votes of the people. Our Constitution provides that when there is a law on the statute-book it shall not be repealed unless that repeal has the assent of both branches of Congress and the approval of the President; and if it fail to receive the approval of the President, then the law shall not be repealed unless two-thirds of both Houses concur in that repeal.

That is all that the Constitution provides on this subject and it is all the power under the Constitution which gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber and at the other end of this Capitol have. And if they ask more than that they ask what the Constitution does not give them, because the Constitution says that when a law is once on the statute-book it shall not be swept away if the President and more than one-third of either House object. That is the limit and extent of their constitutional right and power of repeal.

And when they come here, not waiting for the time which they think they see, when they shall have all the branches of this Government under their own control, and say, "We will force this repeal, although not constitutionally entitled to it, by withholding supplies," do they not then do an unconstitutional thing? If they say to another branch of this Government, "Give us what we have no constitutional right to ask, and if you do not give it we will refuse to do our constitutional duty, refuse to do what the Constitution requires us to do," is not their action then unconstitutional? If they say to those who deny them, and who have the constitutional right to deny them, "You shall agree or we will refuse to discharge our constitutional duties; we will refuse to pay the salary of the President; we will refuse to pay the salaries and expenses of the courts; we will refuse to supply the money necessary to carry on the machinery of this Government," is not that unconstitutional? And if it be unconstitutional to do that; if their refusal goes to the destruction of the Government itself; if it stops the wheels of Government; if it brings us to a standstill and a destruction, is not that revolutionary?

My friend from Ohio, as I have already said, warned us that it becomes us to look sharply and keenly to the use of military power, for by the military and through their means republics have always died. I beg to take some issue with him there upon his historic accuracy and fairness. The last final blow to the liberties of republics has usually come from the sword, but it has not been until some branch of the government has usurped to itself rights which it did not enjoy under the constitution and laws of the country, and has thus destroyed the unity and power of civil government. It has not been until some branch of the government, usually a branch claiming most especially to represent the popular will, has usurped to itself powers which did not belong to it and absorbing or destroying the other branches, has broken down government and unsettled society. It was only after the Long Parliament of England had disgusted the people of England by their disregard of civil and of personal rights and by their assumption to themselves of everything which belonged to the government that that stern soldier, Oliver Cromwell, dared to invade that house and dissolve it with his military power. It was only after the assemblies and the councils of the French Republic had made France with its fair cornfields and its vine-clad hills run red with the blood of its best and noblest, not until Europe was appalled at the scenes of murder and of wrong which they perpetrated, not until the world stood aghast at the crimes which were committed in the name of liberty, that the young Napoleon with his armed soldiery was able to seize upon the government of the country and erect upon its ruins his military empire.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we belong to a system of Government with co-ordinate and limited powers, all bearing relation to each other, each having its appropriate sphere, each clothed with its actual duty, each having under the Constitution its proper scope, power, and restraint. It is like the solar system in the heavens, each member of it dependent upon the other, each held in its place, each governed in its motions, each restrained in its orbit by the power and the attractions of the other members of that system. Let one of those spheres invade the orbit of the others, let it break loose from the influence of the laws of gravitation which move and direct it and from the centripetal and centrifugal forces which hold and control it, what becomes of it and of the system of which it is a member? It wanders abroad not only to the destruction of its co-ordinate spheres, but an object of terror to the universe and of destruction to itself.

Now, we are here co-ordinate members of this Government, all held in harmonious accord by rights, privileges, powers, and restrictions of the Constitution of the United States; and when one member of that system breaks loose from that attraction which holds and restrains it in its true relations to the other members, its old landmarks all swept away, its old traditions all forgotten, its old and safe attractions all gone, it will riot through the system, an object of terror and dismay, a mighty instrument of evil.

Mr. Chairman, it is on the ruins of disrupted systems of government that military power arises. It is in the confusion, the disorder, arising from the loss of civil rights to be guaranteed and executed by the civil officers of the law, it is with the overthrow of constitutional law and amid the smoke of such a conflict which this occasions, that the "man on horseback" rises and liberty is sacrificed to order. So long as the civil processes of the law may be properly executed by the civil officers in this country, so long there is no danger of military power. The strong arm, the clear head, the brave hearts of our people, North and South, would never yield to a military usurper, though backed by a standing army of a million of men, unless it became absolutely necessary under the pressure of the usurped and arbitrary power of some irresponsible assemblage to sacrifice liberty to order. That time will never come in this country unless we disregard the plain teachings of the Constitution which our fathers gave to us and which we are sworn to preserve.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio took occasion to say, in allusion to the Executive of this country, that his title was in doubt and his tenure of office yet uncertain. I do not claim to speak for the Executive, but I cannot think the gentleman really meant all that. Certainly I hope he did not mean it as a threat, because if he did, if that is the giant of revolution "whose baby fingers to-day we see" in the action of this House, let me say to the gentleman that the excitement which is apparent throughout the country to-day is but the mutterings of a storm which will increase in fury, will grow in strength and in resistless power, until the men and the party who endeavor to unsettle the title of the President of the United States will be swept forever from the political horizon. [Loud applause.]

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that I have been led from the line of legal discussion which I intended to pursue, and have been only able to suggest to the House the general topics which I otherwise would have tried more carefully to illustrate.

Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I intended to discuss the sixth section of the bill now under consideration, and also to give a history of the act of February 25, 1865, and the reasons which prompted me to vote for it when a member of the Thirty-eighth Congress, and why I now will vote for the bill before this House, which to a certain extent modifies the act of 1865; but I am induced to yield my time to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] who will be chairman of the committee during the consideration of the legislative and judicial bill and who will not have the privilege of speaking on that bill. I will avail myself of the opportunity during the discussion of that bill to present my views. I now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, I trust that in what I may have to submit for the consideration of this committee I shall in no wise derogate from or lower the plane of fairness and dignity with which in the main this discussion has been conducted by my colleagues on this side of the Chamber. I trust that no utterance of mine will give color to the charge that in my judgment any sectional question is involved in the consideration of the issue before this committee.

I do not intend, sir, to be personal in anything that I may say. There has come from different members of the other side of the House during this debate that which, in my judgment, requires and merits notice, and I shall go back, before I shall have finished, several days to reply as best I may to the points that have been made by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

I take it, sir, that nobody is surprised at the appearance of the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] who last occupied the floor. This debate would not have been complete or fairly rounded out unless some member of the privy council of that imperialistic dynasty under whose administration these very vicious practices grew up which it is now sought by this amendment to repeal should have appeared upon this floor to testify in their behalf.

It is charged, sir, not that the amendment under consideration involves of itself an unconstitutional piece of legislation, but it is urged by various distinguished members on this floor that it is revolutionary in its character; that it has no proper place on an appropriation bill; that it is out of line, and deserves the condemnation of the House because it is an exotic in this connection and should have been considered as an independent bill. It is charged further that the tendency and operation of it will be to restrict the power of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, he is but a poor student of this country's history who is not able to satisfy himself that from the very formation of the Federal Constitution down to the present time it has ever been held, and that by the highest authorities of the land and never successfully denied, that it was a power not only of the American Congress but a power of this House to control the employment of the Army by a withholding of supplies.

The debates upon the formation of the Federal Constitution which lie before me show that the brightest intellects assembled in that convention asserted this doctrine in its broadest term and no man dared gainsay it. It is one of those features of English liberty that have come down to us by adoption.

It was so stated in the debates upon the formation of this instrument, as given to us, that it is ever and always in the power of the House of Representatives, by copying the example of the House of Commons of England in withholding supplies, to control absolutely the employment and conduct of the Army. You may follow that theory down at short intervals, and in 1819, when an Army appropriation bill was considered and passed in this Chamber and it was proposed to restrict the power of the President by specifying the purposes to which the appropriations should be applied, the very same argument was made against it then that our friends upon the other side hurl against us now.

It was upon that occasion that Mr. Mercer, one of the brightest among the law-makers of the Government of his day, asserted upon this floor, without encountering contradiction, that it was in the power of the House of Representatives to withhold supplies altogether for the maintenance of the Army if, indeed, that should become necessary to control its operation. It was then that one whose patriotism has never yet been questioned, though it has survived through the greater portion of a fading century only to grow brighter as the ages go by—it was then that not only Kentucky's, but America's great commoner, Mr. Clay, declared in his burning words of eloquence, uttered where we now sit, that he was ready to make the issue with the Executive and offer him a bill with the objectionable features incorporated in it, and to say to the Executive: "Sign or refuse to sign it; but if you do refuse to sign it, declaring that we have not the power to pass it, then my answer to you shall be, neither has the Executive the power that you arrogate to yourself." And you may come down from then till now, and never in the history of this Government has it been denied that the Constitution itself, which gives to Congress the right to pass these money bills to provide means for the support and maintenance of a military establishment, carries with it the resultant right on the part of Congress to withhold those appropriations when in its judgment it is necessary to prevent abuses in the employment of the military.

In the very nature of things this proposed amendment of the law cannot be revolutionary. It is a repealing statute; its only purpose and object is to repeal an existing law. I will not now pause to tell how or under what circumstances it was passed; I will not now pause to delineate the motives which, in a great measure, because of the prevalence of natural passions, inspired, if they did not excuse, the passage of this law. But in the very nature of things this amendment cannot be revolutionary. Negative legislation is never revolutionary. This is not affirmative legislation, twist the issue as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] may seek to do. Buckle, the most philosophic of all historians either ancient or modern, has told us that the statesman and the law-maker seldom, if ever, render a benefit to mankind by the enactment of affirmative laws; that it is rather by the repealing of obnoxious and vicious enactments that they entitle themselves to the gratitude of humanity.

As I have said, this measure is in its very nature anything but revolutionary. Will it be claimed—is there a gentleman upon that side of this Chamber who will undertake to claim—that by reason of any provisions of the Federal Constitution the President now holds the power of which this amendment proposes to deprive him? Is there a man left in this House on either side who, after the clear and logical presentation of the issue made a few days since by my colleague from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] will undertake to assert that there was any such power on the part of the Executive prior to the act of Congress of 1795?

Sir, if the utmost be granted, if it be admitted instead of being denied, as we deny it, that this power was originally held by the President, it was held by reason of a congressional statute, and of necessity the authority passing that statute and conferring that power must be clothed with equal authority to repeal it.

The Constitution does not give to the President the right to send the armed forces of this Government into any State even to suppress domestic violence; by no means. It gives the right to the President of his own motion, it goes further and requires him, to protect each State from invasion by the employment of the military power. But it only confers upon him the authority to send the armed soldiers of this Government into a State to suppress domestic violence when the Legislature of that State, or its governor, the Legislature not being convened, shall make a requisition upon him.

He is not to proceed upon apprehension; he is not permitted to anticipate domestic violence. Neither he nor the executive of the State nor its Legislature are permitted to exercise such anticipation. It must be upon a pre-existing state of things. Domestic violence must exist and that fact must be certified by the Legislature of the State whose peace is disturbed, or when that Legislature may not be convened, then by the chief executive of that Commonwealth.

The President of the United States is the recipient of no power of implication. There is not a prerogative that he holds which is not clearly defined and clearly limited by the provisions of our organic law. That Constitution has made this Congress, in express terms by positive provision, the grand reservoir into which all powers of implication flow. No, sir; this amendment cannot in the very nature of things contemplate revolutionary action.

But it is said that it is not in its proper place when ingrafted upon an appropriation bill. Is there a gentleman in this Chamber who will dare deny or take issue with me upon the assertion—and I make it measuring the full import of my words after a careful examination of the statutes—that more than one-third of the permanent legislation affecting or relating to the Army of this Government, as it stands upon the statute-books of your country to-day, has been put there as riders upon Army appropriation bills?

I do not care to trench upon the patience of this committee by any elaborate review of the countless instances which that side of the House have furnished us in the shape of precedents for the action that we take. Sir, if lectures upon revolution are to be read to us, let them come from some quarter and from some member who is not himself convicted on the record.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] told us that this was an effort, an unmanly effort, to starve the Government to death. He contrasted it with what he termed the bolder and braver action of certain members of Congress in 1861, when they left their seats in these two Chambers and carried their issue to the field of carnage. He tells us that this is revolution, and he denounces any effort we make to adopt it.

Mr. Chairman, better would it have been for the people of this land if the well-earned power of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio had been employed at an earlier period of his political history in averting, denouncing, and opposing revolutionary legislation. Does the gentleman remember the record that he made in 1865 upon an amendment offered by Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, proposing to revolutionize the judicial system of his country, proposing to rob a co-ordinate branch of the Government, and that, too, the last barrier behind which the liberty of the citizen finds shelter, proposing to strip the Supreme Court of the United States of the prerogative and power with which the Federal Constitution has clothed it? Does he remember the record he made when Mr. Wilson's amendment, which reads as follows, was offered?

Provided, however, That if any circuit or district court of the United States shall adjudge any act of Congress to be unconstitutional or invalid, the judgment, before any other proceeding shall be had upon it, shall be certified up to the Supreme Court of the United States and shall be considered therein, and if upon the consideration thereof two-thirds of all the members of the Supreme Court shall not affirm said judgment below, the same shall be declared and held reversed.

Upon the call of the yeas and nays the gentleman from Ohio is found voting "ay;" and then that amendment was passed through this House by the aid of that gentleman's vote. That court then consisted of eight judges; and under the bill it required six of the Supreme Court judges, more than a quorum, to affirm the opinion of a district or circuit Federal court declaring unconstitutional one of the gentleman's own ill-advised, hasty, crude, if not partisan measures. Here, sir, I beg the attention of the committee for a minute. A district Federal judge might hold one of these hasty laws unconstitutional; upon appeal the circuit Federal judge might affirm that decision. What then? The United States district attorney might concur in the judgment rendered. No appeal might be asked. But under that act, which received the support of the gentleman from Ohio, it became absolutely imperative to certify the record without appeal (nobody complaining) to the Supreme Court of the United States. And then what? Under the law a majority of that court constituted a quorum. Five is a majority of eight. Five of those Supreme Court judges, clothed in their spotless ermine, might be upon the bench. All five of them might by unanimous concurrent action declare that the two lower judgments were correct, and yet that law was to be held, under the bill which the gentleman supported, constitutional and valid. Revolution! What is there (before I get through I will ask this committee to tell me) that the party the gentleman so ably leads has not done in that direction?

But, sir, this is not all. The gentleman from Ohio in that effective and able speech to which he treated this House a few days ago used the following language, which I read from the RECORD:

In opening this debate, I challenge all comers to show a single instance in our history where this consent has been coerced.

What consent? The consent of the Executive by extraneous matter injected into appropriation bills.

This is the great, the paramount issue, which dwarfs all others into insignificance.

I accept the gage of battle that the gentleman throws down. I read from the records and show him the instance he seeks. I find that on the 2d day of March, 1867, a thing occurred in this House of which the gentleman should have been cognizant, for he was then as now an honored member on this floor. I find the following message was sent by the then President of the United States to the House of Representatives:

To the House of Representatives:

The act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army—

Ah, by singular coincidence that too was an Army bill, just as this is.

The act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," contains provisions to which I must call attention. Those provisions are contained in the second section which in certain cases virtually deprives the President of his constitutional functions as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and in the sixth section which denies to ten States of this Union their constitutional right to protect themselves in any emergency by means of their own militia. These provisions are out of place in an appropriation act.

Did the gentleman from Ohio borrow his recently used protest from this official protest of the Executive of the country?

These provisions are out of place in an appropriation act. I am compelled to defeat these necessary appropriations if I withhold my signature to the act. Pressed by these considerations—

I grant you, he does not say "coerced."

Pressed by these considerations, I feel constrained to return the bill with my signature, but to accompany it with my protest against the sections which I have indicated.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

MARCH 2, 1867.

Is there no coercion there? Why, sir, the record is full. In an act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of this Government for the year ending June 30, 1865, it was provided that in the courts of the United States there should be no exclusion of any witness on account of color, or in any other civil action because he is a party interested in the issue to be tried. Is not that extraneous matter? Yet upon this bill the record shows that the gentleman from Ohio is found voting in the list of ayes.

But, sir, worse than all this, I find that on a memorable occasion in the Thirty-ninth Congress, of which the gentleman from Ohio was likewise a member, that occurred which will never fade from the minds of the American people. I refer to the proceedings looking to the impeachment of the Chief Executive of this Republic, which came so nigh resulting in conviction. On that occasion I find that a colleague of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Ashley, moved to suspend the rules to allow him to make a report from the Committee on what? Judiciary? No, sir. From the Committee on Territories, in the nature of a resolution impeaching the President of the American Government for high crimes and misdemeanors. On the yea-and-nay vote I find the gentleman from Ohio voted "ay."

And I find further, sir, the counts upon which those impeachment articles were predicated, and I beg to call the attention of this committee to them. Mr. Ashley said:

I do impeach Andrew Johnson, Vice-President and acting President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with usurpation of power and violation of law—

And now come the five counts in the indictment, and I beg the careful attention of this committee, for I will bring it home to the very issue that the gentleman from Ohio has courted in this contest—

In that he has corruptly used the appointing power.

I put the gentleman on his candor and submit to him to say whether he ever intended to impeach the President for that? The country knows he did not. That appointing power had not been wielded in such a way as to merit the censure of the gentleman himself.

Secondly, in that he has corruptly used the pardoning power.

Did the gentleman from Ohio mean to impeach him for that? I will answer for him, no. Everybody knows he did not.

Thirdly, in that he has corruptly used the veto power.

And there was where the sting came in. It was the exercise of that constitutional prerogative, it was the employment of the veto power, for which the House and the gentleman from Ohio voted these articles of impeachment, coupled with one other offense only.

Fourthly, in that he has corruptly disposed of the public property of the United States.

That was a mere formal count in the indictment, and I doubt not that the gentleman from Ohio will admit it.

Fifthly, in that he has corruptly interfered—in the elections and did acts which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes and misdemeanors.

There were but two counts in that indictment upon which it was proposed to impeach the Executive; it was the exercise of the veto power and it was his interference, not in elections, but his interference to prevent the interference of the armed power of this Government in the elections of this country. Was the denunciation still ringing in that gentleman's ears which the then President had employed in his interview with General Emory, denouncing as subversive of all the principles of free government the interference of the military with the right of suffrage at the polls?

But, Mr. Chairman, these counts in this indictment were voted on more than once. The gentleman from Ohio is recorded every time as voting in their favor. And may I be permitted to remind this committee that the record of that Congress shows that he was supported in his action, that he had standing by him, voting side by side with him to impeach the President for the legitimate exercise of the veto power, one who was then comparatively obscure and who but for a combination of accidents would have remained to this day and until his dying day in that obscurity for which nature and his Creator seemed so designedly to have fitted him—that side by side with the gentleman from Ohio stood and voted with him Mr. Rutherford B. Hayes, with whose prospective veto we are threatened. [Applause and laughter.] Now, sir, I beg you to tell me by what rule of consistency does the gentleman from Ohio come upon this floor to flaunt in the face of an American Congress an anticipated exercise by this Executive of his veto when he and that Executive both stand committed upon the record to his impeachment if he dares to employ it?

And while I am at this point I might ask by what sort of authority either that gentleman or any other comes upon this floor to threaten us with the probable or possible action of that Executive at all? What provision of the Federal Constitution, what law enacted by any preceding Congress undertakes to clothe anybody, either that President himself or one of his privy council, even including his premier, his Secretary of State, to sit as he did on the floor of this Chamber on Saturday of last week and by his presence and his indications of approval seek to intimidate, overawe, [cries of "Oh!" on the republican side,] and browbeat an American Congress? Who commissioned the gentleman from Ohio to tell us that we had best be careful because the issue was made and the Executive would not be coerced into a message of approval?

Mr. Chairman, I am advised that thirty minutes of the hour allowed me have expired and the remaining portion of my hour I am compelled by agreement to yield to my friend from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will not be cut off.

Mr. HUNTON. I move the time of the gentleman be extended.

[Cries of "Go on!" from both sides of the House.]

The CHAIRMAN. There is no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I thank the House for its kindness. I would ask, does the gentleman from Ohio, or does any other gentleman, put so low an estimate upon the self-respect, the integrity, the courage, and the manhood of this House, without regard to party, as to believe that such a threat so flaunted is to intimidate the law-making branch of this Government to shape its action on measures of legislation? I cannot think that we are measured by so short a standard.

But, sir, I am not through with the speech which the gentleman has made. He tells us:

The proposition now is, that after fourteen years have passed, and not one petition from one American citizen has come to us asking that this law be repealed; while not one memorial has found its way to our desks complaining of the law, so far as I have heard, the democratic House of Representatives now holds that if they are not permitted to force upon another House and upon the Executive against their consent the repeal of a law that democrats made, this refusal shall be considered a sufficient ground for starving this Government to death. That is the proposition which we denounce as revolution.

And that was received with applause on the republican side.

Does the gentleman from Ohio mean to stand upon that declaration? By that significant nod he says that he does. Does he not know that the Congress just expired bore upon its files petition after petition, memorial after memorial, in contested-election cases, sent by the House to its committee, protesting against the presence of the military at the polls and denouncing the usurpation, demanding its repeal, in order that a free ballot might be had? Does the gentleman fail to remember that the State of Louisiana, a sovereign State of this confederacy once more, thank God, sent her memorial to these Halls, in which in thunder tones she uttered her anathemas against the very practice which this amendment seeks to correct?

But that gentleman did more; he went further and, if possible, he did worse. I mean to deal in exact fairness. I even mean to be liberal in the construction I put upon his utterances.

Mr. Chairman, it is generally true that the grave suffices to silence the tongue of detraction. It is not often that its darkened portals are invaded to pronounce severe criticism, even though richly deserved, if it is to be pronounced upon the dead. But the gentleman from Ohio, forgetting himself in his speech on last Saturday, forgot also to observe this manly and magnanimous rule. By that speech he certainly must have sought, or, if not seeking, he was unfortunate in producing the impression that a distinguished dead Senator from the State of Kentucky had introduced into the Federal Senate Chamber the bill which we by this amendment seek to repeal, and to send his name down to posterity to be blasted by the act, if indeed he had performed it, and that charge to rest upon that gentleman's own high authority. I hold in my hand the very bill, No. 37, which was introduced upon the 5th of January, 1864, by Senator Powell, of Kentucky. There lies before me on my desk the manly, statesmanlike, and patriotic, bold utterances that he delivered in the shape of a speech upon the consideration of that bill. I challenge the gentleman to find within the limits of this measure a single, solitary provision, line, sentence, word, or syllable that this amendment seeks to repeal.

Does not the gentleman know—if he does not, it is his fault—that the amendment incorporated upon this bill which we now seek to repeal was incorporated and ingrafted upon it, not when the Senate was in Committee of the Whole but in open Senate, upon motion of Senator Pomeroy, and when the vote was taken upon that amendment by yeas and nays, every solitary democrat in that Chamber voted against it and put the seal of his condemnation upon it, Mr. Powell among the number? Here stands Senator Powell's utterance, in which he explains how and why it was that the democratic members in that body and this body at last accepted this as the best that could be had; notwithstanding, against their protest, the ingrafting of the Pomeroy amendment, because it was to be taken in lieu of what they charged was true, of what the President of the United States in an official communication to Congress had declared to be true, that in the absence of even the limitations that amended bill would give, the military authorities and officers of the Government had arrogated to themselves the power in all the lately seceding States of declaring what should be the qualification of voters and what should be the qualification to hold office. It was as the least offensive of two offensive alternatives. It was not candid, it was not fair; the record rebukes the gentleman for seeking to place a dead statesman in such a false position.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is useless to follow these things further. It is not, sir, for me to waste the time and trench upon the patience of this committee by following out the tergiversations through which the republican party has wound itself to this high plane of protest against revolutionary legislation. Why, sir, the gentleman from Ohio, in 1872, made a speech upon this floor which he will not deny. It was, as is always the case with his efforts, an adroit as well as an able speech. In that he declared that the minority to which we then belonged, but in which in God's providence we are no longer found—he declared that the minority were guilty of revolution. For what? Because they insisted that extraneous matter should not be put upon appropriation bills. He said that was revolution. [Laughter and applause.] We took him at his word, and now where does he stand? It was revolution then to resist the injection of extraneous matter over the protest of the majority. It is revolution now for the majority to resist that same protest of that minority; but in the one case it was his side protesting, in the other case it was ours.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, let one take the darkened pages of his country's history for the last seventeen long years and read it carefully, and tell me then whether it lies in the mouth of that worthy leader of a once great but waning party to read lectures to anybody, either upon the score of revolutionary legislation or of extraneous introductions into appropriation bills. Better far in the face of the record that they have made, better to listen patiently to the confirmed inebriate as he dilates upon the virtues of temperance, better let the queen of the demi-monde elaborate the beauties of female virtue, or let the devil prate of the scheme of universal redemption, than for homilies upon good morals and lectures upon revolutionary legislation to be delivered from such a source. [Applause.]

There is but one issue here, and I insist that neither this House nor the people of this country shall be allowed to wander from it. It is but this, and nothing more: whether the military power shall be allowed at your polls; whether the elections shall be guarded by the mailed hand of military power; whether the ballot-box, that last and safest shield of the freeman's liberties, shall be turned over to the tender mercies of the armies of your land. Or to state it yet more tersely and probably more fairly, it is simply whether the spirit and the genius of this Government shall be reversed, and whether the civil shall be made subordinate to the military power.

Why, sir, among the most favored, the most cherished and precious principles ingrafted on our system of government from our old prototype, the English people, is that provision which would not tolerate not only the interference but the presence of the military at the polls. Over one hundred years ago an English statute declared the will of Englishmen upon this vital question. I read the statute:

Be it enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords, spiritual and temporal, and Commons in Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, That when and as often as any election of any peer or peers to represent the peers of Scotland in Parliament, or any member or members to serve in Parliament, shall be appointed to be made, the secretary at war for the time being, or in case there shall be no secretary at war, then such person who shall officiate in the place of the secretary at war, shall, and is hereby required, at some convenient time before the day appointed for such election, to issue and send forth proper orders, in writing, for the removal of every such regiment, troop, or company, or other number of soldiers as shall be quartered or billeted in any such city, borough, town, or place where such election shall be appointed to be made, out of every such city, borough, town, or place, one day at the least before the day appointed for such election, to the distance of two or more miles from such city, borough, town, or place, as aforesaid, until one day at the least after the poll to be taken at such election shall be ended and the poll-books closed.—Statute George II.

From that time till now I do declare that it is not within the power of any man to find a single scion of the Saxon race that has not held in utter abhorrence the efforts of him or them who sought to control the freedom of the ballot by the employment of the military power. [Applause.]

The very Army of this country protests against such a prostitution of its service.

I see before me the justly distinguished General-in-Chief of our Army, and I do not believe that I overstate the fact when I say that from him down to the private in the ranks it is difficult to find one who has not recoiled from this service which they have been called upon to render. [Applause.]

It is this question, and it is none other, that I insist shall be kept before this House. We are declaring that the ballot shall be free. We are denying that it is either constitutional, legal, just, fair, or decent, to subject the sovereign to the surveillance of the soldier.

Now, upon that issue the gentleman from Ohio and his associates tell us that they stand committed. I answer so do we. We are willing to discuss it, and for my part I shall oppose any limitation being put upon this debate. If we cannot stand upon an issue so broad, so constitutional, so catholic, so fair, so free as this, then tell me in Heaven's name where are there battlements strong enough for us to get behind? Let it go to the country that one party asserts that the manacles shall fall from the limbs of the citizen, and that the Army shall not hold its mailed hand at the throat of the sovereign, and that the other party refuses to release the throttling grasp, and declares that it will block the wheels of the government and bring it to starvation.

I am willing, and those with whom I stand are willing, to accept this issue, and we go further, we tender it. We are the ones to make the issue and we are ready for you to accept it. Planting ourselves upon this broad ground, we welcome controversy. We seek no quarrel with you, but for the first time in eighteen years past the democracy are back in power in both branches of this Legislature, and she proposes to signalize her return to power; she proposes to celebrate her recovery of her long-lost heritage by tearing off these degrading badges of servitude and destroying the machinery of a corrupt and partisan legislation.

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which like these were born of the passions incident to civil strife and looked to the abridgement of the liberty of the citizen.

We demand an untrammeled election; no supervising of the ballot by the Army. Free, absolutely free right to the citizen in the deposit of his ballot as a condition-precedent to the passage of your bills.

Now, sir, if the gentleman from Ohio is to be excused, for surely he cannot be justified, if he is to be excused for parading before this House the threat, the argumentum in terrorem of a veto that is already cut and dried to be placed upon a bill that is not yet passed; if he is to be pardoned for warning this House that the executive branch of this Government will never yield its assent to this measure in its present form, may I not be warranted and justified in employing equal candor, and may I not assure that gentleman and his associates that the dominant party of this Congress, the ruling element of this body, is also equally determined that until their just demands are satisfied, demands sanctioned by all laws human and divine, protected and hedged around by precedents without number, demanded by the people of this land without regard to section, who are clamoring for a free, untrammeled ballot (not for the South, I beg you to remember, for if there be sectionality in this issue I cannot discover it;) for Philadelphia as well as for New Orleans, for San Fransisco and Boston as well as for Charleston and Savannah—that this side of the Chamber, which has demonstrated its power, never means to yield or surrender until this Congress shall have died by virtue of its limitation. [Applause on the democratic side.] We will not yield. A principle cannot be compromised. It may be surrendered; but that can only be done by its advocates giving proof to the world that they are cravens and cowards, lacking the courage of their own conviction. We cannot yield, and will not surrender.

Let me assure my friend, and it is a picture that I know he does not dwell upon with pleasure, that this is the restoration to power of a party as old as our Government itself, which for almost a hundred years has stood the boldest, fairest, freest exponent and champion and defender of the doctrine of constitutional limitations against the doctrine of the aggrandizement of power. It is this organization that has come back to rule, that means to rule, and means to rule in obedience to law.

Now, sir, the issue is laid down, the gage of battle is delivered. Lift it when you please; we are willing to appeal to that sovereign arbiter that the gentleman so handsomely lauded, the American people, to decide between us.

Standing upon such grounds, we intend to deny to the President of this Republic the right to exercise such unconstitutional power. We do not mean to pitch this contest upon ground of objection to him who happens, if not by the grace of God yet by the run of luck, to be administering that office.

I tell you here that if from yonder canvas [pointing to the picture of Washington] the first President of this Republic should step down and resume those powers that the grateful people of an infant republic conferred upon him as their first Chief Magistrate, if he were here fired by that patriotic ardor that moved him in the earlier and better days of this Republic, to him we would never consent to yield such dangerous and unwarranted powers, to rest the liberties of the citizen upon any one man's discretion, nor would he receive it.

It was not for the earlier but for the later Executives of this Government to grasp and seek to retain such questionable prerogatives. You cannot have it. The issue is made—it is made upon principle, not upon policy. It cannot be abandoned; it will not be surrendered. Standing upon such ground, clothed in such a panoply, resting this case upon the broadest principles of eternal justice, we are content to appeal to the people of this land. There is no tribunal to which we are not willing to carry this case of contest; and we are willing to allow Him who rules the destinies of men to judge between us and give victory to the right.

I do not mean to issue a threat. Unlike the gentleman from Ohio, I disclaim any authority to threaten. But I do mean to say that it is my deliberate conviction that there is not to be found in this majority a single man who will ever consent to abandon one jot or tittle of the faith that is in him. He cannot surrender if he would. I beg you to believe he will not be coerced by threats nor intimidated by parade of power. He must stand upon his conviction and there we will all stand. He who dallies is a dastard, and he who doubts is damned. [Great applause on the democratic side.]

If I have any time left, Mr. Chairman, I will yield it to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON.] I would not have used all this time, but I understood I was indebted to the courtesy of my friend across the way, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who asked at the expiration of the thirty minutes that unanimous consent be given for the extension of my time. I understood that was not to affect the half hour which I intended to yield to my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield now to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. GIBSON, (at three o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) In a few minutes the time will arrive when the House has ordered that a recess shall be taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for a recess has been fixed at half past four o'clock.

Mr. SPARKS. And that is nearly an hour from now.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] brought to the attention of this House the various means by which the framework of our Government might be dissolved on what he called "the voluntary principle," borrowing the phrase from the distinguished writer, Mr. Bagehot, whose work on the English constitution is one of the ablest disquisitions both upon the British and American governments that has recently appeared. We were informed that without striking a blow the States of the Union by refusing to elect Senators could destroy the Senate and thus suspend all constitutional functions; that the people of the country by declining to elect Representatives to this House might remove the very foundation of the structure; and that even a majority of this House, by adjourning from day to day and failing to vote the necessary supplies for the maintenance of the Government, might thus take away the vital principle indispensable to its operations.

The gentleman pictured to us the Government melting away and disappearing from the face of the earth by the voluntary inaction of unwilling and unpatriotic States; of the people lost to all sense of self-interest or patriotism; and of majorities of their Representatives violating their oaths to support the Constitution. But there was one process by which the Government may be destroyed which escaped the ingenuity of the gentleman. He could see very well how it might be starved to death by majorities both of the people and of their Representatives, but he failed to tell us how it might also be starved to death by a partisan minority of the Representatives combining with an unpatriotic, weak, or unwilling Executive to refuse supplies even though voted without conditions by a majority of only less than two-thirds in both branches of Congress. Is it more likely that this Government shall perish at the hands of the people, or of a majority of their Representatives in this and in the other House than by disappointed minorities in league with the Executive?

Have majorities become so dangerous? If the States and the people and their representatives in the Government cannot be trusted, who shall be? Quis custodiet custodes? The fact is, Mr. Chairman, our governmental organization, like all others, rests upon the voluntary principle. The Constitution is not self-operative; it merely divides, enumerates, and limits the power confided to the three branches of the Federal Government. It ordains and establishes, not a mere speculative system, but a government, and the representatives of the people in every department of it are expected, not only to govern the people in conformity with the Constitution, but to govern themselves. Members of Congress, the Supreme Court, the Executive, each and all, are sworn to support and defend the Constitution.

No one can deny that the power rests with the President to accept or to reject supplies. Nor can any one deny that the lower House may vote or decline to vote supplies. The real question is whether the President is justifiable in exercising the veto power against the pending bill and thus creating an antagonism between the executive and the legislative departments of the Government. We cannot afford to discuss this question as one of mechanics and attempt to solve it by merely measuring the strength of the opposing forces. Conceding the power to both, it would be like discussing the question as to what would be the result if an irresistible force came in contact with an immovable body. The question is one of duty, of statesmanship, and it should be determined by the Constitution, by the precedents and practice of the Government, by consulting the fathers of the Constitution and the learned commentators upon that instrument. I ask, then, is the President justifiable in refusing the supplies now tendered him by the Congress of the United States?

The gentleman from Ohio and most of his associates admit that they would be in favor of both the bill for the supplies and the amendment prohibiting the use of troops at the polls if they were severed and offered as independent measures. But they suggest and invoke the Executive veto, not that either measure is objectionable, but upon the ground that the methods adopted by this House are unconstitutional, that the amendment striking out the provision for troops to keep peace at the polls is not germane nor in the direction of retrenchment of expenditures. They contend that because we have determined to couple this amendment with the appropriation bill it is an attempt to coerce the minority and the President. The gentleman from Ohio says:

> We are ready to pass these bills for the support of the Government at any hour when you will offer them in the ordinary way by the methods prescribed by the Constitution. If you offer those other propositions of legislation as separate measures we may meet you in the fraternal spirit of fair debate and will discuss their merits. Some of your measures many of us will vote for in separate bills, but you shall not coerce any independent branch of the Government, even by the threat of starvation, to consent to surrender its voluntary powers until the question has been appealed to the sovereign and decided in your favor. On this ground we plant ourselves, and here we will stand to the end.

The distinguished gentleman knows full well that his side of the House, being a minority, can offer no lawful or successful resistance to these measures even in their present form. Upon what ground, then, does he plant himself when he insists that we shall not coerce an independent branch of the Government? He evidently is speaking of the executive department of the Government, for the only barrier behind which the minority in this House may intrench itself against the legitimate will of the majority is the veto power of the President.

The gentleman's speech is an adroit and passionate appeal to the Chief Executive to join the minority in their opposition to this measure, to communicate to him the passions which excite them, and to reject the supplies contained in the bill, and thus to bring about a crisis in the Government. I recur then, sir, to the main question, Would the President be justifiable? In the first place, I lay down the proposition that, while it is perfectly proper for the gentlemen who compose the minority of this House to resist this legislation with all the power that the Constitution and rules of this House give them, that the President of the United States can find no authority or justification for vetoing this bill upon the ground that the proceedings of this or the other House of Congress were unparliamentary; that they had no right to "tack to" an appropriation bill the amendment forbidding the use of troops at the polls. The powers of the Executive are enumerated and defined in the Constitution. He possesses no implied powers. He does possess the veto power, but by the express provisions of section 7 of the Constitution it is conferred upon him over every bill, order, or resolution or vote only to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment. But section 5 of the Constitution provides that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings."

Hence it is clear that as to every resolution, order, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate is not necessary the veto of the President may not be exercised.

Now we may well ask why was it that the Constitution limited the power of the veto to such bills, orders, and resolutions as required the concurrence of both Houses of Congress? Why did it not extend to orders and resolutions and votes of the separate bodies? Evidently it was to protect the independence of these bodies as separate branches of the Government, to prevent the Executive from interfering with their proceedings or to have any control over them. Hence we find that the Constitution has not only limited the veto to cases requiring the concurrent votes of the two Houses, but has expressly vested each House with the power of establishing its own rules of proceeding according to its will and pleasure, without limitation or check. The Executive cannot question these proceedings. The gentleman cannot show a single clause of the Constitution which gives him such authority, either directly or by implication.

The framers of the Constitution departed from the model from which our institutions are drawn in that they denied the ministers of the President any participation in the proceedings of this House. And although in common parlance it is said that the veto power itself is legislative in its character, yet that character is limited and qualified by the Constitution. It cannot enter here, it cannot amend, it cannot vote on any proposition pending before this body. But for these guarantees the executive department of the Government would practically override all the safeguards for the free action of this House, and we should indeed cease to be independent legislators or worthy Representatives of a free people. Story on the Constitution says:

> No person can doubt the propriety of the provision authorizing each House to determine the rule of its own proceedings. If the power did not exist it would be utterly impracticable to transact the business of the nation either at all or, at least, with decency, deliberation, and order.

These guarantees for the independence and integrity of this House were not invented by the framers of the Constitution but were drawn from the institutions of that stormy isle which for more than two hundred years has given shelter to the freedom of law, when it was driven from every other land, in the forms and sturdy independence of her Parliament.

In May on Parliamentary Practice, page 61, the learned commentator says:

> At the commencement of every Parliament since the sixth of Henry VIII, it has been the custom for the speaker—
> In the name and on behalf of the Commons to lay claim, by humble petition, to their ancient and undoubted rights and privileges; particularly that their persons and servants might be free from arrest and all molestations; that they may enjoy liberty of speech in all their debates; may have access to her majesty's royal person whenever occasion shall require; and that all their proceedings may receive from her majesty the most favorable consideration.
> To which the lord chancellor replies:
> Her majesty most readily confirms all the rights and privileges which have ever been granted to or conferred upon the Commons by her majesty or any of her royal predecessors.

But the author adds:

> But whatever may have been the origin and cause of this custom, and however great the concession in the Crown may appear, the privileges of the Commons are nevertheless independent of the Crown and are enjoyed irrespective of their petition.

The occasions for this courtesy are also limited; as by law and custom of Parliament the queen cannot take notice of anything said or done in the house, but by the report of the house itself.

Each house as a constituent part of Parliament exercises its own privileges independently of the other.

The law of Parliament is thus defined by two eminent authorities. As every court of justice hath laws and customs for its direction, some the civil and canon, some the common law, others their own peculiar laws and customs, so the high court of Parliament hath also its own peculiar law called the lex et consuetudo parliamenti. This law of Parliament is admitted to be part of the unwritten law of the land, and as such is only to be collected according to the words of Sir Edward Coke, "out of the rolls of Parliament and other records, and by precedents and continued experience;" to which it is added, that whatever matter arises concerning either house of Parliament ought to be discussed and adjudged in that house to which it relates, and not elsewhere.

No one will deny, therefore, that the rules of procedure of this House are and must be entirely independent of executive interference. It will be admitted that the pending bill has been fully discussed according to the parliamentary methods long since established for our guidance, and that it is being carried through this House in accordance with its ancient forms. True it is that the minority of this House contend that the amendment "tacked on" the bill is violative of the rules; but the majority possess the constitutional right and power to interpret the rules; and on appeal from the decision of the Chair, on a yea-and-nay vote, this amendment has been held to be clearly in accord with Rule 120, allowing amendments to bills which, "being germane to the subject-matter, shall retrench expenditures." This decision by a majority of the House is an end of the question; otherwise we admit that the minority must control.

Now, can it possibly be contended that the minority can appeal to the President of the United States on a question concerning the proceedings of this House, and invoke the exercise of the veto power against a bill of supplies upon the ground that these proceedings are irregular or vicious? If it be so, then, indeed, instead of a majority of this House electing its Speaker and determining the rules of its proceedings, the President might at once designate the Speaker of the House and his Cabinet provide rules and regulations for our government. I am not arguing now, I wish it to be distinctly understood, against the power of the President to veto any measure upon the ground of its unconstitutionality or of its invading the prerogatives of the Executive, or of its being against the well-being of the Republic, or, in other words, upon its merits. But I contend that it would be an unconstitutional exercise of the veto power for him to rest it upon the proposition that the methods of legislation which we have adopted were objectionable to him, or in his judgment in defiance of the parliamentary precedents and rules. While the Senate may not originate revenue or money bills, yet it "may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills." They not only have the constitutional right to adopt their own rules of procedure, but they have the constitutional power to accept, to amend, or to reject revenue bills, in the expressed language of the Constitution itself. They might determine when this amendment comes before them that it was not germane, that it was not appropriate to the supply bill, because they possess these legislative functions; but the President of the United States cannot, without an unwarranted invasion of the rights and privileges of this House, take notice of its proceedings and plant his veto upon any bill emanating from it upon the ground that the proceedings by which it was adopted were irregular or unparliamentary. That is a matter for the legislative department of the Government to determine.

The House of Lords, possessing legislative power, passed an act on December 9, 1702, declaring "that the annexing of any clause or clauses to a bill of aid or supply, the matter of which is foreign to and different from the matter of the said bill of aid or supply, is unparliamentary and tends to the destruction of the constitution of its government." The question then arises, who is to determine when the matter is foreign and different from the matter of the said supply bill? In the lower House it is the majority of its members; in the Senate a majority of the Senate. And so in the English Parliament it is a majority of the lower house, and in the House of Lords a majority of the peers. But has it been contended within the last two centuries that the sovereign of Great Britain might veto a bill which came to him offering supplies by the concurring voices of both houses of Parliament upon the ground that there were certain amendments to the supply bill which in his judgment were "foreign" and therefore unparliamentary? No such instance can be cited from the history of Great Britain or from the history of our own country. The veto power in our own country, whenever exercised, has been independent of the rules of proceedings of the Houses, and upon the ground that it was necessary either to protect the Constitution, the general welfare of the people, or the prerogatives of the Executive itself. Therefore it is, Mr. Chairman, that I go so far as to claim that if the gentleman himself were in the presidential chair, with his speech in his hand, he would be constrained to accept the supplies tendered by this bill; for as the Executive, his eyes would be closed as to the methods which had been adopted by this House, and the only question before him would be whether on the merits the bill was acceptable or not. The honorable gentleman has declared that he was in favor of the bill and will vote cheerfully for it upon its merits.

Let us see how a veto message upon the grounds held by the gentleman from Ohio would read.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I return to your honorable body with my objections the bill of supplies for the Army.

I would cheerfully approve both the bill and the amendment prohibiting the employment of the Army at the polls if they came before me as separate measures.

I concur with the Congress that the Army should not be stationed at the voting precincts of the people, and that the executive branch of the Government should exercise no power whatever over elections for the lower House of Congress. While I would resist any encroachment upon executive prerogatives by Congress I deem it equally important that the Executive should abstain from all interference with the elections, returns, and qualifications of members of the lower House. But I feel constrained to interpose my veto, because the rule you have adopted allowing such an amendment to be tacked to an Army appropriation bill is, in my judgment, irregular and unparliamentary.

It is better that the Army should remain without supplies, or even that all governmental functions should cease, than that the executive branch of the Government should permit such rules of proceedings to be adopted and enforced by either House of Congress.

I have the honor to suggest that you alter the rules of your proceedings to conform to the views herein expressed. In that event both the bill and the amendment, coming before me as independent measures, will meet my approval.

Respectfully,

R. B. HAYES,
President.

J. A. GARFIELD,
Secretary of State.

I admit that the President would have the right to veto a bill which he regarded as unconstitutional, or as hostile to the interests of the country, or as hasty and injudicious, though it be passed without a call for the ayes and noes in either House of Congress and no question had been raised with regard to their proceedings. But I deny his power under the Constitution to veto any bill solely and exclusively because in his judgment the methods adopted in its passage were objectionable. To do this, is to make him the judge, the deputy marshal, the supervisor of our proceedings. To do this is to sweep away all those barriers erected by the Constitution for the purpose of protecting one branch of the Government from encroachments by another. Mr. Madison, the father of the Constitution, has well said in illustration of the maxims of Montesquieu, laid down with so much force in his observations upon the British constitution, which he regarded as the mirror of liberty itself, that "the accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elected, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny."

Not only did the framers of the Federal Constitution take care to provide against this union of all power in single hands, but the constitutions of every State in this Union have, with jealous care, made similar provisions; especially in the constitution of the ancient Commonwealth of Massachusetts it is declared—

In the government of this Commonwealth the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them; to the end it may be a government of laws, and not of men.

Declarations of a similar character are to be found in other State constitutions. Once admit, however, that the Executive may determine the methods of proceedings in this House, and it will become rather a chamber to register his edicts than an assembly of the independent representatives of a free people.

In the second place, the President ought not to veto the bill because the legislation sought to be repealed by it violates not only the express provisions of the Constitution but the fundamental rights of freemen.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] has relieved me from the necessity of making any extended remarks in defense of this position. This legislation authorizing the Executive to keep troops at the polls during all our history found no place in our statutes until the passions of the civil war reached their climax. It has found no place in the laws of Great Britain since it was supplanted by the statute of George II. It is an alien to British and American soil, a stranger in our midst, an exotic that cannot live in the atmosphere of these free institutions; it is the offspring of war, the application of military methods to free institutions, and it attempts to preserve liberty by bayonets upon the theory that the people are incapable of self-government. The Constitution provides, in article 1, section 2:

The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

This leaves it to the States to determine absolutely who shall vote for members of Congress. The States establish the qualifications; the States confer the right of suffrage; for it is not a natural right, but a civil right granted and regulated by law.

In 2 Otto, 555, from which I quote, the Supreme Court hold:

In Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wall., 178, we decided that the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the United States have no voters of their own creation in the States. In United States vs. Reese et al., supra, page 214, we hold that the fifteenth amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with the new constitutional right, which is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. From this it appears that the right of suffrage is not a necessary attribute of national citizenship; but that exemption from discrimination in the exercise of that right on account of race, &c., is. The right to vote in the States comes from the States; but the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination comes from the United States. The first has not been granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States, but the last has been.

It is with reference merely, then, to the exemption from discrimination that the Supreme Court of the United States has determined that the Federal Government has conferred any right.

It has been held by the opponents of this bill that the power to intervene or to control elections is found in section 4 of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

> The times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

It is pretended that under this provision of the Constitution the legislation may be defended which provides that the Executive of the United States may order troops to the polls, may authorize the appointment by his marshal of countless deputy marshals and supervisors, who shall swarm at the voting places with power to arrest without warrant and to determine the qualifications of the voters and to count the votes. It is indeed a narrow foundation for such an imposing structure; it invades the rights of citizens, because the citizen is under the law exempt from arrest without a warrant, except for felony or breach of the peace; but here he may be arrested upon a suspicion of not being a qualified voter or of an attempt to violate the law. He may after such arrest and incarceration be set free, but he will have lost his vote by the arbitrary act of one man, and of this there can be no redress. This constitutional provision, according to the authors of the Constitution itself, was not intended to invade the States with this more than regal power, but merely in the event if the States themselves made no provision for elections there might be means adopted by which Representatives should be elected to this House. Alexander Hamilton says, in the fifty-ninth number of the Federalist:

> Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself means of its own preservation.

He says, moreover:

> Suppose an article had been introduced into the Constitution empowering the United States to regulate elections for the particular States, would any man have hesitated to condemn it both as an unwarrantable transposition of power and as a premeditated engine for the destruction of State governments?

And yet, this is what this legislation does in effect. Congress possesses the same power over the times and manner of holding elections for Senators as for Representatives, and if section 4 of the Constitution justifies the keeping of troops and the appointment of deputy marshals and supervisors, with the power of arrest at the voting-places of the people, upon precisely the same grant and the same reasoning the Army may be stationed in the legislative chambers of the States with deputy marshals and supervisors to keep the peace and oversee the election of Senators.

It must be clear, then, that this legislation which interferes in such a flagrant manner with the electors of the States, which, going beyond the manner, or places, or method in which the elections are conducted, clothes Federal officers with the unheard-of power to incarcerate free men at the polling places on suspicion, not only at Federal elections but at elections of State officers, is without warrant in the Constitution. The Constitution provides, section 4:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

This is the only provision in the Constitution providing a way by which the Federal Army may enter a State for the purpose of enforcing the State laws, and in this case it is to aid in the suppression of domestic violence. But the violence must have occurred; the fact of its existence must be certified to the President, and he can then only proceed in the manner laid down by law. It is not in his capacity as Commander-in-Chief of the Army that such aid is given, for it will be remarked that the provision recites not that the President shall perform this duty, but the United States. The Constitution having pointed out the particular manner in which the Army may be used in State affairs, it results necessarily that its use in any other manner and under any other than the given circumstances is prohibited. I do not mean to deny that the Federal Government may execute its own laws and enforce the decrees of the Federal courts through its marshals and appropriate officers, and that in the event of a resistance so great to its processes that the civil authorities may not be able to overcome it, that then and in such cases the Army itself may be used as is provided by statute.

I would be reluctant to vote for new legislation upon an appropriation bill or for a repeal of existing law, but the whole history of legislation, both in the mother country and in this, shows that the controlling theory is that the standing army actually ceases to exist at the expiration of every appropriation for its support.

By passing the annual mutiny act, says May:

> In this power the House of Commons have reserved to themselves the power of determining not only the number of men and the sums which shall be appropriated in each year to their support, but whether there shall be any standing army at all. Without their sanction, the maintenance of a standing army in time of peace would be illegal.

Our forefathers provided in the Constitution that there should be no appropriation for the standing Army extending over a period greater than two years, and lodged the power to originate all supply bills in this House—the lower House. Why not in the Executive, or in the Senate, or in the Congress? The power to originate implies the power to withhold, or at all events a greater power over the question than the other branches of the Government possess. These free institutions were intended to repose upon the consent and affections of the people and to find their best security in dispensing justice to the governed. Every line in the Constitution, every speech in the convention, every opinion of the fathers shows a jealousy of military power and the unfaltering purpose of subordinating it completely to the civil authority. And until these acts now sought to be repealed were put there, after the civil war, the records of Congress were not marred by statutes providing for the use of the Army and the executive power at the elections for members of this body, which should above all be free from military interference both in its proceedings and in the sources of its power. For the reason, therefore, that this is not new legislation but is a return to the old-fashioned ways, I earnestly support the bill, and when this measure shall have been submitted to the Senate and meets the approval of that body, after full consideration, both Houses concurring, it seems impossible to believe the Executive would interpose his veto.

I have not thought proper in these remarks to discuss the law relating to test oaths, because it has already been repealed and is upon the statute by a mistake of the codifier.

I have heard no one advocate this discriminating and unconstitutional disqualification, so fatal to the administration of justice in the Southern States, since I have been upon this floor.

There is no part of the country which has suffered from the evils of military interference and military violence and outrages so greatly as the people of the State which I in part represent. I should feel that I did not do justice to the innocent men and good citizens who have been dragged from their homes and conveyed hundreds of miles on false charges, by partisan deputy marshals and partisan supervisors, to be tried and acquitted, there being no evidence to sustain the charges on which they were arrested, if I did not utter my protest against such assaults upon liberty. Hundreds of men have had their homes broken up and their business destroyed, and society has been convulsed by the efforts of unscrupulous partisans acting as supervisors and deputy marshals. The effect of such partisan prosecutions, backed by the authorities of the Federal Government, is to destroy the influence of men of law and order, to excite strife, to set neighbor against neighbor and race against race. These are the appropriate instruments of partisan tyranny, and work out their legitimate results in disorder and confusion. When repealed, society will repose more and more upon its natural forces; intelligence, property, and character, always the allies of peace, will secure justice to all. They have given hostages for the enforcement of the laws.

In the third place the President should abstain from vetoing these supply bills for the Government because the legislation sought to be repealed relates to elections for members of the lower House of Congress, a matter peculiarly concerning this House; and, in the language of Sir Edward Coke, "ought to be discussed and adjudged in that House and not elsewhere." If it be an invasion of the rights and privileges of the House for the Executive to question the rules of its proceedings, it would seem to be equally unwarranted for the executive department to interfere in the elections—to control the vital forces that go to make up the House of Representatives. It is a spectacle at variance with our conceptions of a constitutional republic to see the power in the hands of the Executive, which enables him to place a line of deputy marshals, supervisors, and soldiery between the Representatives of the people and the people themselves at their polling places. An unscrupulous executive inspired by partisan passion might poison with his individual will and aspirations the fountains of freedom that under our institutions should flow free and uncontaminated.

There is not a single clause or provision in the Constitution of the United States which confers any power or imposes any duty upon the President in reference to elections. If there was one thing which the framers of the Constitution clearly foresaw and provided against it was the interference of the Executive in the elections of the people. If they had conferred any power upon him over the elections for the members of this House it would at once have destroyed its independence and freedom. So far from that they expressly provided, in order that there might be no question about the matter, (section 5 of the Constitution,) that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

The lower House of Congress is the judge—not the Senate, not the President, not the Congress, but the lower House of Congress—not only of the returns and qualifications, but of the elections of its own members. The subject-matter of elections for this House is placed within the keeping of this House, and thereby excluded from the interference or supervision of the Executive or of the Senate. Under the Constitution the States may determine the qualifications for the voters for members of Congress, but the lower House must determine the qualifications of the members-elect. There is an implied, if not expressed, exclusion by these provisions of the executive department of the Government from having anything to do with the qualifications of the electors who shall vote for members of Congress or with the elections or qualifications of the members elected—in fact with the subject-matter of elections. So far from this the contrary is the case.

In a certain contingency the Constitution provides that this House may elect the President, but in no case whatever is there any provision under which he may in any manner concern himself with reference to the elections, returns, or qualifications either of the electors or of the members of this House. It is true that by section 4 "Congress may at any time by law make or alter the regulations relative to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives," but there has been from the foundation of the Government a concurrence of opinion among all enlightened statesmen that this power was to be exercised only in the event that it became necessary to secure the existence of the two Houses when the States failed to act. While the executive department has been made free from undue interference by Congress every precaution has been taken by the absolute grant of all the implied powers to Congress, in addition to special powers, to secure the independence of this House, upon which the whole fabric of our liberties reposes as this noble Capitol upon its granite foundation. They had inherited these principles of liberty, of parliamentary liberty, the liberty to be preserved and maintained not by executive power, not by the representatives of States as independent communities, but by the Representatives of the people themselves giving expression to their free voices in the making of the laws.

It has ever been held by English-speaking people that the presence of troops at the polls annulled an election. The two things are as antagonistic, the bayonet and the ballot, as fire and water; they cannot coexist. These views find the completest expression in chapter 2, page 178, in Blackstone, with regard to the proceedings at elections:

And, as it is essential to the very being of Parliament that elections should be absolutely free, therefore all undue influences upon the electors are illegal and strongly prohibited; for Mr. Locke ranks it among those breaches of trust in the executive magistrate which, according to his notions, amount to a dissolution of the government, "if he employs the force, treasure, and offices of the society, to corrupt the representatives, or openly to pre-engage the electors, and prescribe what manner of person shall be chosen. For, thus to regulate candidates and electors, and new-model the ways of election, what is it," says he, "but to cut up the government by the roots and poison the very fountain of public security?" As soon, therefore, as the time and place of election, either in counties or boroughs, are fixed, all soldiers quartered in the place are to remove, at least one day before the election, to the distance of two miles or more, and not to return till one day after the poll is ended. Riots likewise have been frequently determined to make an election void. By vote also of the House of Commons, to whom alone belongs the power of determining contested elections, no lord of Parliament, or lord-lieutenant of a county, hath any right to interfere in the election of commoners; and by statute, the lord warden of the cinque ports shall not recommend any members there. If any officer of excise, customs, stamps, or certain other branches of the revenue, presume to intermeddle in elections, by persuading any voter or dissuading him, he forfeits £100 and is disabled to hold any office.

Thus are the electors of one branch of the legislature secured from any undue influence from either of the other two, and from all external violence and compulsion.

Dr. Lieber, in his work on civil liberty and self-government, edited by that profound scholar and accomplished gentleman, Theodore D. Woolsey, in speaking of elections, says:

It is especially necessary that the army be in abeyance, as it were, with reference to all subjects and movements appertaining to the question at issue. The English law requires the removal of the garrison from every place where a common election for Parliament is going on. Much more necessary is the total neutrality of the army in an election of the sort of which we now treat.

Armies at the elections! There may be polling places, there may be men voting, but there can be no election, no free choice.

I admit that the President in certain cases possesses the veto power; it is conferred upon him by the Constitution, but it is for him to determine when he may employ it; and surely if there can ever arise a matter with regard to which he should abstain from its exercise, it is in relation to the elections for members of the lower House of Congress. Many of our most sagacious statesmen regarded such a power as inconsistent with the whole theory of our Government. Mr. Clay, on a notable occasion, January 24, 1842, proposed an amendment to the Constitution limiting the veto power of the President. He said, in his great speech on that occasion:

To give to the Executive any agency in the ascertainment and expression of the will of the nation was so far a violation of the great leading principle. But it was said that the framers of our Constitution had nevertheless been induced to place the veto upon the list of the executive powers by two considerations. The first was a desire to protect the executive against the power of the legislative branch, and the other was a prudent wish to guard the country against the injurious effects of crude and hasty legislation. But where was the necessity to protect the executive against the legislative department? Were not both bound by their solemn oaths to support the Constitution? The judiciary had no veto. If the argument was a sound one, why was not the same protection extended to the judiciary also? Was there not ample security against the encroachments of the legislative power in the absence of the veto? First, there was the solemn oath of office; then there was the authority of the judiciary; then there was the responsibility of individual members to the people, and this responsibility continually kept up by a frequent appeal to the people; and lastly, there was the ultimate conflict of the President and the Legislature before the grand tribunal of the nation itself in case of any attempt by the Legislature to deprive him of the rightful exercise of his authority.

* * * * * * *

The officer of the Government in whose hands the Constitution places a power so formidable was supposed in theory to remain profoundly silent as to the passage of great measures of public policy until they were presented to him in a finished form and for his approbation and sanction.

These were the matured opinions of one of the noblest men, the most exalted patriots, that ever consecrated his life to the liberty and honor of the American people.

Not less apprehensive of the executive power was the great expounder of the Constitution, Daniel Webster. He says:

Our security is in our watchfulness of executive power. It was the constitution of this department which was infinitely the most difficult part in the great work of creating our present Government. To give to the executive department such power as should make it useful, and yet not such as should render it dangerous; to make it efficient, independent, and strong, and yet to prevent it from sweeping away everything by its union of military and civil authority by the influence of patronage, and office, and favor—this, indeed, was difficult. They who had the work to do saw the difficulty, and we see it; and if we would maintain our system we shall act wisely to that end by preserving every restraint and every guard which the Constitution has provided, and when we and those who come after us have done all that we can do and all that they can do, it will be well for us and for them if some popular Executive, by the power of patronage and party, and the power, too, of that very popularity, shall not hereafter prove an overmatch for all other branches of the Government.

I do not wish, sir, to impair the power of the President, as it stands written down n the Constitution, and as great and good men have hitherto exercised it. In this as in other respects, I am for the Constitution as it is. But I will not acquiesce in the reversal of all just ideas of Government; I will not degrade the character of popular representation; I will not blindly confide, where all experience admonishes me to be jealous; I will not trust executive power, vested in the hands of a single magistrate, to be the guardian of liberty.

Alexander Hamilton, in No. 73 of the Federalist, speaking of the veto power lodged with the Executive, says:

Nor is this all. The superior weight and influence of the legislative body in a free government, and the hazard to the executive in a trial of strength with that body, afford a satisfactory security that the negative would generally be employed with great caution; and that in its exercise there would oftener be room for a charge of timidity than of rashness. A king of Great Britain with all his train of sovereign attributes, and with all the influence he draws from a thousand sources, would at this day hesitate to put a negative upon the joint resolutions of the two houses of Parliament. He would not fail to exert the utmost resources of that influence to strangle a measure disagreeable to him, in its progress to the throne, to avoid being reduced to the dilemma of permitting it to take effect, or of resisting the displeasure of the nation by an opposition to the sense of the legislative body. Nor is it probable that he would ultimately venture to exert his prerogative but in a case of manifest propriety or extreme necessity. All well-informed men in that kingdom will accede to the justness of this remark. A very considerable period has elapsed since the negative of the Crown has been exercised.

If a magistrate so powerful and so well fortified as a British monarch would have scruples about the exercise of the power under consideration, how much greater caution may be reasonably expected in a President of the United States, clothed, for the short period of four years, with the executive authority of a Government wholly and purely republican!

If, then, it be true that this power was conferred upon the Executive to prevent encroachments upon that branch of the Government or to defend the Constitution, surely if there could ever arise a case in which it should not be employed it would be in the attempt to overthrow the concurrent majorities of both bodies of Congress with regard to a matter concerning in a peculiar manner the popular branch of the Government—the elections by the people for the Lower House. Can the President justify himself before the country in thus setting up his single judgment and attempting to override the lawful majorities of both Houses of Congress with regard to a matter that in no way touches his prerogatives but that is committed by the Constitution to the States and to the Lower House of Congress—a matter about which this House is to be the judge—the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

When we attempt to discover in the records of the past the sources from which our constitutional liberties, our free institutions were derived, we turn instinctively not to kings, nor their cabinets, nor their privy councils, but to those great parliamentary leaders who in every age, with sturdy independence, have resisted the encroachments of executive power and have wrung from monarchs the rights and privileges which we enjoy.

A House of Representatives independent and uncontrolled save by the Constitution which ordained it should be dear to every American heart. It should represent the free choice of the people with no taint of extraneous force upon it. It should be free from fear or favor in its origin at the ballot-box, free in its meeting, free in its speech, free in its demand for the redress of grievances, free in prosecuting offenders, and both fearless and free in its defense of the liberty and property of the citizen and in its resistance to the encroachments of executive power and patronage.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Mr. Chairman, this is substantially a bill passed by the House of Representatives a few days before the adjournment of the Forty-fifth Congress, and was defeated by the republicans in the Senate. As to the items of appropriations and the amounts, I presume they are correct, as the bill went through the ordinary scrutiny of the committee and the items have been agreed to not only by the last Congress but by this in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I shall therefore vote for the bill, although I do not approve of the amount appropriated, and only vote for it on account of the peculiar circumstances surrounding the bill, as I am a new member of this body and am compelled to rely upon the judgment of others. I believe the Army ought to be still further reduced in numbers, and consequently the expenditures sustaining it ought to be largely reduced, which I believe will be done at the next regular session, and shall not regard this bill as any precedent hereafter.

Mr. Chairman, I come now to the discussion of the sixth section of this bill, which is as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 2002 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"No military or naval officer or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States."

And that section 5528 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years."

The adoption of this sixth section, so eminently proper in any republican government, is resisted by the republican members of this body. It is a matter of surprise to me that any man who loves constitutional liberty should oppose it, no matter what his politics are, whether he is a democrat or a republican; and yet we have been detained here in consideration of this section for four days, and speech after speech has been made against the adoption of this section of the bill by the republican members of this House. We have been informed by them that they as a body intended to resist its adoption by every possible means known to parliamentary law. We have been told it would bring on revolution; that it meant destruction of the Government; that the President would veto it; that it interfered with his power as commander of the Army under the Constitution, and all that. Now, sir, let us pause and look at the question in its true light, laying aside party prejudice. Will any man say that it is not right? Ought it not to be the law of the land? Is it right for any military or naval officer, or any other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, to bring troops to any place where any election is being held unless it be to repel the armed enemies of the United States? There is no man in this republican Government who dares to answer this question in any way except in the negative. No man has yet, in this debate, had the bold effrontery to say it is right for the officers of the Federal Government to have armed soldiers at the voting places in a time of profound peace. Why, sir, as has been repeatedly said, even in monarchical England it would not be tolerated, and is forbidden by law. In England armed soldiers are prohibited from going to the voting places on election day by act of Parliament, and no English officer would dare order it, not even the highest officials.

And are we, sir, to be told that here in free America, boasting of our love of liberty and free institutions, armed soldiers should go to the polls in the absence of armed enemies of the United States? No man on this floor has dared say so, not even the bold member from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who informed us on Saturday that he voted against the act of 1863 prohibiting the presence of armed soldiers at the polls. Even he said he would not discuss the merits of this question, but would vote against this section. They dare not "face the music" and say it is right to have armed soldiers at the elections when there is no armed enemy there. Yet, sir, their opposition to this section means that, and nothing else. It is useless for gentlemen to disguise their opposition; the people will look at it in its true light, and they need not try to put their opposition on different ground. Is there a necessity for this law? The past history of the country shows that there is a necessity for it. There is no fact better established than that armed men have been under radical rule ordered to the voting places, not only in the Southern States, but in Kentucky. Numbers of Representatives upon this floor have seen it. They have seen white men driven from the polls and intimidated, while carpet-baggers from other States have marched up the negroes and voted them as they pleased to maintain their party in power. But suppose these facts are denied; what reason have gentlemen on the other side of this House to desire in time of peace the presence of armed men at elections when there are no armed enemies of the United States present? If it is not for intimidation, if it is not to influence the vote in their favor, why have them there? Why should the people be taxed to maintain them and to send them there? Let gentlemen be frank and meet the question here, for they will have to meet it before the people. They cannot disguise it. Sir, this sixth section ought always to have been the law, but our wise and patriotic forefathers never dreamed of its necessity. After having emerged from the revolutionary struggle for liberty and freedom, when they formed our Constitution and attempted to secure the rights of the people, they did not dream of the radical party; they did not dream of the outrages of that party since they have been in power. If they had they doubtless would have guarded strictly the liberty of the ballot-box, the right of suffrage, from Federal interference—the right to choose our rulers without the influence of bayonets at the elections or of deputy marshals and supervisors. They would have guarded it in the organic law of the land, as we are trying to secure it by act of Congress.

Why, sir, who would have thought when our form of government, with its three independent departments, the executive, legislative, and judicial, each independent of the other, framed as checks to give it stability and to insure the protection of the citizen in the enjoyment of liberty—I say, who would have thought that the day would come when the attempt would be made to strike down the judiciary, the Supreme Court; when the bench would be filled by partisan judges for partisan purposes; when even acts of Congress in violation of the Constitution, after being so decided, should remain in full force unless two-thirds of the judges on the Supreme Bench should agree that they were unconstitutional, as was attempted by a bill introduced in this House and voted on January 13, 1868, (see Journal of House of Representatives, page 181, second session Fortieth Congress, 1867 and 1868,) and that it would have received one hundred and eleven votes, all republican? And yet, sir, this was done, as will be seen from Congressional Globe, second session Fortieth Congress, page 489; and, sir, one of the votes was the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who said the passage of the sixth section of this bill meant revolution.

Sir, this was revolution indeed. It startled patriots all over this land when they saw the attempt by the republican party in this House to tear down one of the three pillars of our temple of liberty, to strike down the judiciary, the palladium of American freedom; and if it had passed the Senate and become a law, well might we have breathed the requiem sigh for departed liberty and freedom. It shows to what extent men will go when carried along by prejudice and partisan spirit. Here was the attempt to make Congress supreme and give them the power to even override the Constitution of our country. Under this law they could pass any unconstitutional act to oppress the people, and when relief was sought in the judicial department of the Government, and although the inferior courts of the United States should decide the act an outrage and unconstitutional, yet it was to remain in full force unless two-thirds of the supreme judges should decide it unconstitutional when in all other cases a majority of the court was a quorum to decide all questions of law; yet, sir, one of the prominent gentlemen who voted for that proposition now tells us if we pass the sixth section of this bill it means revolution. Why? Because he said it would be resisted by the republican party, and intimated that if passed it would be vetoed; and if we still persisted, it would be an attempt to destroy or "starve the Government to death." Monstrous declaration! Are we to be intimidated in doing what is right? Are we to be prevented from passing a law to secure to every man the right of "free ballot," the right to vote at the elections unintimidated by the presence of armed soldiers in time of peace, by a threat of the veto power, merely because we see proper to put this just and proper law into an appropriation bill, in the exercise of our constitutional rights as representatives of a majority of the people of the United States? Have not the republican party time and again set us the example? Whenever it has suited them they have put such legislation on appropriation bills as they saw proper, many instances of which have been referred to in this debate.

Has it not been done even in England, under a monarchical government, by the House of Commons frequently in the course of two hundred years whenever encroachments have been made upon the liberties of the people by the Crown? And if we do it, if we follow the example of the republican party by putting this section, right and proper in itself, into an appropriation bill, we are told by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that revolution is to be brought upon the country; the Government "starved to death!" How? By the veto of the President. Well, sir, if Mr. Hayes vetoes this bill on account of the sixth section guarding the right of suffrage, then the responsibility will rest on his shoulders, and not on ours, for starving the Army. It is the first time in many years that the country has had a democratic House of Representatives and Senate, and the American people look to us to repeal the unjust laws that were passed in passion and prejudice and to maintain a dominant party in power in violation of the free will of the people. The people expect us to give them free and untrammeled elections, which will prevent scenes that many of them have witnessed in Kentucky and other States of armed men deterring and preventing them from exercising their right to vote. I do not believe Mr. Hayes will veto the bill on account of the sixth section. I know that the people of Kentucky, of both political parties, will indorse the sixth section of this bill, and I believe a large majority of the people of the United States will approve it. But if he does, and persists in that veto, and thereby starves the Army of the United States, then let the responsibility rest where it belongs, on the head of the President, for vetoing a bill right, proper, and constitutional, passed by a majority of the representatives of the people in the exercise of their constitutional rights. As far as I am concerned, I am ready to meet the issue; and I believe every lover of constitutional liberty on the democratic side of this House is determined to give the people free elections and free jury trials by prohibiting the presence of armed soldiers at the elections, by abolishing this swarm of hired partisans, the supervisors of elections and the special election deputy marshals, and repealing the test oath in jury trials. I sincerely hope there are gentlemen on the other side who will rise above party prejudice and vote for these measures.

Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee longer, as these measures have been so thoroughly discussed by others on this side of the House. I am anxious that we may get through with these measures and try to give the country some relief upon the financial questions that interest the people at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has arrived at which the House has agreed to take a recess.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARBER. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself very gladly of this opportunity to address this committee, for I have been rather under the impression, in the course of the remarks made here since the beginning of this debate, that this might possibly be the last session of the American Congress, and certainly I would like the opportunity of making at least one speech, after having had all the arduous service of the campaign. There seems to be a good deal of question, Mr. Chairman, about what is the real subject-matter of debate before this committee. The issue is stated in various ways, according to the notions of the different speakers and according to the party predilections of the gentlemen who hold the floor.

It seems to me that there cannot be any very great mistake about the real character of the legislation which is proposed here as a sort of rider to this appropriation bill. No sophistry can obscure the purpose or design of this rider, as I understand it.

Mr. Chairman, it is a distinct proposition submitted to the American Congress to repudiate the highest obligations of the National Government to the individual voter, that of absolute protection at the polls. It has been well said by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] that the protection of the voter at the polls was left to the State governments for many years, for sixty or seventy years, during the earlier and happier days of this Republic, and our venerable friend said that this protection might be still left to the State governments. But, Mr. Chairman, no one better knows than he that times have changed, and men have changed. This country is not what it was. Men are not what they were. In my judgment this proposition comes at a very peculiar time and a very remarkable juncture of our affairs. It has been substantially said here upon this floor by a distinguished gentleman from the Southern States [Mr. HOUK] that several of the State governments at the South are flagrant usurpations of the most aggravated character.

It has been stated here to-day by the same gentleman that at the recent elections large multitudes of men, citizens of the United States, have been disfranchised, deprived of the right to vote by the perpetration of crimes the worst known to the wickedness and the frenzy of factions. It has been charged here to-day, substantially, that the majority which rules this Chamber has been secured through violations of law. Such charges as these made in the Congress of this great country ought not to pass unchallenged and unheeded. And when they are made, men ought to pause a long time before they disregard them and proceed to strip by national legislation the Chief Magistrate of this country of all possible power of future interference to protect the voters at the polls. Not alone has this charge been made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUK,] but I happened, in common with many others who were here in December last, to hear it from the Chief Magistrate of this country. I send to the Clerk's desk the annual message of the President of the United States, and ask to have read the paragraph I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The friends of law and order looked forward to the conduct of these elections as offering to the general judgment of the country an important opportunity to measure the degree in which the right of suffrage could be exercised by the colored people, and would be respected by their fellow-citizens; but a more general enjoyment of freedom of suffrage by the colored people, and a more just and generous protection of that freedom by the communities of which they form a part, were generally anticipated than the record of the elections discloses. In some of those States in which the colored people have been unable to make their opinions felt in the elections the result is mainly due to influences not easily measured or remedied by legal protection; but in the States of Louisiana and South Carolina at large, and in some particular congressional districts outside of those States, the records of the elections seem to compel the conclusion that the rights of the colored voters have been overridden, and their participation in the elections not permitted to be either general or free.

Mr. BARBER. Now, I submit that such suggestions, coming from such a source, ought not to have passed unheeded by any body of men not absolutely insensible to the demands of justice. And I recognize in the proposed legislation in this appropriation bill the response of the commons of this country to these suggestions of its Chief Magistrate. The country so understands it, the world so understands it, and there is hardly a chance to cavil about it.

I would like to know with what degree of propriety Representatives on this floor can be asked, in view of these grave and weighty allegations, to abdicate the national sovereignty upon this subject. I want to know what political party can afford to take that responsibility.

It has been suggested in this connection that these laws upon the subject of Federal elections, of which this provision is only a portion, are unconstitutional. In this connection I want to say a word on that point. I have not a doubt in my mind about their constitutionality. It seems to me that the Constitution contains an explicit and unqualified grant of power to the General Government in the broadest terms, authorizing us to maintain this system of election laws by the Federal Government. I refer for the moment to section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution, a portion of which I will read:

> The times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Now, by that language I understand that the Congress of the United States is authorized to make the same rules and regulations which a State Legislature may make; authorized in explicit and unqualified terms. And I understand it to be the safe rule of constitutional construction to hold that we may make laws to enforce all acts which we pass in accordance with the Constitution.

I understand it to be within the sphere of a State government to provide, as a portion of the manner of conducting an election, for the maintenance of peace and order at the polls. And I submit that it is a legitimate piece of legislation on the part of the General Government in like manner to provide for the preservation of peace at the polls. And if the Federal Government, in the execution of its constitutional powers, chooses to provide by positive enactment for the maintenance of peace at the polls it can provide for the use of the Army to enforce that enactment.

We have heard a great deal about constitutional law and civil rights from the other side of the House during the past few days. I have had my curiosity excited. It is a matter of surprise to me, somewhat, how gentlemen who but a short time ago were engaged in the effort to destroy these institutions should now know so much better than northern people just how to preserve them. It has been a matter of surprise to me why gentlemen who were born and raised in an atmosphere where the colored man had no rights which a white man was bound to respect should now read us lectures about human rights and civil liberty. I desire to state the proposition as I understand it. I do not understand this to be a proposition as to whether we are to have untrammeled elections. I understand it to be a proposition that this Government, which has so recently enfranchised a race of nearly four millions of people, shall now turn its back upon them and leave them to the tender mercies of a southern oligarchy. That is just what I understand this question to be, and that is just what this nation cannot afford to do. That would be a piece of baseness, an act of treachery upon the part of this people, which would overshadow all the glory of the Anglo-Saxon race.

When I listened to the magnificent declamation this afternoon of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] when he appealed with pride to the record of our ancestors, I could not help but think that it was not his fault that the flag which now floats over us was not long years ago made the symbol of the departed glory and greatness of this Republic. I could not help but think that it was not his fault that this Union of the States to which Washington devoted the energy and the inspiration of his genius, and to which he left his benediction when he died, was not long since rent asunder and the people of this country committed to everlasting and helpless civil strife.

It is said that the demand for this legislation is made in obedience to public sentiment, that this being a Congress fresh from the people it represents that sentiment. I deny that there is any such sentiment in this country which can properly be characterized as a public sentiment. The only sentiment of that kind in this country is a partisan sentiment, a factious sentiment, not rising in any degree whatever to the rank or dignity of a public sentiment.

Let me tell you, gentlemen, that your campaigns for the last half a dozen years, in which you have lured the independent voters of the North to the support of the democrats under the specious cry of reform, do not warrant you in claiming that there is a public sentiment at the North which demands the repeal of these election laws.

Your whole campaign of 1876 was a grand imposition upon the credulity of the North. And let me say to northern gentlemen here who hold their seats by virtue of the independent vote of the northern States, that those independent voters never dreamed of authorizing you to condone, indorse, or gloss over in any manner these alleged outrages at the South. They never dreamed of authorizing you to surrender here the very vital principle for which the war was fought, either at the dictation of our confederate friends at the South or of a party caucus. Let me tell those gentlemen that when they repeal this law in obedience to a supposed public sentiment at the North, they but add another to the long list of demonstrations that the modern democracy cannot be safely intrusted with the control of national affairs. Let me say to those northern gentlemen who propose to join in the repeal of this law in this mode and manner that when they do it they only commit again upon this floor the same pitiable blunder which northern democrats have committed from time immemorial.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said about a presidential veto in case this bill shall pass this honorable body and the Senate. My acquaintance with the Chief Magistrate of this country is very limited. I am about the last man who would be authorized to speak for him in this behalf, and I certainly should not attempt to do so were I so authorized, after the suggestions so often made on this floor as to the true doctrine on that subject. But this I do know: if the Chief Magistrate of this country, in the event of this bill passing both Houses of Congress, should approve and sign it, so that it should become a law, he will incur the lasting execration of an overwhelming majority of the people of the North.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Mr. Chairman, the contention which now engages the members of this House is on the proposition to amend sections 2002 and 5528 of the Revised Statutes by striking out the words "or to keep the peace at the polls" where they occur in said sections.

The sections as they now stand are as follows:

SEC. 2002. No military or naval officer or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls.

SEC. 5528. Every officer of the Army or Navy or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls, shall be fined not more than $5,000 and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years.

The issue raised by the amendments proposed involves the question whether we shall have free elections or whether they shall be dominated and controlled by military power. It involves the question whether this Government shall be based on the free consent of the people as expressed at the ballot-box or whether the commander of the Army shall mock them with a plebiscite through which his supreme will shall be registered by his subservient subjects. This issue comes home with peculiar force to the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, and in whose bill of rights is the declaration that, "as standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be kept up." This provision exists in the fundamental law of only one other State of the original thirteen. The founders of our Government borrowed this important principle from their English ancestors, who, after suffering for centuries under the oppressions of unlicensed military power and tyrannical prerogative, declared in their bill of rights at the close of the revolution of 1688, "that raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless with the consent of Parliament, was against law." At that day and as the result of years of conflict and suffering they wrung from the executive the concession that the source of all military power was in the people; that its existence and extent and duration were wholly in the discretion of the Legislature of the nation.

This concession was one of the first fruits of the great battle for civil liberty and it has been watched and guarded with a jealous care by the people ever since. From this principle were born the provisions in our National Constitution, that in Congress shall reside the sole power to raise armies and make appropriations for their support, and provide laws for their government. In the language of Mr. Hamilton in discussing these very provisions—

Independent of all other reasonings on the subject it is a full answer to those who require a more peremptory provision against military establishments in time of peace to say that the whole power of the proposed government is to be in the hands of the representatives of the people. This is the essential and after all the only efficacious security for the rights and privileges of the people which is attainable in civil society.—Federalist, 28.

And clearly, in accordance with this view, the power of the legislative and executive departments of the Government were arranged and fixed under the Constitution. It is provided that Congress shall have the power "to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." This provision is almost an exact transcript of the law fixing the power of the English Parliament on this subject except that there is no limitation of the time for which an army appropriation shall be made by Parliament. This power "to raise and support armies" and the limitation as to supplies therefor, when construed in connection with the history of the events and legislation out of which it arose, clearly give the representatives of the people the right to declare for what purposes and under what restrictions the Army shall be used. It gives Congress the absolute power to determine the size and character of the Army or whether there shall be an army at all. Following Mr. Hamilton's argument and quoting from his language in this connection—

Next to the effectual establishment of the Union the best possible precaution against danger from the Army is a limitation of the term for which revenues may be appropriated to their support.—Federalist, 29.

The founders of the Government, in further proof of the aversion of the people to any enlarged use of the Army, provided by the second article of the amendments to the Constitution that "a well regulated militia is necessary to the security of a free state." These powers thus reposed in Congress in reference to the control of the Army are clear and unambiguous. The duty and power of the President are equally clearly and precisely defined by the Constitution. "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." He has no powers over the Army under the Constitution except what are conferred by act of Congress, and all these powers are subject to modification and repeal. What is there, then, in this contention for the right of the Executive to use the Army in controlling elections in the States? The right to vote is not one which is derived from the Constitution of the Federal Government. It is a State right. It depends solely upon the fundamental law and statutes of the several States. The limitations on it are almost as numerous and various as the States themselves. In some States there are property qualifications; in some, qualifications as to the intelligence of the applicant for suffrage. In all the States there are very varied qualifications as to the place of residence, time of such residence, time of assessment of taxes, time of payment of taxes, &c. Numerous differences on the subject of suffrage existed at the time of the formation of the Government and the adoption of the Federal Constitution. These differences were then found to be irreconcilable, and unless the question had been left as it was, solely to the determination of the States themselves, the Union would never have been formed. But, submitting the whole question to the several States, the founders of the Government provided by article 1, section 2, of the Constitution, that in all Federal elections "the qualifications of electors shall be the same as those of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

The right thus reserved by and secured to the States is inviolable under article 10 of the amendments to the Constitution, which provides that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." And it was the settled belief and practice that the right of suffrage was solely under State control and beyond the power of Federal interference until 1865. In that year, at the close of a great civil war in which the foundations of free government had been shaken and almost all the limitations on arbitrary power had been swept away—when the passions of the leaders in power knew no bounds and the conservative supporters of the Constitution grasped at anything to stay the tide—the law was passed authorizing the use of the Army "to keep the peace at the polls." O Peace, what crimes are committed under thy name! All the governments of the people in the olden time went down beneath the iron heel of military power. The modern republics of Venice and Florence and the United Provinces and Genoa and France were strangled in the midst of their protection by the army. On the ruins of the French Republic of 1856 its president built a throne and mocked the people by a plebiscite wherein the army kept the peace at the polls and by an almost unanimous vote proclaimed that "the empire is peace." All the lessons and traditions of the past warn the friends of free government against the interference of military power. The free consent of the people expressed by a free and untrammeled ballot is the only basis on which a republic can endure.

Every breach of fundamental law, though dictated by necessity, impairs that sacred reverence which ought to be maintained in the breast of rulers toward the Constitution of a country and forms a precedent for other breaches wherein the same plea of necessity does not exist at all.—Hamilton.

Without stopping to inquire, therefore, what led to the act of 1865, or who was responsible for its passage, or whether it was dictated by any necessity, let us, in view of the history of kindred legislation in the past and the certainty of its tendency and results in the present, wipe it from the statute-book of the nation. It is very plain that in connection with the act under consideration, which appropriates millions of the people's money for the support of the Army, we have the right and the power to say how that Army shall be used. If there were no precedents for attaching the repeal of the odious sections to this appropriation bill, the exigencies of this case would justify us in making a precedent for all future time. It is in keeping with the letter and spirit of the Constitution itself and with the great precedents of English parliamentary history on which the Constitution itself was founded. But we are not without precedents for our action in this case. From the inception of the reign of the republican party in this country, during all the years when it had absolute control of all the branches of the Government, it gave us annually numerous instances in which other legislation was attached to appropriation bills. What the President will do with the bill when passed, we do not know, or should not. He is the keeper of his own conscience and responsible in his own person and character to the people and the judgment of the future. It is our solemn and imperative duty to pass the bill. It is our duty as the Representatives of the people to see that none of the great rights which they have achieved after ages of struggle shall be allowed to be wrested from them by an Executive who is their servant. To the unprecedented threat from the gentlemen on the other side that the President will veto the bill, we answer with a great English lawyer, when confronted with the arrogance of prerogative power, "When that case arises, we shall do that which shall be fit for the Congress of a great nation to do."

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, the subjects before us are of more than ordinary interest, partly arising from their importance and partly on account of the attempt which is being made to create a factitious alarm in the public mind because they have been brought forward for consideration.

The latitude of debate which is allowed in Committee of the Whole and which has been taken in this discussion extends it beyond the consideration of the two provisions of the pending bill for the repeal of laws authorizing the use of the Army in elections, and embraces the provisions contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for the repeal of the law prescribing the test oath for jurors in the Federal courts, of the law for the appointment of chief supervisors of elections, and of the law for the appointment of special deputy marshals, and of the laws prescribing their duties and the duties of marshals and their general deputies in relation to elections, and limiting the duties and powers of local supervisors.

The real questions which arise in the consideration of these are:

First. Are the provisions referred to for the repeal of these laws constitutional?

Second. Are the proposed repeals just, wise, and necessary?

Third. Is the plan proposed of inserting the provisions for their repeal in appropriation bills in accordance with the practice of Congress as it has heretofore prevailed?

These would seem to be the questions which should be considered and determined in this debate.

And first, as a conclusive answer as to whether the proposed legislation is constitutional, it is only necessary to say that it cannot be unconstitutional to repeal a statute. The Constitution may be violated by an act of new and affirmative legislation. But the repeal of a statute is a mere question of policy to be determined by the legislative will. By article 1, section 1, of the Constitution, it is declared that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." Under this view it will be seen that the proposed legislation would not be the subject of executive objection on constitutional grounds; and we may dismiss this point in the argument as being free from controversy.

On the second point, as to whether the proposed repeals are just, wise, and necessary, I do not propose to go into the whole of the argument, but only to present a part of it, resting on general principles, and leave to others the more elaborate examination of the provisions of the statutes we propose to repeal, as to do this, in view of other questions I propose to discuss, would occupy more time than I am allowed under the rules of the House.

In the discussion of this point it becomes necessary to consider the character, theory, and objects of our Government; and this may be done best by contrasting them with those of the governments which preceded it and which now antagonize its great fundamental principles. The political theories of the Old World and those of despotic government everywhere are that sovereignty is derived from the power which rules, whether that be king, emperor, or nobles. The right to rule has sometimes been held to be the divine right of kings. That theory demands obedience from the people to their rulers. It rests on the fundamental idea that the people are not capable of self-government; that they must accept such liberty as their rulers may think it safe to give them; that the government or ruling power is the source of authority and fountain of honor. Under this device of kingcraft, this foundation-stone of despotism, mankind has languished and suffered wrongs, cruelty, and oppression through the ages of the past. This theory contemplates a government of force as contradistinguished from a government of consent.

Our constitutional Republic rests upon principles directly the opposite of these, and by the Declaration of Independence certain truths are declared to be self-evident, among them—

That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Our Constitution and form of government rests upon these as among the most important principles of our system. These make ours a Government of consent, as contradistinguished from a government of force. They make it a Government of the people, by the people, for the people. Under this theory the sovereign power resides in the people and not in their officers or government. Our system of government recognizes the capacity of the people for self-government. If they are not capable of self-government, then our system is a failure and should be abandoned, and a strong form of government be adopted, strong in the despotic sense.

The powers of government in our system are divided between the Federal and the State governments. To the Federal Government are confided all such powers as are necessary for the management of its national and international relations, and these powers are specified in the Constitution of the United States. To the States are reserved the powers necessary in local government. These local governments constitute a very important and very interesting feature in our system of government, which must be maintained or our whole system must fall.

Among the powers of these local governments is the determination of the qualifications of voters, the regulation of the elective franchise, and their power over the election of their own officers is absolute and cannot be interfered with by the Federal Government without a surrender to the extent of such interference of the right of local self-government.

The provisions of law which we propose to repeal in these two bills are of an aggressive, repressive character. The very existence of these laws upon the Federal statute-books is of itself a denial of the capacity of the people of the States for self-government; for if they are capable of self-government, then they do not need the agency or interference of the Federal Government for their safety.

The claim has been made, and is still made, that under article 15 of the Constitution the Federal Government has undertaken the duty of protecting the voters of the States. This article only prohibits the States from abridging or denying the right of citizens to vote "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." This has been held by the Supreme Court as only referring to the action of the States, and does not prevent a State from abridging the right to vote on other grounds than those mentioned in the article; nor does it take from the States the power to declare who are voters or to regulate the elective franchise. The Federal Government, as held by the Supreme Court, cannot confer on citizens the elective franchise, and cannot regulate what it cannot give.

Under section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution it is provided that the "times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

It has been claimed that under this provision the enforcement acts we propose to repeal might be adopted. But it is well settled, upon authority, that this power to regulate relates mainly to the time, places, and manner of holding elections, and does not authorize the prescribing of the qualifications of electors or confer the power to declare who shall and who shall not vote. This is settled by the second section of article 1 of the Constitution, which provides "that the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every two years by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." The qualifications of electors in a State are to be prescribed by the authority of the State, and not by Federal authority.

The true construction of section 4, article 1, of the Constitution, above quoted, manifestly is that in the event of the people of a State failing to make provisions on these subjects Congress may, in the exercise of its discretion, make regulations on the subject, and that when the States make regulations Congress may alter them as to "the time, places, and manner of holding elections." The history of this provision shows that the object of inserting it in the Constitution was to enable the Federal Government to secure representation in Congress in case the States should neglect the performance of their duty in this respect. It would be a gross political solecism to suppose that a system of State and a system of Federal laws, in relation to elections, could be enforced at the same times and places without conflict and danger.

The duty of providing for free fair elections, and of providing for the punishment of those who violate election laws, undoubtedly devolves upon the States. To my mind it is a clear usurpation of power to authorize the marshals of the United States, and their regular and special deputies, and general and local supervisors, such as are provided for in these statutes, to interfere with elections under the authority of Federal laws, by making arrests, and especially by making them without the authority of an affidavit charging a violation of the law, and without a lawful warrant as required by the fourth amendment to the Constitution, which provides that "no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

There can be no doubt that so far as relates to elections for State and municipal officers such interference would amount to a usurpation of power. The usurpation of the power to do these things by the authority of the Federal Government rests upon the idea that the people are incapable of self-government; that they cannot be intrusted with the holding and conducting of elections; that they cannot be intrusted with the administration and enforcement of the laws to secure the purity of elections; and that this must be done by a power superior to them. This involves the idea of a government of force and the authority of the Federal Government to manage the affairs of the States. It is contrary to the theory and genius of our Government; it is contrary to the doctrines of the Constitution; it is subversive of popular liberty; it is destructive of the rights of the States. I claim, therefore, that it is just, wise, and necessary to repeal these laws.

On the third proposition, as to whether the plan proposed of inserting the provisions for the repeal of these laws in the appropriation bills is in accordance with the practice of Congress as it has heretofore prevailed, I submit the following:

In the act of 1872, making appropriations for the civil service, and the act of 1856, making appropriations for the support of the Army, the republicans in Congress voted to pass general legislation upon appropriation bills, that general legislation being of an aggressive and offensive character, while in the bills now before the House it is only proposed to repeal obnoxious laws. But the republicans are estopped from now denying the right of Congress to pass such laws in this form by their current and constant practice during all the years they have had the majority in both Houses of Congress, from 1861 to 1874, of habitually passing general laws in appropriation bills.

To make good this declaration I here present a tabulated statement of such instances of general legislation, extending from July 5, 1862, to March 3, 1875, giving, in the first column, the Department for which the appropriation was made, in the second column the date of the acts referred to, in the third column the volume and page of the laws, in the fourth column the numbers of the sections of the laws in which they occur, and in the fifth column the number of such acts of general legislation, aggregating in all 387. These were all passed during the twelve years that the republicans held a majority in each House.

Items of legislation in eighty-four bills				387

a Repeal of acts.
b Several clauses,
c Reorganizing Army.
d Appropriation for pier and railroad privilege.
e Civil-service reform.
f Parson Newman's mission.
g Giving jurisdiction over Alaska.
h Authorizing Secretary to sell vessels and materials.
i Tariff clause.
j Secretary of the Treasury authorized to buy bonds.

There may be many other such acts of general legislation on appropriation bills not of a general character. These are only such as are inserted in the regular appropriation bills, and they exhibit the hollowness of the pretense of the republicans now that such legislation is revolutionary, or that its tendency is to destroy or starve the Government, as urged by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and others. As an instance of legislation of this kind by the republican party, I call attention to the act of March 2, 1867, second session, (Statutes at Large, volume 14, pages 486, 487,) making appropriations for the support of the Army. It is as follows:

It fixes the headquarters of the General of the Army; and enacts that "all orders and instructions relating to military operations issued by the President or Secretary of War shall be issued through the General of the Army, and in case of his inability through the next in rank. The General of the Army shall not be removed, suspended, or relieved from command, or assigned to duty elsewhere than at said headquarters, except at his own request, without the previous approval of the Senate; and any orders or instructions relating to military operations issued contrary to the requirements of this section shall be null and void," and provides the penalties of disobedience, &c.

This was one of the acts of a republican Congress, intended to strip the President of his constitutional powers as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and to degrade him before the American people, because of his opposition to what he believed to be the unconstitutional and despotic measures of reconstruction, which he regarded as endangering the liberties and welfare of the whole country. It is the same party which now denounces general legislation in appropriation bills that passed this violent and unconsitutional act in an appropriation bill.

By the deficiency act of March 2, 1867, (section 3, page 470, volume 14 of the laws,) a tax was levied upon gaugeable goods.

By the Army appropriation bill of March 3, 1869, (Statutes at Large, volume 15, page 318,) in the sections from 3 to 7 inclusive, the Army organization is changed or modified.

In the sundry civil appropriation bill of July 15, 1870, section 12 appropriates $225,000 to build a pier in Delaware Bay, and section 13 authorizes the extension of a railroad over it and the free use of it.

In the sundry civil appropriation bill of March 3, 1871, (section 9, volume 16, page 514 of the laws,) provision is made for civil-service reform.

In the consular and diplomatic bill of July 11, 1870, (section 2, volume 16, page 221,) provision was made for Parson Newman's voyage around the globe at public expense, at a salary of $5,000 per year; a pleasure trip to him, but useless to the public.

In the sundry civil appropriation act of March 3, 1873, (volume 17, page 530,) provision is made for extending the laws of the United States to Alaska. In the naval appropriation act of May 23, 1873, (volume 17, page 154,) authority was given to the Secretary of the Navy to sell naval vessels, and in the sundry civil appropriation act of March 3, 1875, (volume 18, page 401,) section 11 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to give notice that he will redeem 6 per cent. bonds in coin at par for the sinking fund. These are given as a few instances to illustrate the character of legislation put by the republican party, when they controlled both Houses of Congress, on the appropriation bills, and it will be seen that as to many of these there can be no pretense that they are germane to the bills in which they were passed.

These references to the past course of the republican party on this subject ought to silence all statements by them of the revolutionary character and tendencies of general legislation on appropriation bills. We are solemnly notified by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that the passage of the two bills now pending with the proposed legislation attached to them will be "revolutionary and destructive of the Government; that it will starve the Government to death." Let us look at this statement. Are there any provisions of general legislation proposed in these bills which are unconstitutional? No lawyer familiar with the Constitution will so contend. Can the passage of either of them be regarded as hasty and inconsiderate legislation? They were discussed and passed through the House of Representatives at its last session, discussed in the Senate, then acted upon by the conference committees of the two Houses. They have received very full consideration before the beginning of this Congress, and are now undergoing a thorough examination in this; and there can be no pretense that they have not been and are not now being fully considered. They are therefore not open to either of these objections. They do not abridge the powers or interfere with the duties of any department of the Government. They do not propose to enact new and untried legislation. They simply propose to repeal legislation which is thought to be hurtful to the best interests of the country.

If under these circumstances a majority of the Senators representing the States of the Union and a majority of the Representatives of the people of the United States shall deem it wise and prudent to pass these bills, wherein can exist the act of revolution? How can this bring about the destruction of the Government? Has it come to this, that a political party which finds itself in a minority in both branches of Congress must resort to positions like that taken by the gentleman from Ohio to defeat proper and necessary legislation, under the false pretense that it will be fraught with dangers and evils to the country?

If the Senate and the House of Representatives pass these bills under such circumstances, have they not done so in the plain performance of their constitutional duty?

Are we to understand from the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio and of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] that they are instructed or authorized by the President of the United States to notify the Congress that if these bills are passed under these circumstances he will interpose his veto, and thus defeat two of the most important of the general appropriation bills; leave the Army, and the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government without the money necessary to carry them on; and that his act in so vetoing them must be considered an act of revolution by the Congress which passed them?

I do not believe, and I will not believe, that these gentlemen have the authority of the President to make any such statement before this House. I do not believe that they will give themselves as authority for any such statement by the President. Why, then, do they make the statement? Is it because they suppose they can act upon the fears of Representatives and Senators, and so drive them from the exercise of their reason and their constitutional functions as legislators?

No one could deplore more than I would a conflict between the executive and the legislative departments of the Government. I not only do not believe that these gentlemen are authorized by the President to say that he will veto these bills, but I prefer to presume and believe, and I do believe that the President will perform his constitutional duty in the examination of these bills after they shall have been passed, and approve or disapprove them as the Constitution, the laws, and character of the bills may justify. It is fair to presume that if Congress shall pass bills not obnoxious to constitutional objections—bills which cannot be considered as having been hastily or inconsiderately passed, and in which the legislative will is expressed, as it has been expressed in many instances by the republican party through its legislation while it had control of both branches of Congress, and is therefore sanctioned by usage and precedent, that the President will approve such bills, and allow the business of the Government to go regularly on.

It cannot be that the President would be guilty of sending a menace to Congress that they must only legislate in accordance with his will. This would be an act of attempted personal government unconstitutional in spirit, irregular and dangerous in its tendencies. I do not suppose the President has attempted, or will attempt, to invade the rights or interfere with the duties of Congress; and I should as much regret for the Congress to take any course which would interfere with the regular discharge of the duties of the executive office or in any way menace or threaten the President in the discharge of his duties.

Surely upon a mere question of policy, in the interest of a party, the President of the whole people would not throw the Government into confusion and cut off the supply of money for several of the most important Departments of Government as a piece of mere political management for political and partisan effect; and, if he would not do this, what other reason does or can exist for the threat that he will veto these bills if passed? These gentlemen have not used the direct words "that the President will veto these measures," but they have told us that the passage of these bills "would be revolutionary and would starve the Government to death," and have left us no other conclusion than that a veto under these circumstances by the President would be charged as a fault upon Congress, and the responsibility be visited upon Congress for the manner in which the President might discharge the duties of his high office toward the whole people. The foregoing facts, I submit, clearly establish my third proposition. I propose to detain the House a few minutes longer to place these matters in a still clearer light.

On the consideration of an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill of 1872 to amend the enforcement act of February 28, 1871, relating to the appointment and duties of supervisors of election and deputy marshals and their powers and duties, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] said, as will be seen on page 4440 of the RECORD of that date, in resisting the efforts of the minority to defeat that amendment:

> Now, the committee of conference having brought in a report under the rules, I do now insist and shall continue to demand that the bill before the House shall be acted on; and against all factious and revolutionary resistance I propose to stand, if need be, until December next, until this appropriation bill shall be considered, shall be voted on, voted up or voted down. This must be done, or we abandon and surrender the right of parliamentary government in this country. We inflict a serious if not a fatal wound upon the freedom and efficiency of the National Legislature.

It will thus be seen that he then denounced as factious and revolutionary the efforts of a minority to prevent the adoption of a provision of general legislation on an appropriation bill; and he declared then, what if true is as true to-day as it was then, that for a majority in such a case to yield to the minority would be to abandon and "surrender the right of parliamentary government in this country, and would inflict a serious if not a fatal wound on the freedom and efficiency of the National Legislature."

I ask the question, does he entertain the same opinions now, and if so, will he aid a minority to make a factious opposition to the will of the majority and endeavor to compel that majority to "surrender the right of parliamentary government," and will he now aid in inflicting "a serious if not a fatal wound upon the freedom and efficiency of the National Legislature" by resisting the efforts of the majority to pass provisions of law free from constitutional objections?

He now says it is revolutionary and destructive of the Government for us to advocate the adoption of provisions on appropriation bills which are intended to secure the freedom and purity of election and to preserve the rights and liberties of citizens and to prevent oppression and fraud under color of law. We might well infer from the conspicuous antagonism of his views and action now with his views and action on the bill of 1872, above referred to, that he regards everything as factious, revolutionary, and even as destructive of the Government which for the time being is not in accord with his peculiar political opinions and with the supposed interests of the political party to which he belongs. I suggest with all deference that he might well consider whether he is not overplaying his high tragedy and converting it into a farce, in thus so conveniently resisting the dangers of revolution in supporting and opposing exactly the opposite sides of the same political question by calling his adversaries revolutionists.

Another distinguished republican, Mr. Bingham, of Ohio, now a foreign minister, in the discussion of the above-named measure of 1872 used the following language:

I have only been protesting against any right on the part of the minority in this House to indefinitely postpone the right of the majority to pass laws as revolutionary.

So it is seen that he, too, agreed with the gentleman from Ohio in holding that it was revolutionary for a minority of this House to oppose the purpose of the majority to put general legislation on an appropriation bill; thus agreeing with this gentleman's former opinion and being against his present opinion, and in so far showing a weight of republican authority against his present opinion, which may allow our alarm to be a little quieted in spite of his startling cries of revolution. It may also allow us to suppose that he much more fears the effect of just laws and fair elections upon the future of his party than the revolution which he so vehemently proclaims as the anticipated result of the repeal of oppressive and un-American and anti-republican and partisan statutes. And it is notable that this very act of 1872 was passed by the republican majority in both Houses in the sundry civil appropriation act.

But the gentleman has still higher support for his former view of this subject, and still stronger condemnation by his own party friends of his present opinions. The republicans of this House, by a strict party vote, put the following proviso on the Army appropriation bill of 1856:

Provided, however, and it is hereby declared, That no part of the military force of the United States, for the support of which appropriations are made by this act, shall be employed in aid of the enforcement of any enactment of the body claiming to be the territorial Legislature of Kansas until such enactment shall have been affirmed and approved by Congress. And this proviso shall not be so construed as to prevent the President from employing an adequate military force; but it shall be his duty to employ such force to prevent invasion of said Territory by armed bands of non-residents, or any other body of non-residents, acting, or claiming to act, as a posse comitatus of any officer in said Territory in the enforcement of any such enactment, and to protect the persons and property therein, and upon the national highways leading to said Territory, from all unlawful searches and seizures; and it shall be his further duty to take efficient measures to compel the return of and withhold all arms of the United States distributed in or to said Territory in pursuance of any law of the United States authorizing the distribution of arms to the States and Territories.

This proviso was placed upon the Army appropriation bill of 1856 by the republicans of the House, then in a majority, sent to the Senate, was there stricken out, and upon a conference the two Houses failed to agree, and failing to agree adjourned without an appropriation for the support of the Army for that year because the republicans insisted on putting such independent legislation on the Army appropriation bill. No higher evidence of their belief that their course was right could well have been produced than that they were willing to adjourn without an appropriation rather than surrender the right to put this proviso on the appropriation bill.

Their course upon this bill is in harmony with their habit of putting general legislation on appropriation bills during all the years in which they had majorities in both branches of Congress. An examination of the debates of Congress through many years shows that while the two parties have alternately occupied each side of this question, and enforced with great ability their respective views, still the great fact exists that this plan of putting general legislation in the appropriation bills has steadily gone on from year to year, under all parties and under all administrations.

I think it fair, in conclusion, to assume that the real issue, whatever else may be pretended, is upon the policy and effect of the repeals proposed in these bills. I do not doubt that the republican party relies and intends to rely upon the use of the military at the polls to intimidate and overawe voters; by the use of the test-oath for Federal jurors to enable them to pack juries in certain States and to secure indictments and convictions contrary to law, partly to influence elections in those States, but more particularly to furnish material on which to carry on sectional agitation in the Northern States; and on the action of the marshals and supervisors, under the authority they now have, to intimidate, arrest, and drive voters from the polls and prevent them from voting, as a means of carrying elections.

I do believe that but for the political advantage they expect to derive from the use of this partisan machinery and the public moneys which support them they would not be likely to make serious resistance to the repeal of these partisan laws. I do know that the democrats insist upon the repeal of these laws, because they regard their repeal as necessary to restore the constitutional methods on this subject, because they regard it as necessary to secure fair and free elections and to obtain a just expression and ascertain the true will of the people at the polls, and thus to preserve in its purity our system of government. And I believe their course will be approved and vindicated by the judgment of the American people.

Mr. HAWK. Mr. Chairman, being a new member of this Congress, I had not thought to say one word upon this question; but the discussion having assumed such a general scope, and becoming convinced that the consideration of the questions arising upon the discussion of section 6 of this bill must necessarily involve many of the points at issue in the consideration of the appropriation bill soon to follow, I have concluded to crave your indulgence for a few moments while I shall present some of the suggestions presented to my mind during the progress of this debate.

The chief reason, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, why the repeal of the sections of the Revised Statutes mentioned should be opposed is that such repeal is plainly against the best interests of the country in the preservation of the purity and sacredness of the ballot. Surely, based as is our system of government upon the free, untrammeled vote and the intelligence of the citizen, it will be impossible to throw too many safeguards around this precious fundamental prerogative.

Why, indeed, should gentlemen oppose the enforcement of peace at the polls? It is answered that the States may and should be the only power to regulate elections and protect the citizen in the discharge of this high function; that municipal law alone should be relied upon for the care, protection, and preservation of the purity of the ballot-box, and not Federal authority. But, Mr. Chairman, has it not been demonstrated to the entire and complete satisfaction of all observing, thinking men that the State authorities are either powerless or unwilling to protect a certain class of citizens in the untrammeled discharge of this fundamental function? For the answer to this we have but to turn over the leaves of the book of history written in the South during the last ten years. As has been said upon this floor, a book of the examples of violence growing out of elections at the South might be written and then fail to present a full statement of horrible crimes and foul murders.

We are told there is still a war of races in certain sections of the country; that notwithstanding the express declaration of the Constitution that the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, a distinction is still preserved. The letter of the Constitution in this respect is all well enough, but I submit to every gentleman upon this floor whether, in effect, this constitutional provision is not at every election in the South ignored and overridden by a more powerful law than a written constitution; that public sentiment, without the existence of State law, in effect makes this provision null; that there is a distinction preserved, if not expressly on the grounds prohibited by the Constitution, it is incidentally done. Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to the protection of these certain citizens, ostracised, cut off, and neutralized by intimidation and mob rule, it was found in 1865 to be necessary to apply force in order to the free exercise of this first principle of citizenship. Hence that clause of the law now sought to be repealed was placed upon the statute-book. In other words, it became necessary for the strong arm of the Government to be interposed to preserve peace at the polls. There certainly must have been some necessity for the enactment. And what was the necessity? It arose in the emergency then as now existing in certain portions of the country, upon appeals and representations made that the State authorities were utterly powerless or unwilling to protect the citizen at the polls; and this condition of the country being made manifest the power invested in the Executive through this instrument for executing the law, the Army, was invoked and used in laudably and properly protecting the weak against the encroachments of the strong and lawless.

Where, I ask, is the great wrong in this? Why, sir, the Government of the United States can at any moment call upon, nay more, it can drag its citizen from home and family and place him in the front rank of its Army for the protection of the nation against foreign encroachment or domestic disturbance; and it would most certainly be a poor Government indeed that could not, or, having the power, would not, protect the rights of the same citizen in the all-important function of casting a ballot for the person or party of his choice. But it is urged that there have been abuses of this power. This is, however, no argument against the justice of the claims of citizens to full protection. The Ten Commandments are broken every day; but this is no reason why they should be repealed. They are inherently right, and must remain so forever. So with the law protecting the citizen in his right to cast his ballot at the polls without intimidation from any source whatever; and he has a perfect right to demand of his Government that protection. And this being his just and proper claim, it will be a sorry day for American institutions and American liberty when this boon is refused. Who ever knew a soldier of the Republic stationed at the polls anywhere to tamper with the voter in the legitimate discharge of his duty as an elector? I have failed to learn of one single instance in which any person in the plain, straightforward discharge of his duty at the polls has ever been interfered with in the least.

Riotous conduct should of course be condemned, put down, stamped out; it matters little what the force used, so long as liberty is not tampered with more than it may be crushed out by the vindictive hatred of caste. And no man, just to himself and the best interests of the country, who is attached to the broad ideas and principles of republican government, should oppose for one moment the throwing around this important and high prerogative all the safeguards possible.

I am inclined to the opinion that gentlemen on the other side are not so anxious to be relieved of the presence of troops on account of their encroachments upon their rights as citizens of States as they are anxious to do away with the use of the Army at elections on account of the boldness the presence of the military guardians begets in the actions of our black fellow-citizens on election day.

I am surprised that in tacking these repealing clauses upon appropriation bills gentlemen cannot understand that it is nothing short of a revolutionary measure. It says, in forcible and unmistakable language, that these laws, considered obnoxious, must be repealed to contribute to the political success of a particular party, or the wheels of Government must stop.

You quote English precedent for thus threatening the Government with destruction if your demands be not complied with; but, Mr. Chairman, while such policy was doubted at the time by the best minds and finest statesmen of the period, the demand was truly in the interests of the people and against the encroachments of royalty, while the demand of gentlemen on the other side is opposed to the protection of the dearest interests of the nation and liberty, and in favor of the precipitation of the worst anarchy upon the country.

The States having shown that they are powerless under political pressure to protect the citizen, it is not only just and right but it is the unqualified duty of the Executive to use his power through the Army for the protection which the State fails or has not the ability to exercise. Gentlemen on the other side have made the startling declaration that they being in the majority in both branches of Congress, hence representatives of a majority of the people, therefore the Executive has no right in this case to exercise the veto power vested in him by the Constitution. If this be correct doctrine, when, let me ask gentlemen, is this power to be exercised by the President? The only time it could ever be necessary to use such power is when the majorities in Congress shall be opposed to the policy or preconceived ideas of right, law, and justice of the President. The veto power is guaranteed to the Executive on purpose for use in such an emergency as the present, and should he choose to exercise this power on this particular occasion, I for one must confess that I cannot see why it will not be constitutional and legal for him to so use it. I would not be understood as prejudging the Executive in this particular instance, but merely present that it is his legal, his constitutional right, and urge that the position taken in this regard by gentlemen on the other side is without law or precedent and not warranted.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] assured the House yesterday that he had faith in the strength of the Government, and it appeared to this side to be a most remarkable statement. A gentleman, a Congressman of the United States, making the bold (?) assertion that he has faith in the Government, thus assuring the country that there is no doubt of the strength, the stability, the perpetuity of the nation under its peculiar organization! The gentleman having no doubt tested thoroughly its adhesive power by the last resort of nations is a most proper person to bear testimony to the strength of the Republic. I commend his faith in the stability of the Government to the general consideration of his colleagues on the other side. It, however, appears in bad taste for gentlemen, after using all the power and machinery of devastating war for the destruction of the Government, to so eulogize its strength while they propose to clutch it by the throat and demand accession to their terms or accept the only other alternative, starvation; that certain laws now on the statute-books must be repealed, or the machinery of government must stop; and these demands, too, by gentlemen who owe their existence, certainly their restoration to full citizenship after a voluntary relinquishment of the same, to the clemency and forbearance of that Government. We search history in vain for a precedent. We forgave you frankly, freely, for your national sin, and you in return repay us in threats, menaces, dictation.

Mr. Chairman, if these repealing clauses have any merits in them, why do not the gentlemen put them upon their passage on their merits? I have no doubt but this side would be at least magnanimous enough to meet the gentlemen in a fair, open discussion of the merits of these laws and their contemplated repeal, and abide the decision; but to accede to their repeal, standing as they do as a threat, a menace to the country and the republican party, we will not, we cannot yield one inch. The responsibility is with the gentlemen on the other side, and they must accept it before the country. An appeal to the voting millions will in 1880 demonstrate that the people will not permit their rights to be tampered with. And why should not the repeal of these so-called "obnoxious laws" be the test in the contest of 1880? Why may we not submit the debates upon these questions in Congress and go to the country in the next presidential contest, appealing to the people to sustain the laws as they now exist or indicate at the ballot-box then that it is their judgment the time has been reached in our history when we do not need these so-called safeguards to liberty?

This is certainly fair and just, and both the great parties can afford to wait the voice and vote of the citizens at the polls in two years for the decision of this all-important question. Gentlemen upon this floor on the other side of this House should not forget that they are enacting or placing upon record precedent that may not be so easily explained and disposed of in the coming history of legislation in this country. Your tenure of power hangs by a fickle thread even now, and two years may find your party in the position of a suppliant minority; then, having shown your aptitude for using power for partisan purposes, it may be that we of this side may be able to profit by your lesson.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the committee longer. My desire is that every republican on this floor shall place himself fairly and squarely upon the record, and stand firmly to the principles of truth, right, justice, and free, pure government, relying upon the good sense and sterling patriotism of the country for support in this hour of great emergency.

Mr. ARMFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the Representatives of the people in two Congresses have declared that the freedom of elections from the control of the Federal Government and the unabridged right of every citizen to a trial by his peers in the Federal courts must be restored; that two of the most dangerous wounds inflicted upon our free institutions by an unhappy civil war must now, after a lapse of more than twelve years of peace, be healed by the hand of legislation. Few of those who have opposed these measures in this debate have denied that they are right in themselves, or that if they could be achieved by the concurrent action of Congress and the Executive it would be "a consummation devoutly to be wished;" but they assume, upon what authority I know not, that this cannot be done, and they attempt to frighten us out of registering the will of those who sent us here by asserting that if we proceed the President will place himself before us like a lion in our path; that rather than allow these laws to be repealed, which are daily eating into the vitals of our Constitution, he will by vetoing the appropriation bills to which they are attached stop the wheels of Government and throw the country and its institutions into chaos.

And then they turn these fearful threats of disaster upon us and charge us with being revolutionists and enemies to the country and its Government; not for what we have done or propose to do, but for what they say the President will do unless we surrender our own convictions of duty and the rights and liberties of the people to their clamor. Ought we to anticipate any such line of conduct for the President? Ought we not to assume, until the contrary conclusion is forced upon us, that the President is as patriotic as we are, and that he will join us cordially and zealously in our effort in this era of restored good-will between the good men of all sections of the country to repair the ravages which civil war and the passions engendered by it have made upon the fundamental principles of our Constitution? Or ought we not to assume, for the present at least, that should the President differ from us as to the aptness of the time or appropriateness of the method in which we propose to repeal these laws, yet that he will obey the Constitution which he has sworn to obey both in its letter and its spirit? And that letter and that spirit is, Mr. Chairman, that the President shall veto no law passed by Congress except for one of two reasons: first, that it is unconstitutional; second, that it is hasty or inconsiderate; and no man will, I presume, have the hardihood to assert that it is unconstitutional to repeal a law, be that law in itself good or bad, constitutional or unconstitutional; and it would require almost equal boldness to assert that legislation which has been deliberately enacted by two successive Houses of Representatives of the United States and by one Senate, and after full discussion in the press of the country, is either hasty or inconsiderate.

Mr. Chairman, the things for which we are now contending are neither abstractions nor sentamentalisms; they are the right of trial by impartial, intelligent juries, the rock on which Anglo-Saxon liberty was built, and without which it cannot exist one hour, the last refuge of the citizen from the oppression of the Government and the tyranny of the judge; and the freedom of elections which has given that liberty the power to perpetuate itself in the vigor of perpetual youth.

Take these from our political institutions and you leave nothing worth preserving; you leave them "with a name to live while they are dead." These are rights which, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] said of the Christian religion, "are too precious to be delegated to anybody." The States and their citizens must hold these against the Federal Government, or they surrender their liberties to its discretion. To require of jurors before they shall be permitted to enter the jury-box to take an oath which few honorable white men, born and resident during the late war between the States in any part of one large division of this Union, is to make of the trial by jury "a delusion and a snare," is to convert the most effectual safeguard of the rights of a free people into a wicked engine of oppression. To give to the United States Government the right to "keep the peace at the polls" is to give it the power to make, as it has made, that peace the "peace that reigned at Warsaw," a peace sweet to tyrants, but to the liberties of the people the peace of death.

But, Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the House are charged with attempting a revolution of the Government. Such a charge is unfounded and unjust, and the gentlemen on the other side mistake the credulity of the American people when they make it. We attempt no revolution, unless it be revolution by the peaceful methods of the Constitution, sanctioned by the precedents of past legislation in this country and approved by many examples set by both the existing political parties, to repeal laws that, by the confession of the best and wisest men on both sides of this Chamber, are now useless; laws which we and a majority of the American people believe are a standing menace to the existence of our free institutions.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened attentively for several days with considerable interest and some surprise at the elaborate and well digested speeches delivered with so much zeal and earnestness on the other side of the House. If I may be permitted, however, I undertake to say that if you will divest the great number of words spoken of three prominent ideas cropping out through all of the several efforts of distinguished gentlemen to which this House has listened so patiently, you will find an immense number of Anglo-Saxon words gathered together, locked in beautiful grammatical phraseology, splendid diction, and with very little solid reason or merit. Most of what has been said on the other side is upon the hypothesis or prevailing idea that in the President is concentrated all the sovereign powers of the nation, and that this Government was founded and has been perpetuated for the sole benefit and shield of the republican party, and that no one not a member of that august body, and not on the stool of repentance asking admission therein, is entitled to the privileges, protection, and benefits of the constitution, and that the much abused terms "Government and Constitution" are only synonyms for "republican party and President." This is a very great mistake. In their passion and zeal for the success of the creeds and theories to which they are wedded, I fear they have allowed their prejudices to overbear their judgments. We have been charged on this side of the Hall as revolutionists. The charges or insinuations are utterly untrue in every sense of the word, as well as the charge that we have once attempted to shoot the Government out of existence and now we are attempting to starve it to death. I presume no intelligent gentleman on this floor will listen to such nonsense, not even the honorable gentleman who in the heat of debate gave utterance to such inconsiderate language. It is easy to comprehend the whole scope and scheme of the opposition to the measure now under consideration.

It has been recorded in history that the Southern States were reconstructed. If this is true, and I presume it will not be successfully denied, we have some interest and some reconstructed rights in the public administration of this Government. I make no distinction between northern and southern democrats because the honorable gentlemen include us all in the same category. We are a part of this Government, and have endeavored to act within the limits of the Constitution; nor have we claimed any extraordinary construction for that instrument, insisting and demanding that it shall be construed as its framers designed and as the best legal minds and ablest constitutional expounders have heretofore construed it. All this furor and fulmination about starving the Government out of existence and revolution is nothing more nor less than the dying agonies of a party who have already read the inscription upon the wall and who are now realizing that the scepter has departed from Judah and the lawmaker from between his feet. Therefore it is not strange that they mourn and make known their deep grief in lamentations to their afflicted brethren who have been compelled by the uprising of an outraged people to relinquish their hold on the national heart from which they derived their life-blood. Neither to us nor to the country have the honorable gentlemen assigned reasons for their desperate efforts against this measure, save and except they say it is not the usual way of repealing statutes and therefore is "revolutionary" and strikes at the heart of the nation. This same clause proposed to be tacked to an appropriation bill was so tacked in 1865 to an appropriation bill and thus became a law, and nothing was heard of revolution then from our friends. The proposition is to repeal it in the same manner as it became a law.

Nothing was heard then from the other side of the House of its criminality and revolutionary tendency by becoming a rider to an appropriation bill; but now the eye that was blind can see the mote in the eyes of others with such perception and penetration as to magnify it into a mountain of monstrous proportions. Mr. Chairman, it is assumed upon the other side of the Hall that the Executive will exercise the veto power in case this bill should pass both Houses in its present shape, and that the result of such action will be to stop the whole Government machinery and thereby destroy the Government by withholding supplies. Unless the other side are in the secrets of the Executive they have neither a moral, legal, nor constitutional right to make such an assumption; but, upon the contrary, every presumption, legal, moral, and equitable, is against such a violent conclusion. Precedents, custom, right, justice, fair dealing, the Constitution, and his oath of office, are all against such an unreasonable and unjust assumption of power on the part of the President. On the other hand, if the Executive has informed his political friends that he will veto this bill, or has even intimated to them that such would be his policy, he is guilty of a great breach of courtesy to the legislative department and it smacks of dictation to the legislative branch of the Government, and, if I mistake not, is in violation of the spirit of the Constitution and his oath of office. If no such information or intimation has been given a great injustice has been indirectly inflicted upon the President in the course of this discussion. To prevent an infringement of the Constitution and to prevent hasty and injudicious legislation it is his imperative duty to fall back upon this extraordinary power (veto) which was granted to him in the Constitution for these purposes and for no other.

But this grant of power has never been resorted to and exercised by any Executive to prevent the repeal of a law demanded by a majority of both Houses since the foundation of the Government, and I cannot believe any honest, intelligent man, who has been honored by promotion to the highest position in the gift of fifty millions of people, will so far disregard the will of the people and a majority of both Houses as to exercise this power for the purpose of thwarting, defeating, and contravening the will of the majority, for it could not in this case be used, I apprehend, for any other purpose, because from the very foundation to the key-stone, acknowledged and declared by both parties and every section, is the "majority rule." This is no unconstitutional or hasty legislation. It was thoroughly considered and canvassed by the last Congress, by the newspapers both North and South, and has been most earnestly, eloquently, and ably discussed and investigated by this Congress. Therefore I conclude there is no constitutional, legal, moral, or equitable obligation resting on the Executive to use the veto power to prevent the repeal of a law that found its way upon the statute-book in a time of great political excitement and emergency, when the Republic was just emerging from the most gigantic and stupendous civil and military strife recorded upon the pages of history or in the annals of the world; when brother had barely ceased to thirst for brother's blood, when section was arrayed and enraged against section, when wild fury and mad passion had been engendered by four years of fratricidal and internecine conflict, and when the Republic was extending its arms over mountain into valley, from lake to gulf, from ocean to ocean, to protect its citizens. These are the circumstances under which this act became a law, necessary it may have been then, odious and detestable it is now.

Should an Executive attempt to defeat the express will of a majority of the people without cogent and powerful reasons, he would appear more in the attitude of a tyrant dictating terms to a fallen and conquered foe than the chief ruler of a free and independent people. Should one man assume voluntarily, as it would be in this case, such grave responsibility as to stop the wheels of the Republic, and misfortune should follow, remorse would forever cling to his conscience, and a just and righteous verdict of a proud, intelligent, and independent people would consign him and his party to oblivion's retreat, where the hand of resurrection could never reach them. But it is none of our concern what the Executive will or will not do. Congress is the law making and repealing power, and the Executive the power to have them put into execution, with a supervisory power residing in the judiciary to see that they be constitutional. The honorable gentleman need not remind this House of the evil results that might flow from the anticipated act of the President; it will neither drive nor lead from an honest and faithful discharge of duty; we will perform our duty to the country and let them assume the responsibility of defeating the will of the majority and, if you please, as they say, destroying the Government. I plant myself on this rock and say, in the language of the valiant Fitz-James:

> Come one, come all, this rock shall fly
> From its firm base as soon as I.

These threats vanish like empty bubbles upon the air. It may be the eloquent, vehement, and threatening speeches made on the other side of the House are intended more to infuse political and party fire into the national mind, to madden and poison the national heart against democratic predominance, now in its infancy, as to this generation, and to aid in building up a centralized Federal power on this continent, than to convince this body that great wrong and outrage are about to be perpetrated by the predominant party. I will suggest to the honorable gentlemen who oppose this measure that such unfounded and pretended reasoning might not affect the great issues pending before the people, and it may not carry conviction to the intelligent, patriotic mind North, and that the gentlemen themselves are very serious in the wanton and defiant assertions as to the danger to the Union from this side of the Hall. Are there not on this side of the Chamber captains, colonels, and generals who stood in the foremost ranks of the Union Army, who were reared from the cradle to love, honor, and defend the Union? All this talk about revolution is sheer nonsense, thinner than moonshine. All that is asked is to strike out eight words from the statute to prevent the President from using the Army at the polls on the day of the election. We are told this would destroy the Government. Before this could happen national pride, national manhood, and national patriotism would sweep over this land of ours in a tidal wave and drive the President from the White House and this Congress from this Capitol. Some on this side of the Chamber have been courteously and adroitly reminded that in 1861 they attempted to destroy the Union, and that the dominant party compelled them to desist and return to their first love. This is very ungracious and uncharitable.

Gentlemen of the republican party do not deserve all the honor and glory of a restored Union. Northern democracy, as I can testify, did as noble and gallant fighting as any troops ever did or ever could. As to myself I went with my State, to her I gave my services; for the part I took in the strife I have no apology to offer. But after the conflict ended you of the North restored us to the rights of our fathers, and we shook hands in forbearance and love, and agreed not to resurrect the buried memories of the unfortunate and bloody past, and to forgive and forget. In your efforts to save the Union you were actuated by noble and patriotic impulses; we were as honest and sincere. Time and history have demonstrated that you were right and we were wrong. Here the chapter ought to have ended. You declared the Union restored to its former glory and the war numbered with the things that had been. Now, if this is true, why with a fiendish hand reach forth to disturb the sacred bones of the honored dead? Let them sleep on where misfortune has laid them—

Till it shall be morn in the grave to bid the sleepers rise.

The uplifting in your distempered imaginations the bleeding and mangled forms of your noble and gallant dead will not prolong your lease of power. Providence in His inscrutible wisdom and unlimited mercy has decreed your downfall. You have been extremely disobedient to the commands of justice, and your final destruction has been long delayed to give room for repentance and reformation, but they came not, and you must pay the severe penalty of your many transgressions. The order has been issued by the voices of near fifty millions of people, and it would be more dignified and becoming to step down and out in silent submission and quietly surrender the control of the nation into other and better hands, who will be required upon conviction, after being tried and found wanting, to follow in your footsteps. You have our sympathies in your sorrows and lamentations over your lost fortunes, blasted hopes, and future uncertainties; but a stern sense of honor and duty to the Union of the States and to the verdict of the people and love for the Constitution constrain us to restrain our sympathy for our fallen brethren and dispense with or release you for a period at least from the responsibility of making laws, and bid you God speed in all that is great, noble, and glorious; and I trust, gentlemen, while you are in the minority, you will learn to follow that golden rule, so often departed from in this degenerate age, to do unto others as you would have them do unto you. And let me ask of you in your sober moments to ever remember that the bail you required of the South for her good behavior was excessive in the extreme, the fines you imposed upon us were intolerable, and the punishment you inflicted was both cruel and inhuman.

The honorable gentleman from Maine says Grant sent the southerners home from Appomattox saying, "behave yourselves and I will take care of you." Had we been put into the hands of the noble and gallant Union soldiers who met us upon a hundred hard-fought battlefields and measured strength and courage with us, the wounds and sores of the war would have long since been healed and forgotten. But we were placed in the hands of politicians who never encountered death nor shed any of their precious blood for the life of the Union. And what was the result? Morality, Christianity, intelligence, honesty, wealth, and experience were driven from the legislative halls, from the judiciary, the Executive Departments, and every other place of authority throughout the whole South, and there were substituted in their stead the very dregs and scum of northern and southern society, men without honor, virtue, or one redeeming trait of character, who organized the colored man against his former master and bound him in midnight conclaves under a solemn obligation to support the republican party, resulting in the alienation of the two races who ought to have been friends; and under the leadership of these unprincipled men, blood-suckers, and political buzzards was inaugurated the most gigantic scheme of plunder and despoliation throughout the whole South ever known in this country up to that time, and then General Grant's promise was fulfilled in the same spirit and manner in which the vulture protects the lambs, "covering and devouring them."

And the bad faith with which these carpet-baggers and scalawags acted toward the colored man caused him to spew them out of his mouth, and, thank God, most of them out of the States; and thus the respectable and honest colored men of the South lost confidence in the republican party, as it appears the whole country has; and these are the reasons why you have no party South, and why the South is solid. And another prominent reason why both Houses are democratic today is that the people, the fountain from which all power is derived, have discovered that the republican party, instead of giving them more freedom, was legislating away and usurping what they had, as is made manifest on this floor by every speaker on the other side of the House. If the doctrine be true, as claimed, that the President has power and that it is his duty to superintend the polls on election days with his Army, with his supervisors and sub-supervisors, and marshals and submarshals, in times of profound peace when there is not a hostile foot on the American soil, and that, too, without being called upon by the governors or Legislatures of the States, then, gentlemen, you had as well blot out the States from the maps of your country and have one consolidated government in name as well as in fact, and save the enormous expense of running thirty-eight State governments robbed of their authority and power and stripped of all their reserved rights. Then you will have what the other side of the House demands—a grand, consolidated military government hedged in by the lakes and gulfs and the two oceans, with a platoon of soldiers in every neighborhood. I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that there is but one constitutional way whereby the President of the United States can use the Army at the polls in any State, and that is at the request of the Legislature, or the governor if the Legislature cannot be convened in times of peace, or by the marshals under judicial process.

Mr. Chairman, the gist or gravamen of this measure hangs on the fourth article and fourth section of the Constitution of the United States, which reads as follows:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of Government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

Here is a State admitted in the Union under legal and constitutional forms, with a constitution not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. She elects all her officers, from a constable to a governor. The machinery is put in motion; the day of the next election arrives; not a hostile foot presses her soil; but a riot takes place at the polls. Will any lawyer contend that the President, before the power of the State is exhausted, or before the governor or the Legislature, as the case may be, demands it, can send the Army to the State to quell it? If the State has at the time a republican form of government, then neither President nor Congress can constitutionally interfere unless the governor or the Legislature should request it, because the State has that which the United States has guaranteed—a republican form of government. As to the execution of the State laws the President has no power unless called on by the governor or Legislature. If such power was vested in the President, all any President would have to do to secure his own re-election or that of a friend would be to send troops to all the precincts or to enough to turn the scales and dictate how each elector should vote, and he need not do this in so many words, for bayonets speak a language, in the hands of soldiers, that cannot be mistaken. I am opposed to the bayonet rule. I want the military subordinate to the civil power, and unless that be so the rights of the people are gone forever.

The President of the United States has no power granted him in the Constitution to aid in the execution of State laws unless requested to do so by State authority, and when he attempts it he is without and above the Constitution and is a law unto himself, and at once becomes a usurper and a master instead of a servant. State laws are exclusively and absolutely under the control of State authority when they do not come in conflict with the Federal Constitution, and then they are void. Federal laws are under the absolute and supreme control of Federal authority and must be enforced by Federal officials just as State laws must be enforced by State officials. Neither can infringe upon the other; both are independent sovereign powers within their constitutional limits. All powers not expressly granted to the General Government are reserved to the people, and no power can be implied; and we find nowhere in the Constitution power given to the President to use the Army in the States, except in the fourth article, to guarantee a republican government and defend it against foreign invasion and, at the request of the State, against domestic violence. If it were otherwise, there would always be conflict between State and Federal authority. If the State law is violated, State courts take jurisdiction and punish; if the Federal law is broken, Federal courts do the same, and each is perfectly independent of the other. If the President has a constitutional right to keep the peace at the polls on election day with the Army, he has the same constitutional right to maintain the peace all over the States, and all the time; thus we would have two independent sets of officers at the same time to perform the same duty.

One more word and I am done. The gentleman from Tennessee asserted that the South was largely republican and if protected would send a republican delegation to this House. This is a mistake, and it is one of those of which Talleyrand says, "they are worse than crimes," a mistake which causes a southern man to call for soldiers to watch his fellow-citizens when they exercise the rights of freemen. And he seems very much outraged because he had no colored men from the South by his side. He lives in a large republican district in East Tennessee. Why did not the gentleman give us a living witness on this floor of the truth of his doctrine by staying home and sending a colored gentleman here to occupy his seat? He had the opportunity and power to do so. The honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] too, expressed great feeling for his absent colored friends. I say to the gentleman, set us the example by staying home and sending the colored brethren from your districts North and we will send five from the South for every one you send from the North. The great glory and beauty of our Government consists in its capacity to protect each and all its citizens upon its territory, and under its flag, without infringing the rights of any or encroaching upon the constitution of any State or violating its own. Our form of government stands today the wonder and admiration of the civilized world in consequence of its twofold character. When the relative rights of our duplex system of government are ignored or overborne by either the States or Federal Government, then American liberty will perish and the night of political chaos will come down and settle, it may be forever, upon the noblest and most hopeful fabric of human government ever reared by our race.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, it is no very pleasant duty to travel over a burnt district of debate; but however unpleasant it may be to my feelings, I am impelled by a sense of duty to trespass further upon the patience of the committee. I do not think that any apology ought to be made for the debate which is now in progress. I feel sure that the people of this country will sympathize deeply in the discussion. I feel that they will be not only interested but instructed, and will be enabled to adopt a policy for the administration of this Government which otherwise they would not adopt.

I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] as to the division of the political powers of the Government. Heretofore, in 1871, I stated the general theory that there are three great estates of power. The people, being the sources of all power, have delegated a portion to the State government, another portion to the Government of the United States, and have reserved to themselves the residuum. Without the expression of this power there is no vitality, no animation in this Government. Without the expression of this power there can be no State government, no Federal Government, no President, no Member of Congress. Power only departs from the people for a short time to return quickly at stated intervals. Within two years every member upon this floor will meet his political death. The power will return to the people. They have adopted a Constitution by which they have not only reserved but intended to retain that power in themselves. The Constitution which they have adopted is intended to act upon the legislative body, and the laws passed in pursuance thereof upon the great body of the people themselves. They are jealous of that power; they have not only put a short limitation upon it, but they have bound the consciences of members of this body with oaths. They have bound their President with an oath. They have clothed him with a veto power. Indeed, every facility has been resorted to in the machinery of the Government for the purpose of securing its fair administration.

With these preliminary remarks permit me to add that I do not propose to go back and discuss the causes of our unfortunate civil war. I believe with the great publicist, Mr. Halleck, with Vattel, and others, that after a treaty of peace and the cessation of hostilities the peace is to be perpetual, because there is no common arbiter who is authorized to decide the moral right or wrong of the cause of the quarrel. As I have studiously avoided heretofore any discussion of the grounds of dispute involved in the late war, I intend still to pursue that policy. I propose that there shall be a perpetual peace. I do not propose to tear the seal from the civil strife which has been healed. Were I to do so and invoke a renewal of our former strife I should feel myself as wicked as the man who would unbar the gates of hell and unchain the devil upon the earth.

But while this is so, it is not only proper, but it is a duty which we owe to ourselves and to the people, to inquire what is the true condition of the country and what should be the policy pursued in the faithful administration of the Constitution and the laws. This, Mr. Chairman, brings us to confront the question which is at this time before the Congress of the United States and the American people. It is simply a proposition to repeal a short clause in section 2008 of the Revised Statutes limiting the use of the military power of this Government at elections held under the authority of the laws of the States. Now, Mr. Chairman, I propose to address myself to the argument of this question. I propose to meet every proposition face to face and grapple with it in a fair and candid spirit.

It is asserted on the other side of the House that the repeal or modification of this law, as now proposed in the bill before us, is "revolutionary" in its character. I submit the proposition that if it be conceded that the law as it stands was a legislative act, that concession remits the right to a subsequent Congress for its repeal. It is not like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unchangeable and inflexible in character. If it be legislative in its enactment it is also legislative in its repeal. Does it require further argument to illustrate the proposition? Is there any revolution in it? I maintain that the charge of revolution is idle and unfounded, not to say puerile in its character.

But you say you object to the form of it. Why, Mr. Chairman, a single consideration will be sufficient to answer that proposition. Under the Constitution of the United States each body has the right to frame the rules for its own Government and for the transaction of its own business. They have exercised that right in the framing of their rules, both the Senate and the House. When the bill was introduced into this body prompt objection was made by the interposition of the rules, but by an able, clear, and unanswerable decision of the chairman of this committee it was ruled to be both germane and in order as tending to the reduction of the expenditures of the Government. From that an appeal was taken, and that appeal was decided against the appellant. If that be so, the form of the thing has been completely vindicated. It is legal in its form, and if there is any revolution in it the revolution rests in the heart of the Constitution. Surely Representatives will not insist that there is anarchy and revolution in the heart of the Constitution of their country.

Then, if it be legal so far as the legislative action is concerned, the will of Congress is a sufficient reason for the repeal of the act in question without further argument on the subject. And, so far as the merit of the question is concerned upon the charge of revolution, we might end the argument right here, but that it shall be fully and perfectly answered we propose to carry the war into Africa, and to answer the distinguished gentleman from Ohio by argumentum reductio ad absurdum. In 1872, simply taking a sample of former legislation, while that distinguished gentleman was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, one of these very laws which we propose to repeal by a "rider" upon an appropriation bill was appended to the sundry civil appropriation bill reported by himself, approved by the republican party, and approved by the republican President. And when the charge of revolution is made upon the one hand, we might, perhaps, echo it back upon the other side. You are answered by your own act, and your mouth must be shut.

But in addition to that, to show the recognition of the legality of the thing in 1876, the democratic party, following suit, introduced a proposition into the sundry civil bill proposing to repeal the whole of article 26 of the Revised Statutes, which embodies every one of these obnoxious measures of which we now complain. The motion was made to strike that out. Every republican voted to strike it out except Mr. Farnsworth, and every democrat voted to keep it in, just as they will vote to keep it in here to be consistent with themselves. They moved to strike it out in the Senate, and it was there stricken out only to come back to annoy the republican party, for there is a democratic majority not only here but in the Senate of the United States.

Without recurring to further details in relation to the history of this legislation, we have vindicated ourselves enough to show that the cry of revolution comes with an ill grace from those who are affected by the same faults which they charge upon this side of the House.

But to charge reductio ad absurdum upon the democratic party and to argue our insincerity in this legislation they refer to the act of 1865 and say that it was put there by the democratic party. That statement was left to go unexplained to the country. The distinguished gentleman who made the first charge did himself injustice, he did the country injustice, he did the record injustice, for he ought to have told the whole truth about it, and that the objectionable feature that was put there was the child of the republican party, the bantling they have nurtured into manhood. It was put there under the coercive power of a majority and accepted as a choice of evils. That is the whole of it; and when the explanation is made the wisdom and propriety of voting for that will be easily seen, easily understood. It was intended simply as a modification of the act of July, 1861, which conferred unlimited power over the Army, the Navy, and the militia upon the President of the United States in order to suppress insurrections, rebellions, and all sorts of conspiracies and combinations. In the exercise of that power it was supposed that he had transgressed the civil rights of the individuals. I know of an instance in the State of Tennessee. Under the authority of the President of the United States, Andrew Johnson was appointed military governor of Tennessee, and he issued a proclamation to hold an election changing the qualification of voters under the constitution of that State, prescribing different places from those fixed by law, unusual tests as qualifications of voters. There was a committee of distinguished gentlemen from Tennessee which came to see the President on the subject of modifying the order for the election. They laid before him the change of the whole election policy of the State of Tennessee, showing the election was in violation of its constitution, in violation of the constitutional qualifications of the citizens, putting extraordinary tests and oaths to them, so that many of the Union men of the State could not comply with the terms. The President had that matter under consideration. A friend of mine in this city visited him in the interest of that committee to influence him, if possible, to remedy the grievances of which complaint was made.

When asked in relation to it he replied with an anecdote. This Tennessee case reminded him of an old farmer out in the West who had cleared a piece of land, had cut down a large gum tree, had cut it up and disposed of it all except the butt cut; and that he could not split and could not burn; he could not haul it out of the way; but he knew what he could do; that is he could plow around it. And that is the way the President answered he would do in relation to the Tennessee case. The consequence was, an election was held there, but only one party was voted for; Mr. Lincoln for President, and Andrew Johnson for Vice-President of the United States; and McClellan and Pendleton received no votes at all.

So there were grievances complained of in Kentucky and grievances complained of in Maryland. These grievances were brought by the people, and they laid them before the Congress of the United States as they had a right to do and to say to the law-making power "The powers which you have conferred upon the President to suppress insurrection and rebellion were never intended to be exercised in the infringement of the civil rights of the people."

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I want to know if there was a McClellan and Pendleton party in Tennessee at that time?

Mr. BRIGHT. Yes, sir. A number of distinguished gentlemen, the first citizens of the State, belonged to it. I have their names here.

Mr. WHITE. All right. Did they vote?

Mr. BRIGHT. They did not; and they told the President they could not vote because his Army was in possession of the ballot-boxes.

Mr. WHITE. Would they have carried the State if they had had the privilege of voting?

Mr. BRIGHT. That is a question the gentleman can answer as well as I can.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, you see that the reason of the act of 1865 is fully vindicated and the discussion so far is entirely cleared up to the satisfaction, we think, of every rational mind.

But, Mr. Chairman, I propose to take another step and come now to the merits of this controversy. Let us inquire into the constitutional relation of the Army to the Government. First, as to the existence of the Army. The Constitution says, in article 1, section 12:

Congress has power to raise and support armies; but no appropriation of money for that use shall be made for a longer term than two years.

There is your power to raise armies; there is the limitation upon the life of the Army. It cannot live longer than two years without the authority of this legislative body. Why was that clause put into the Constitution, and why the limitation? By that enlightened commentator upon the Constitution, Mr. Justice Story, and in an article in the Federalist, which I have before me, it is stated that it was put there expressly for the purpose of keeping the Army under the legislative power in this country. The appropriation may be for a less time than two years, but for not one day beyond it; and the limitation was put there for the purpose, as stated by Justice Story, of starving the Army if Congress saw proper to do it. It was put there as one of the great remedial powers of the Constitution when the Army should become a burden to the revenues of the country or threatened the liberties of the people to put an end to its existence by refusing supplies. I shall take the liberty of publishing the comment of Mr. Story and the remarks of Mr. Hamilton upon the subject which I have before me and which I have not time to read:

Thus, unless the necessary supplies are voted by the representatives of the people every two years the whole establishment must fall. Congress may, indeed, by an act for this purpose, disband a standing army at any time, or vote the supplies for one year or a shorter period. But the Constitution is imperative that no appropriation shall prospectively reach beyond the biennial period. So that there would seem to be every human security against the possible abuse of the power.—Story on the Constitution, section 1183.

But here again it was objected that the Executive might keep up a standing army in time of peace, notwithstanding no supplies should be voted. But how can this possibly be done? The Army cannot go without supplies; it may be disbanded at the pleasure of the Legislature, and it would be absolutely impossible for any President, against the will of the nation, to keep up a standing army in terrorem populi.—Story on the Constitution, section 1184.

The Legislature of the United States will be obliged by this provision, once at least in every two years, to deliberate on the propriety of keeping a military force on foot—to come to a new resolution on the point and to declare their sense of the matter by a formal vote in the face of their constituents.—Federalist, No. 26.

But while this power was put there for that purpose we hope the contingency in this country will never occur when that power is to be exercised. We do not propose to starve the American Army; we do not propose to disband our legions; we simply wish to limit the use and the control of the Army to the legitimate objects of the Constitution of the country.

This brings us to the consideration of the proper use of the Army under the Constitution. By article 1, section 8, Congress has power "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasions."

There is one of the great uses of the Army. By article 4, section 4, it is provided:

The United States * * * shall protect each of them [the States] against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

Now, this exhausts all the power conferred by the Constitution in relation to the use of the Army. Let us see, Mr. Chairman, what is the sum of this power, the military power of this country. It is, first, to execute the laws of the Union; second, to suppress insurrection or rebellion; third, to repel invasion. There are all the powers, and I do not find included in either one of these powers the power "to keep the peace at the polls." I do not find in the enumerated powers any clause which justifies the use of the Army for merely police purposes. Every State is presumed to have its own police officers. The necessity must be actual and not apprehended, and then by the consent and invitation of the State, for the exercise of a power greater than its own.

But our friends upon the other side of the House say that here is the great power conferred of "executing the laws of the Union." Now, Mr. Chairman, I invite attention to that provision. This confers no power to interfere with the elections of the country. These elections are the exercise and the result of a franchise which has been acquired by the citizen, and it is not the gift of the Federal Government. It is generally fixed in the organic law of the State in which the citizen resides, and its exercise is regulated by laws that are passed in pursuance of the organic law of the State which has conferred the right. Then if that be so, let us inquire whether Congress has any right to interfere with the exercise of this power, to prescribe any rules in relation to it, or to enforce any laws in relation to it which require the use of the Army.

Now let us see what are the powers of Congress in relation to these elections. I would state, however, in its proper connection, that Congress has no power over the qualification of the voter, as Mr. Justice Story has well considered in section 820, and which is as follows:

Nor can it be said, with correctness, that Congress can in any way alter the right or qualifications of voters.

Then, if Congress cannot alter or modify in any way the qualification of the voters, let us see what power Congress has over the elections of the country. What are these powers? By article 1, section 4, of the Constitution, "the times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." Now the times alluded to mean days; the places, the precincts; the manner, whether by ballot or by viva voce. There your power is exhausted. Does it require an army to declare the day of the election, the places of the election, or whether it shall be by ballot or viva voce?

No, the argument will not bear the touchstone of truth or reason. But, Mr. Chairman, I am coming up to the real debatable ground upon this question. I have stated the proposition as it was under the Constitution before the amendments. I propose to meet the question as it is presented after the amendments of the Constitution were adopted.

Now, Mr. Chairman, both these sections 14 and 15 have undergone judicial investigation; and by repeated decisions and by legislative action, too, here, it has been decided that they confer no new power upon the citizen.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. BRIGHT. Not now; I do not wish the line of my argument to be interrupted.

Mr. WHITE. I want to know about tissue-paper ballots.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will speak about that in the proper connection.

Mr. WHITE. Very well; I am glad to hear that.

Mr. BRIGHT. The only effect of this amendment was to enlarge the right or to confer the right simply upon the freedman, and to make him a freeman; to put the free-born and the freedman upon the same platform, and whatever rights the freeman had in relation to elections, the freedman should be entitled to the same.

The fifteenth amendment prohibits the denial of any right to the freedman "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude;" but this does not confer on the freedman any greater right than the freeman possessed antecedent to the amendment.

There is no complaint, no law of any State government, that is in violation of this amendment, but, on the contrary, they are in full harmony with it.

As to the power of Congress to legislate on voting at State elections I shall refer only to one decision, which is conclusive of the question. I read from 2 Otto, page 215, the syllabus of the case:

The power of Congress to legislate at all upon the subject of voting at State elections rests upon this amendment, and can be exercised by providing a punishment only when the wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector at such elections is because of his color, race, or previous condition of servitude.

So, Mr. Chairman, when we trim down the election laws of the United States to fit the decision of the court there is but little left. Three acts have been passed in relation to those questions—the act of May 31, 1870, that of February 11, 1871, and that of June 2, 1872. Now I shall argue that these acts find no warrant in the Constitution of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I invite the attention of gentlemen to a few considerations upon this subject. I say that these acts are unconstitutional because they assume to confer a power on the Federal courts in regard to supervisors, marshals, registers of elections, and the electors themselves, and returning-boards, and even questions of fraud which may be committed in the exercise of the elective franchise.

Now, is there any power in the Constitution that authorizes this? Where is the power in the Constitution that authorizes Congress to interfere in the administration of State laws, laws which it did not enact itself and did not confer the rights of the citizen under them? It is nowhere to be found. I deny that Congress has the right to interfere with the administration of the laws of the State and with the rights of the citizen secured by the constitution of the State. Is it not an alarming stretch of power and jurisdiction to assert that Congress has the power to use the Army of the United States to enforce laws which it did not enact, and to control the exercise of rights which it did not and could not confer on the citizen? Yet, Congress has enacted laws for such purpose and has asserted control over the representative will of the people by its judiciary and Army.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman tell us how it is, if this be true, that you have not made a case and taken it before the court that has the power to settle the question of the constitutionality of the law?

Mr. BRIGHT. I have given you a decision that goes to the point, and goes to the point of the power of Congress, and it has been so decided in at least three well-defined cases.

Mr. Chairman, now as to the execution of the law; and I wish to call the attention of the House to it. Here are the United States marshals and supervisors charged with the execution of a part of the law. Under the original act of 1871 they are made the depositaries to a certain extent of the powers of Congress and the judicial power. They have the power of seizing upon the individual, holding him in duress, thus cutting him off from the dearest right known to the freeman. In the working of this terrible engine of oppression the United States marshal or the political partisan applies to the Federal judge and the judge to the President, and the President sends his Army to enforce judgments even on questions of fraud alleged to have been committed under the election laws of the State, not to suppress insurrections or rebellions.

Am I mistaken about it? Just listen to what President Grant said in a message sent to the Congress of the United States on the 25th of February, 1873, in relation to the disturbances in Louisiana:

Controversy arose as soon as the election occurred over its proceedings and results, but I declined to interfere until suit, involving this controversy to some extent, was brought in the circuit court of the United States, under and by virtue of the act of May 31, 1870, entitled "An act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of the Union, and for other purposes." Finding that resistance was made to judicial process in that suit, without any opportunity and, in my judgment, without any right to review the judgment of the court upon the jurisdictional or other questions arising in the case, I directed the United States marshal to enforce such process, and to use if necessary troops for that purpose, in accordance with the thirteenth section of said act, which provides that "it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the military, as shall be necessary to aid in the execution of judicial process under this act."

So he put it upon the ground of executing the judicial processes of a Federal court, not of a State court. And, as I will show you from other extracts that I will read, he told you that under this same act his authority extended to frauds that were supposed to be perpetrated under and against the laws of the State governments.

The sum of this whole matter is that the Federal judiciary is resorted to for the purpose of construing and deciding upon the validity of the laws that are passed by a State regulating the elective franchise of its own citizens. In other words, the Federal judiciary is used as the fulcrum for the Army of the United States, as a lever to overturn State governments at the pleasure of the President of the United States as he did in the State of Louisiana.

I submit to the Congress of the United States, I submit to the whole people of the United States, that if the Federal judiciary is to be installed over the laws of the States and the rights of the citizens in the exercise of the elective franchise, and the Army of the United States is to be used to enforce the behests of the courts in every petty suit that may be engendered and got up, even to the overthrow of every State government and every officer under it, then American liberty is gone, ingulfed in the whirlpool of consolidated government. Its vast liberties are in the grasp of one man, who wields your Army as a warrior wields his battle-ax, to cleave down the liberty of the citizen and the government of the State.

It was the exercise of authority under this law which enabled the President to put the heel of his military boot upon the neck of Louisiana. It was that which enabled him to feel for the very heart-strings of freedom in the ballot-box. It was the exercise of that very power which you propose here to confer upon him which enabled him to station soldiers at the doors of the legislative assemblies and to decide who were elected your State legislators, who were your governors, when they had laws for the decision of all these questions before their own tribunals, and when you had no power over the subject-matter.

You begin to see and confront all these questions; you begin to see the antagonism of these powers; you begin to see the mighty circle of the whirlpool into which the liberties of the American people are now being drawn.

I have traveled over something of the history of this legislation. It all has its outgrowth from the misguided policy of the republican party. As this party has been held up as the party of "immaculate record," I propose simply to recur to a few of the acts of legislation. I shall refer to them simply for the purpose of showing the construction which has been put upon the Constitution of the United States by that party.

The force bills were first passed. One of them sectioned off the Southern States into military districts, disfranchised a portion of the people, enfranchised another portion, dismantled the judiciary, expelled the Legislatures, and established military tribunals in the place of civil tribunals. Now do not misunderstand me. I do not complain. I only refer to them to show you the construction that you republicans placed upon your powers under the Constitution of the United States. You thought you had the right to do it.

Again, you passed a bill through both Houses here called the Freedmen's Bureau bill, which continued the military system but transferred the civil power and jurisdiction to some military tribunal in the South, striking at the right of trial by jury, digging it up entirely by the roots. That bill was presented to President Johnson, who took his stand upon the Constitution of the country and stood in the breach. When he understood the proposition he lifted the veto power and it descended like the red lightning of heaven and shattered it like a potter's vessel before the face of the people.

You thought it was all right. But he said afterward there was power enough conferred by that bill to have made him king or dictator of the American people. You were willing to lay all the thunders at his feet. If he had been corrupt and ambitious he might have used them to the destruction of American liberty. You thought it was all right. It was your construction of the Constitution thus to play and temporize with the liberties of the people.

Mr. HORR. I understand the gentleman to say that President Johnson vetoed that bill?

Mr. BRIGHT. I suppose everybody knows that.

Mr. HORR. Very well; did he have the right to veto it?

Mr. BRIGHT. I will say that he did, and I think his veto message will stand as one of the proudest monuments on the plane of human liberty.

Mr. HORR. Then suppose President Hayes thinks that the laws you are about to pass are vicious and unconstitutional——

Mr. BRIGHT. Then let him veto them.

Mr. HORR. He should do that?

Mr. BRIGHT. Yes, if he thinks them unconstitutional.

Mr. HORR. Then do you agree with the declaration made this afternoon on your side of the House that if President Hayes should veto these bill you will stay here for two years——

Mr. BRIGHT. I am not answering for any one else. I do not believe that this legislation is unconstitutional.

Mr. HORR. Wait until I finish my question.

Mr. BRIGHT. I cannot yield any further.

Mr. HORR. But suppose——

Mr. BRIGHT. I will not yield.

You suspended the writ of habeas corpus in a time of peace, or rather you conferred the power upon the President to do it, that ancient writ imported into this country, the boast of all Englishmen, the triumph of Runnymede, the result of its victories. You placed it entirely in the hands of one man. You gave him power to suspend the civil functions of every State of this Union, when your governors should sit powerless, when the judges upon the bench should sit powerless, when your marshals and your civil authorities were paralyzed as dead men and under the heel of a single man. This act was described by Mr. Trumbull as a State annihilator. You were willing to intrust all this power to one man.

Then follow the election laws, now under consideration, making Federal judges and supervisors the supreme authority with reference to the conduct of elections—assuming omnipotent powers over State laws and State officers.

These were the laws you thought you had a right to pass under your construction of the Constitution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, permit me to go a step further and show the manner in which these laws have been executed. Just before the presidential election of 1876 an order, which I have before me, was issued by the Secretary of War, notifying the commanding general to have all the troops that could be spared from our bleeding frontier in readiness for calls to be made from other places. In obedience to such call forty-five hundred troops were marched into South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana. Why were they marched there? Why the roll of the drum, why the piercing notes of the fife, why the tread of armed legions, why the glittering of bayonets? Where is the hostile foe, where the embattled ranks? When that call was made and that order issued where was the pretext that there was any insurrection or rebellion? Look at the date. At that time you could not find a single hand lifted against the authority of the State or of the United States. We all knew the meaning of the movement. Those troops were marched into Louisiana and other States—down-trodden Louisiana whose government was overthrown. Desperate as the symbolic bird on its own escutcheon, which it is said will tear the flesh from its own breast to feed its brood, the people of that State were determined to make the last struggle. Pressing between the glittering bayonets of Federal power sent there to intimidate them, they deposited nearly 7,000 majority for Tilden and Hendricks.

Mr. HORR. Does the gentleman refer to the time——

Mr. BRIGHT. I cannot yield. When it was understood that Tilden was elected and the shouts of our people were making the welkin ring for joy, then upon the wires extending all over this land, the delicate nerves of the lightning, there came the whisper, "Though Tilden is elected Hayes shall be counted in." We find that soon after that time fourteen companies of troops were ordered to Tallahassee, Florida, beside others to Louisiana. Here are the instructions of General Grant to General William T. Sherman:

Instruct General Augur in Louisiana and General Ruger in Florida to be vigilant with force at their command to preserve peace and good order and to see that the proper and legal boards of canvassers are unmolested in the performance of their duty. Should there be any grounds of suspicion of fraudulent count on either side, it should be reported and denounced at once.

There you have it. Here are your sentinels, here are the dragon coils of the American Army thrown around a returning board as it sits in incubation to hatch a President of the United States. Glorious duty for the American Army, watching to see if any fraud is committed! No insurrection, no rebellion, no pretense of anything of that kind! I hardly know how to restrain my sense of indignation when I contemplate this humiliating office imposed upon the Army of the United States. I believe that if I were an officer in command, before I would perform this degrading duty I would tear the epaulets from my shoulders, and I would snap the sword over my knee, and would return it to the Government that imposed such humiliating duty upon the Army of the United States.

What is the result of all this? It shows that the policy, the maxims, the practices of war are incompatible with a state of peace; that force and freedom cannot dwell together; that between them is an "irrepressible conflict;" that one or the other must yield; and it is for the American Congress to say whether they will reinstate the civil authority over the military.

I am sure that the honorable gentlemen who lead our armies desire not the performance of such duty. I know that there was one who refused to perform it unless the law strictly compelled him to do so.

A MEMBER. Name him.

Mr. BRIGHT. I refer to General Hancock, whose name is illustrious, who honors the profession of the soldier.

This interference of the military with elections is a menace to the liberty of the people, extending not to one section merely. When a blow like this is struck at free elections in Louisiana the rebound is felt in New York and Indiana; it tells upon the destiny of the whole country. The fraudulent or violent change of one State may carry the presidential election and all the patronage and power which belongs to the office. And this claim is not yet abandoned. We were told to-day that if we would give them the Army republicans would come from the South and fill these seats. Great God! Is the admission solemnly made here that you wish the Army of the United States to be used merely as an appendage of a political party, that your tenure of office must be maintained by force, not by the merit of your principles? Has the startling truth leaked out the republicans want the Army at the polls not "to keep the peace," but to keep their place in power? If the Army and supplies are granted to them now, when will we see the end of the exaction?

Have your principles been so much condemned by the American people that they will not stand the test, but that you must hold the fort, hold the fort by the military arm of the Government? Ay, gentlemen, you have not given it up. The man it is said is in training abroad now; he has been feasted and ovated in Europe by the bondholders and creditors of the United States who wish a strong Government to chain the people down to their dungeon floor and to flay them with taxation, and in response to their complaints to give them the bayonet. Under the instigation of those men you will find that there is a candidate in training for the presidential race. He will land at the golden gates of the Pacific; he will find a splendid palace car to receive him and will be met by shouting thousands. They will shout hosannas to the returning hero; some perhaps so abandoned they will throw up their hats and render homage to an American Cæsar.

You say, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?" Hazael said that to Elisha, the prophet, when Elisha wept and told him the desolations and horrors he should cause when he should be king. He said, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" Yet he went home, and the first thing he did was to murder the king, to overturn the government, and thrash the nation into dust. Of ambition the poet has said:

> Ambition hath one heel nailed in hell,
> Though she stretch her fingers to touch the heavens.

It lifted itself against even the sovereignty of Heaven. Nothing can ever satisfy its rapacity for power.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to ask the gentleman does he not think that General Grant would make a good candidate for the Presidency?

Mr. BRIGHT. When we say that this country ought to be released from its thralldom we are met with the cry, "Rebellion!" "Rebellion!" like old Hook crying "Beef!" in the Revolution. You raise the bloody flag, and think the whole northern heart will be inflamed. You think it will be like the cocked hat of Napoleon, which when raised upon a pole would cause all Europe to rush to arms. You think you can muster your forces all around the bloody flag with your howl of "Rebellion!" I tell you no; you cannot deceive this people longer by the empty howl. They must have some other pabulum. They are looking forward to the future. They are cutting loose from the dead body of the past. There is a future with its splendid anticipations before them, and they will look to that party, support that party, to carry out the great measures of reform and relief that are to bring prosperity to this country.

Now permit me in my concluding remarks to sum up a few facts. In the first place, if the republican party has had a mission, that mission is at an end. If its mission was to emancipate the slave, to strike the yoke from his neck and the manacles from his hands and to restore the Union, those objects are now accomplished facts, and there is no further need of the party.

Another conclusion is, the maxims and practices of war are inconsistent with a state of peace, and they cannot dwell long together. Peace is the normal condition, war the abnormal; and when the causes of war have passed away, there should pass away also the force and the power which are inimical to peace. Force and freedom cannot exist together.

To sum up the great argument in a few words: The republican party have been in power, and it is now fourteen years since the close of the war; and when we look over this country we see a perfect paralysis of every industry; we see the land filled with tramps, with complaints upon the lips of the people. The fires of your mills have been put out. We find that there are rings and monopolies, a bond-ridden, bank-ridden, tariff-ridden, tax-ridden, poverty-ridden, and monopoly-ridden people, all crying for relief. Here is a prostrate country at your feet, and its condition cannot be laid at the door of the democratic party. Your administration is condemned. "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin!" is written upon the wall. Your days are numbered; your power will pass; weighed in the balances, you are found wanting. You have your grasp upon the throat of this country, holding on by the military power. But, sir, the representatives of the people, not the democrats alone, are wrenching your fingers loose one by one, one by one, until the agonizing country shall be released from your grasp of power.

But, Mr. Chairman, one word more. We know that the party on the other side of the House dies hard. It is the fate of parties. We have had to die. There is a resurrection day, however, and we have touched our mother earth and arisen like the earth-born giant. You are now the party overthrown.

Mr. FISHER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Inasmuch as his time has expired, I think he will yield long enough for me to ask him a question?

Mr. BRIGHT. If it will be any accommodation to you I will do it.

Mr. FISHER. I would suggest to him to state, in connection with other matters that he has stated, that his State is now repudiating and cheating northern men of money due them.

Mr. BRIGHT. The State and the people will take care of that themselves; but then if what the gentleman states is true, does that justify you in destroying the liberties of the people of this country with the Army? Does it? [Applause.] If the State is prostrated and run down, and if a policy has been inaugurated here that is grinding down not only the people, but grinding the State to powder under your oppressive administration, is it any excuse to say that the State of Tennessee is unable to pay its debts?

Mr. FISHER. The gentleman was remarking that the republican party is dishonest.

Mr. BRIGHT. I did not say dishonest. Do not put words into my mouth that I did not use.

I do not care to go into the question of the debt of the State of Tennessee. The people of my State will take care of their own honor. The validity of some of the bonds has been called into question. The State is now negotiating for the purpose of settling that debt, and I suppose the State is quite capable of taking care of that question itself.

Mr. WHITE. At forty cents on the dollar.

Mr. BRIGHT. The democratic party has a destiny before it. It has come up. It is here. It is animated and encouraged by the people and it proposes, sir, to do something for their relief. First of all, to save the Constitution of the country, and then to administer relief, just and equitable, under its provisions. It proposes to strike the shackles of military power from the States and the people. It proposes to give them relief from a policy under which they are ground down. It will endeavor to make the whole land murmer like a vast hive of industry, and the seas blossom with our sails. It will endeavor to break through the tariff blockade, and give free course to our commerce among the nations.

Mr. WHITE. I want to ask the gentleman if he is opposed to the present tariff in which Pennsylvania is interested, on account of the protection it affords to its industries?

Mr. BRIGHT. I would put the pruning-knife into your tariff system. I would reform your internal-revenue system. I would relieve the people of your State.

Mr. WHITE. Does my friend from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] know that under our tariff policy the iron industries of my great State have given employment to much labor, thereby aiding to relieve us from tramps, and that now our industries are looking better and reviving? If he does not know it, I as a Representative from Pennsylvania who have some knowledge of these interests do understand it.

Mr. BRIGHT. Oh, I understand the policy of your State very well. I have not time to go into that.

Mr. WHITE. I beg pardon; but if the gentleman from Tennessee is opposed to the protective system he does not understand the politics of my State nor the interests of its people.

Mr. BRIGHT. The politics of your State have nothing to do with my political convictions.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman says he is going to relieve the country when the democratic party comes into power by destroying the infamous tariff.

Mr. BRIGHT. I did not use the word "infamous" at all.

Mr. WHITE. You called it "despotic and oppressive and robbing," which are synonymous terms. I want the people of my State to understand that a representative democrat publishes such sentiments to the country, that he would cut up our tariff system. That is the relief he intends to give if the democratic party under his leadership gets into power.

Mr. BRIGHT. I cannot enter into a discussion of that question. The remark I made was only incidental. I have discussed the question before this body. My views have not been concealed, and if the gentleman wishes to know them he will find them on record. So far as that question is concerned, I believe there ought to be a reform in our revenue and financial systems, so as to give relief to the suffering thousands and hundreds of thousands of people in the gentleman's State who have been made tramps.

Mr. WHITE. You will never do it by reducing the protection on our iron.

Mr. BRIGHT. That protection never was given by democratic policy. It lies at your own doors. The democratic party had nothing to do with it.

Mr. WHITE. I tell the gentleman in reply that we as republicans are proud of the existing tariff policy of the country and have no apology to make for it, and we will resist the substitution of a free-trade policy therefor.

Mr. BRIGHT. If it is the pleasure of the committee to indulge me in speaking on the subject of the tariff, I will do so.

Mr. WHITE. How long does the gentleman want?

Mr. BRIGHT. Let me speak upon it.

Mr. WHITE. A couple of hours?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRIGHT. I do not desire to detain this committee. I would have been through long ago but for the interruptions of these gentlemen.

Mr. WHITE. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am now proceeding by courtesy of the committee.

Mr. WHITE. We are very glad to give it to the gentleman. I recognize the gentleman as an able lawyer and a representative democrat; therefore I like to emphasize his utterances upon this modification of the tariff. I would like to hear him upon the free-trade doctrines which he thinks will restore prosperity to this country.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will send the gentleman a copy of one of my speeches on that subject, which will fully inform him.

Mr. WHITE. We are too busy now to read old speeches.

Mr. BRIGHT. My time is up. I do not desire to trespass further upon the patience of the committee. I do not often trouble the House. I have this to say, that I am none the less thankful for the indulgence which has been extended to me.

I have only this further remark to make about the democratic party. We will have freedom when that party is restored to power, when it comes back with all its reforms. The country will then be restored to all its constitutional rights. To paraphrase the eloquent passage from Curran—the country will stand forth redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the irresistible genius of American liberty.

Mr. MANNING. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. REAGAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House now take a recess until eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until eleven o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at eleven o'clock a. m., (Friday, April 4.)

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCOID. If no other gentleman desires to occupy the floor at this time, or is entitled to it——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Am I to be forced to make a speech this morning, before my time has arrived?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has arrived.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Of course the chairman has a right to insist upon my taking the floor now, and if he does so I will proceed; but I protest against it.

Mr. WHITE. I made the motion last night for a recess until this morning. I did so after consultation with the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] and my understanding was that some gentleman on this side who desired to speak would be allowed to occupy twenty minutes of the hour.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. What hour? My hour?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Oh no, sir.

Mr. WHITE. That was my understanding.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The understanding I had from the chairman of the Committee of the Whole himself was that the first hour was to be given to gentlemen on that side of the House, and I was to be recognized for the next hour. I find, however, that this morning the order has been changed.

Mr. WHITE. No, sir; the order is not changed at all.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I did not say that you had changed it.

Mr. WHITE. I know there can be no difference of recollection as to the facts. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] did not want to speak last night, and asked me to move a recess. I was perfectly willing to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. McCOID. I am perfectly willing to take the floor at this time if the gentleman from Mississippi desires it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McCOID. Then I will ask the gentleman to yield twenty minutes of his time to me.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I would be very glad indeed to do so if I could get through with what I have to say in less time than an hour. I must state again to the other side of the House that according to the arrangement which the Chairman announced it was understood that if there was any republican who wished to occupy the hour this morning after the recess, or to occupy it last night, he had the privilege to come in before me. That was the understanding with me. Now I find this morning that the arrangement has been changed. I did not expect to give any portion of my time to any one on the other side of the House, because if any part of it should be left I have promised it to gentlemen on my own side. I would be very glad to accommodate gentlemen on the other side if I could, but it is not in my power to do so. I am perfectly willing, if the Chairman will allow it, that the gentleman from Iowa should go on for twenty minutes or even longer; and I will take my hour when he gets through.

The CHAIRMAN. In less than one hour from now the Committee of the Whole must rise and the House begin the legislative session of Friday.

Mr. WHITE. If the gentleman from Mississippi is disposed to leave the matter to the Chair, the Chair will doubtless protect the gentleman beside me, who desires to submit some remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to protect the rights of all gentlemen, but the time for general debate is now limited, and it is impossible for every gentleman to occupy the time that he may desire. The gentleman from Mississippi will proceed.

[Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, addressed the committee in remarks which, not having been concluded when the committee rose, will be found complete in the proceedings of Friday, April 4.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I interrupt the gentleman from Mississippi only to suggest that the committee rise in order that we may have an adjournment, and that the session of Friday may begin.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The Chair will please note how much time I have left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CLYMER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CARLISLE. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at one minute before twelve o'clock a. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ATKINS: Papers relating to the war claims of James N. Hunter, Miles M. Hammond, and Mrs. S. Callaway—to the Committee on War Claims, when appointed.

By Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi: Papers relating to the war claim of William L. Clearman—to the same committee, when appointed.

By Mr. STEELE: Resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, favoring an appropriation for the improvement of Cape Fear River, the making of Fayetteville, North Carolina, a port of entry, and the making the navigation of Cape Fear River free—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

Also, resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, favoring an appropriation for the improvement of Waccamaw River—to the same committee, when appointed.

Also, resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, favoring an appropriation sufficient to clear out and deepen Currituck, Croaton, and Pamlico Sounds, and Neuse and Newport Rivers—to the same committee, when appointed.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of North Carolina, relative to the improvement of the rivers of said State—to the same committee, when appointed.

Also, resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, favoring the establishment by the General Government of two universities in the South, one for the education of white and the other for the education of colored youths, free of charge, and that $1,000,000 be appropriated for the establishment of each university—to the Committee on Education and Labor, when appointed.

Also, resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, favoring an appropriation to make Lumber River navigable—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

By Mr. URNER: The petition of John Dillinger, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, when appointed.

By Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee: Papers relating to the war claims of Mrs. Emma G. Abbott, Abbie P. Anderson, Richard L. Andrews, A. G. Bankhead, William E. Barnett, Reuben B. Bass, John Bateman, George W. Beasley, Mary Beasley, John H. Bills, Mrs. Mary P. Bradford, Rosanna H. Black, Clara E. Bryan, Charles C. Burke, (administrator, &c.,) Washington G. Campbell, Juliet Campbell, Emmarilla J. Carr, Paul A. Cicalla, Robert H. Cleere, Mrs. Martha C. Cole, Benjamin Coleman, Ann E. Connell, (executrix, &c.,) Henry C. Dallis, Carson R. Dalton, Alfred H. Darden, Wiley J. Davis, Samuel H. Dunscomb, W. W. R. Elliott, Lucy E. Dowdy, John A. Farley, Rosetta Freel, John O. Graves, William B. Hamlin, Delas A. Harrell, James A. Henry, David H. Hildebrand, Indiana E. Hughes, and Fannie T. Hunt—to the Committee on War Claims, when appointed.

Also, papers relating to the claims of Mathias App, Benjamin Babb and others, and William G. Ford, administrator of John G. Robinson, deceased—to the Committee of Claims, when appointed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 4, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

INSTITUTION FOR DEAF AND DUMB—SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he has received a communication from the officers of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, and also a letter from the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, asking that he make immediate appointment of directors for the first named institution and of regents to the latter. In accordance with this request the Chair announces the following appointments:

Directors of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb: JOHN T. HARRIS, of Virginia, and WILLIAM CLAFLIN, of Massachusetts.

Regents of the Smithsonian Institution: HIESTER CLYMER, of Pennsylvania; JOSEPH E. JOHNSTON, of Virginia; and JAMES A. GARFIELD, of Ohio.

In this connection the Chair desires to state that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who has been a regent of the Smithsonian Institution, absolutely declines to serve further as such, because, owing to the state of his health, he is unable to attend the sessions of the board.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to proceed with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, resumed and concluded his remarks. The following is the complete speech:

Mr. Chairman, I am glad we are confronted to-day with the grave question, whether as a legislative body representing the will of the people we have the courage and determination to strike from the statute-book certain iniquitous laws placed there to control elections in the interest of a political party, or whether we will falter and come short of our duty to the country.

But a few weeks ago, when a repealing clause to effect this end was attached to an appropriation bill in this House, the republican Senate denounced our action as monstrous and revolutionary, and called into being the present session of Congress rather than yield to the voice of its popular branch. We are now in the second act of the performance, with a partial change of the dramatis personæ, with no side issues to settle, with no controverted points of courtesy between the two Houses, and, better still, with no constitutional inhibitions blocking our way. We are left to inquire whether it is necessary and proper to free and fair popular elections: First, that United States troops be stationed at ballot-boxes while the voting is going on; Secondly, whether supervisors and deputy marshals of the United States shall exercise plenary powers in deciding upon infractions of the election laws and in making arrests for the same; and, thirdly, whether jurors called to try prisoners so arrested shall be required to take what is familiarly known as the "iron-clad oath."

These are the three points upon which the two Houses of the last Congress failed to agree, and which now press for consideration and settlement. I propose to consider them in the order named, if I can have the indulgence of the House, and that they may be properly understood I will give the full text of the acts relating to each.

TROOPS AT THE BALLOT-BOX.

First, then, as to the use of troops at the ballot-box. The act reads as follows:

SECTION 2002. No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls.

The only warrant, power, or authority under which the President, any head of a department, or military commander has assumed to act in stationing troops at any ballot-box during any election, general or special, in any State, is derived from the last eight words of the section quoted, namely: or to keep the peace at the polls. And yet during the late administration, where there was no disturbance at the polls, while peace and order reigned supreme, troops were sent, at the caprice of the President or the solicitation of political managers, to any voting precinct in the country, city, or village with intent to intimidate and drive from the polls unoffending citizens whose political opinions did not suit the party in power. The baleful effects of this practice are familiar to every one. I will not stop to enumerate them.

It may be said, and truthfully too, to the honor of the present Administration, that since its inauguration no troops in a military capacity have been permitted at any voting precinct, and that in consequence the law has fallen into disuse and become a dead letter. If this be true, then why not repeal it? The present Chief Magistrate of the United States may regard the law with disfavor, as the mass of private citizens unquestionably do, but who can forecast the views of his successor and give any guarantee that the scenes and incidents of the late Administration will not be repeated? Already the clans are gathering at the bugle-blast of their chieftains to enter again upon the work of misrule and spoliation. The country, in a spasmodic effort to rid itself of the leeches and vampires who were sucking its life-blood, drove into retirement certain individuals, but now again they emerge from their banishment, fasten themselves upon the body-politic, and are ready to satiate their appetites with illicit power and plunder. The return of certain men to political life bodes no good to the Republic. Coming events cast their shadows before them, and it behooves us to remove all obstructions to a full and fair election in 1880. This act with others must be repealed, or it is vain to talk of carrying out the popular will at the ballot-box.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is a side to this question which calls for yet more earnest thought and calmer consideration. I refer to the constitutional power of Congress to enact such a law. I know it is the habit of a certain class of politicians of the present day to indulge a derisive sneer whenever reference is made to the Constitution. But grave questions affecting the construction of that instrument and the rights of the people growing out of it are not to be settled by a mere grimace or toss of the head.

If during the war the plea of inter arma leges silent was deemed a sufficient one for the usurpation of powers which struck down the political and personal rights of the citizen, yet now that more than a dozen years have elapsed since peace was declared, it is the solemn duty of those in authority to repeal all laws of admitted or even doubtful constitutionality. It has ever been one of the cardinal principles of the democratic party that doubtful constitutional powers should never be exercised, even to effect the most desirable object. I am not one of those who are ready to admit that the late war, like a mighty maelstrom, swallowed up all the powers and attributes of the States, and left only a grand consolidation whose powers are unlimited and illimitable. We still profess to have a written organic law which we call the Constitution and which, as members of this body, we have just taken an oath to support. Article 10 of amendments to that instrument I find to read as follows:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

To read this clause and then deny that the Federal Government is one of limited powers involves a degree of stupidity rather to be pitied than upbraided. It has no powers unless they are to be found in express grants, or such implied powers as are necessary and proper to carry out express grants. Keeping these facts in view, the question arises, are there any express terms in the Constitution authorizing United States troops to be stationed at polling-places during any general or special election? I have only to cite the several clauses in the Constitution relating to the organization and uses of the Army to establish the negative of the proposition.

The first clause relating to the subject is to be found in article 1, section 8, clause 12, being one of the enumerated powers of Congress, which declares that said body shall have authority "to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years."

It needs no reasoning to show that this clause goes no further than to empower Congress to raise and support armies. Not one word is said as to the uses to which it may be applied. A warrant to use it for any purpose whatever must be found elsewhere.

The next reference to the Army is to be found in clause 15 of the same section, which declares that Congress shall have power "To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

I think it will be admitted that the language quoted by no means covers the case. It is true that it speaks of executing the laws of the Union, of suppressing insurrections, and repelling invasions. But it is manifest that one of three contingencies must arise before the militia can be called forth. First, the laws of the Union must be violated or resisted, or an insurrection must actually exist, or an invasion must have been actually made, attempted, or threatened; and any one of these contingencies having happened, and the civil authorities of the States being inadequate to protect or defend, the militia may be called forth, by and under an act of Congress. For if the laws be neither violated nor resisted they will execute themselves through the appropriate civil functionaries, having the privileges of the posse comitatus. The term militia is used in contradistinction to the regular Army. Webster defines the term in this wise:

Militia: The body of soldiers in a State enrolled for discipline, but engaged in actual service only in emergencies, as distinguished from regular troops, whose sole occupation is war or military service.

Both the clause of the Constitution quoted and the definition of the term militia forbid the idea that they can be used in any way except in an emergency, to enforce a law of the Union resisted or violated, to suppress an insurrection already begun, or repel an invasion already made, attempted, or threatened, and then only when the regular civil authorities of the State government have fruitlessly exhausted their powers. Any other interpretation of the clause would hopelessly subordinate the civil powers of the Government to the will of the President, to be executed through an armed militia.

There is still another clause touching the relations of the Federal and State governments where troops may in a certain contingency be used, to which I now refer. Section 4, article 4, provides that—

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

It cannot but be noted how careful the framers of the Constitution were to guard against national interference with State matters, and especially how anxious they seemed to be to leave all minor matters of State troubles to State authority. The powers in this clause conferred upon the United States are, first, to guarantee to each State a republican form of government; secondly, to protect each State against invasion; and thirdly, upon application of the Legislature, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, to protect each State against domestic violence. From the very language of the grant conferred or duty imposed by this clause, taken in connection with the powers reserved to the States or the people, it is manifest that the Federal Government cannot interpose at pleasure in the affairs of a State. It is only when State authority is too weak to secure to the people thereof a republican form of government that the Federal arm may be invoked. It is only when an invasion of a State from an outside foe has been made, attempted, or threatened, and Federal authority is needed to protect that State, that it can be interposed. It is only when domestic violence has overawed the civil authorities of a State that Federal interference can be justified, and then only upon the call of the Legislature, if it can be convened, or if not, upon application of the executive based upon a proper state of facts. It will be observed that the mode of this protection is not pointed out. It may be done, not necessarily by forcing troops of the United States into the territory of a State, not necessarily by force of any kind, but by peaceable means, if practicable, as by issuing a proclamation; which in many cases has proved effective, and notably in the case of South Carolina in the days of nullification; not authoritatively, but persuasively, keeping the troops in the background, the very sight of whom with threatening aspect in times of peace is offensive to our people. To station troops at polling places in times of election, when there is no present insurrection on foot, no domestic violence being done or attempted, even though a corrupt or timid executive may call for their presence, finds no warrant or authority to support it in this clause of the Constitution.

But in the insane desire and wild hunt for authority to employ the Army in controlling elections for party purposes, it may be claimed that such power is derived from article 15 of the amendments, sections 1 and 2, which are in the following language:

SEC. 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The language of this clause is that the right to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State, and does not refer to or cover the action of any mob or combination of citizens acting outside of the authority of the United States or of a State. Governments, State or Federal, can only act through constituted authorities under the forms of law. When, therefore, it is declared that the right to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State, the whole meaning of the language is that neither the power of the Federal Government as such government, nor of a State as such State, shall be interposed to deny or abridge the right thus conferred. Any other interpretation of this clause of the Constitution would involve an utter absurdity.

After citing all the sections or clauses of sections in the Constitution in any wise relating to the subject, we fail to find any express warrant for stationing troops at any ballot-box during any election in any State.

The only remaining inquiry, Is the exercise of this power necessary and proper to the enforcement of any other expressly granted power? I think may be answered unhesitatingly in the negative. If it be claimed that it is necessary, then I ask which one of the delegated powers depends for its validity upon the exercise of this implied power? I think none can be cited. For nearly one hundred years of the life of the Republic no such power was exercised, or even advocated. The wildest latitudinarian never dreamed of such elasticity in the Constitution. Outbreaks have sometimes occurred at ballot-boxes in the States, but State authorities were with few exceptions deemed sufficient both as to honesty and capacity to suppress these and secure fair and impartial elections. Every State has its penal statutes against infractions of election laws, and its courts to enforce them, which have been esteemed ample safeguards to the ballot-box. It has been reserved for the men of this day, members of the republican party, to inaugurate this with other equally disreputable schemes to keep themselves in power. They have at last been overtaken by public condemnation, and however unpalatable it may be to them to attend the funeral obsequies of their once stalwart friend and benefactor, yet the fiat, "let the monster die and the curtain fall upon it forever," has gone forth from the people and must be obeyed.

UNITED STATES SUPERVISORS AND DEPUTY MARSHALS.

I come now to the consideration of the second proposition, namely, shall the supervisors and deputy marshals of the United States exercise plenary powers in deciding upon infractions of the election laws, and make arrests for the same without legal process based upon a charge of guilt?

I will first make a brief synopsis of the several sections of the Revised Statutes relating to the appointment of supervisors of elections. Under sections 2011 and 2012 the judge of any United States circuit court, at the instance of any two citizens of any town or city having upward of twenty thousand inhabitants, or at the instance of any ten citizens of good standing in any county or parish, may appoint two citizens, residents of the city or town or of the voting precinct in the county or parish, being of different political parties and able to read and write the English language, who shall be known and designated as supervisors of election. Section 2016 defines the duties and powers of these supervisors. They are required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters who are entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, to challenge any person offering to register, to attend at all times and places when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge, and to cause such names registered as they may deem proper to be so marked, to personally inspect and scrutinize any registry, to make lists of the voters, to affix their names to each page of the roll of registration, and use such means as they may think necessary and proper to detect the improper use of the same. They are further required by sections 2017, 2018, and 2019 to attend all elections held for Representatives and Delegates in Congress, to challenge any votes supposed to be improperly offered, to remain with the ballot-box after the voting is over until the votes are entirely counted out, and after counted out and tabulated to certify their correctness or append objections, and do and perform many other acts and things in the premises.

Section 2021 authorizes any United States marshal, when an election is to be held in any city or town having twenty thousand inhabitants or upwards for any Representative or Delegate in Congress, at the instance of two or more citizens residing in said city or town, to appoint special deputy marshals, whose business shall be, when required, to aid the supervisors in the several duties above named.

Section 2022, being the sum of all villanies, I give in its own language:

> The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and IMMEDIATELY, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States. * * * For the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals.

Section 2023 reads as follows:

> Whenever any arrest is made under any provision of this title, the person so arrested shall forthwith be brought before a commissioner, judge, or court of the United States for examination of the offenses alleged against him; and such commissioner, judge, or court shall proceed in respect thereto as authorized by law in case of crimes against the United States.

Mr. Chairman, to comment upon these several sections calmly requires more philosophy and self-control than belongs to my nature: I cannot read them without feelings of indignation and scorn for the head that could conceive and the hand that could trace such atrocities. Talk of American citizenship, of the "land of the free and home of the brave," and then turn to the pages of your statute-book where is to be found recorded the language above quoted and tell me if all our boasted freedom is not a mockery and a lie. Read the indictment contained in our Declaration of Independence against George III, of England, and say if anything therein found smacks more strongly of tyranny and oppression than these sections of our own law? Arrests to be made without charges of guilt, not for overt violations of law, not under legal process emanating from a competent and impartial officer, but at the mere volition of any such supervisor or deputy marshal who does not know but professes to believe that a citizen has committed, or attempted or offered to commit some violation of the election laws, or who has or is supposed to have committed some offense against some one of the laws of the United States. If Congress can and will confer upon irresponsible supervisors and deputy marshals who are selected for their known subserviency to party, plenary powers to arrest at will any citizen who has chanced to fall under their displeasure, and immediately force him from his home and friends to a distant point in quest of a commissioner or judge of the United States, among strangers not willing to become his bondsmen, thus leaving no alternative but the prison, then, I ask, what becomes of the boasted muniments of American citizenship and personal liberty?

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons against unreasonable seizures shall not be violated, and no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, particularly describing the person to be seized," is the language of the Constitution of the United States, to be found in article 4. And in article 5, as if intended to throw further safeguards around the personal liberty of the citizen, it is declared that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or other infamous crime, * * * nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law;" yet under the act now sought to be repealed, he may be immediately deprived of his liberty without process of any kind upon a mere surmise that he attempts or offers to commit a wrong.

Such is the fallibility of human nature, such its passions and prejudices, that our fathers in framing an organic law, the foundation-stone of the grand superstructure which has since risen upon it, were not willing to intrust even to the wisest and best of that patriotic age the power to deprive the weakest or meanest citizen of his liberty at the pleasure of another. But such has been the degeneracy of American statesmen that this disgraceful law has found its way into the statute-book, and to-day upon this floor has its advocates.

I beg leave to call the attention of the House for a moment to the practical effects of this law in the Southern States, but more especially in Louisiana and Mississippi. I premise my remarks upon this point by the statement that a large majority of white men of intelligence and respectability belong to the democratic party in these States. The few that are outside of it and are seeking to stir up race antagonism are under the ban of society. They hate the democratic party, and are not loved in return.

Mr. WHITE. Is it not considered respectable for a man to be a republican there?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. In Mississippi a man's respectability does not depend upon his political opinions, unless those opinions are carried into practice to bring about race antagonism and place the lives of our people in danger. It rarely happens that men of intelligence come to Mississippi and affiliate with any other than the democratic party. Only men who had no social status in the community which they left are willing to play the role of disturbers of the peace and order of society.

Mr. WHITE. Was not Judge Chisholm a respectable citizen; and was he not killed on account of his political opinions?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I have never understood that he was killed on account of his political opinions. His death grew out of a family feud existing long anterior to his death.

Mr. WHITE. Would he have been killed except for those opinions?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I do not know. Any opinion upon that subject could amount to nothing more than speculation.

Mr. WHITE. Have the murderers of Judge Chisholm ever been punished or tried?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I think not. They have been indicted, and the trials were postponed at the last term of the court on account of the absence of Mrs. Chisholm, the chief witness for the State; the motion for continuances coming from the prosecution and resisted by the defense. The indictments are still pending, and doubtless trials will be had whenever the prosecutors are ready.

In very many cases they are known to be supple tools in the hands of Federal authorities, and glory in the opportunity to inflict any indignity upon their more respectable neighbors. With rare exceptions these are the men who are selected as special deputy marshals to stand at the polls to challenge votes, to make arrests without legal process, to remove prisoners from their vicinage and beyond the reach of friends and witnesses and to persecute them on account of some real or fancied personal grievance. If colored deputies are appointed they are often chosen on account of their blatant opposition to the white race and their love of oppression. There being no penalty affixed by law for the improper exercise of their powers, and, not being property-holders, they are not amenable in damages for false imprisonment. Thus, being "clothed with a little brief authority," they often use it to gratify feelings of malice and revenge.

But this is not all. Timid men, old men, men of peace, are kept from the polls because of the dangers to which they are exposed from these unlimited powers in the hands of irresponsible persons. Should they attend an election precinct, expecting to return to their homes as soon as their ballots were deposited, they may meet with some enemy, white or colored, who whispers into the ear of a deputy marshal that an attempt has been made or an offer held out to influence improperly a vote, and at once an arrest would follow. I have drawn no fancy picture to adorn my speech. Cases of this kind frequently occur, as lately demonstrated in the cases of forty-eight prisoners whose acquittal took place at one time in the city of New Orleans.

The question has been significantly asked, and with an air of triumph, have not some of these men pleaded guilty to the charges preferred against them? I answer yes, and for reasons easily explained. These prisoners have not unfrequently been taken from three to five hundred miles from their homes, as in the case of the Louisiana prisoners above named, have been detained for weeks or months from their families at a heavy expense which they could not afford to bear, and knowing that they were to be confronted by negro witnesses who were trained to swear them guilty, to be tried by a jury packed to convict, and in addition being beset by Federal officers who had them in charge to plead guilty, pay a light fine, and return to their homes—under these circumstances a few of them have entered the plea of guilty.

And now it is claimed that the majesty and justice of the law were vindicated by the confessions of these oppressed and over-persuaded prisoners. The rack and thumb-screw, instruments of torture in bygone ages, have extorted confessions of guilt from many an innocent sufferer, and so in the nineteenth century, in the full blaze of intelligence and civilization, more cunningly devised but scarcely less effective means have been used to extort confessions of guilt from suffering humanity, not to vindicate a principle, not to test the justice of a law, not in the interest of good government or to protect society, but simply to afford political capital to a party already bankrupt but seeking to bolster up its ruined fortunes by disreputable agencies.

But the effects of this law upon northern elections are even more appalling than those upon southern. At the bidding of one man, Chief Supervisor Davenport, thousands of voters in the city of New York, on the day of the last congressional election, were arrested, imprisoned, and disfranchised by his arbitrary acts. Men who had voted for years upon naturalization papers, the validity of which had never been questioned, on presenting themselves at the polls were taken into custody and hurried off to jail by this petty tyrant and his subalterns. Thousands of others were deterred from offering to vote, to the great gain of the republican party. The same is alleged to have been the state of things in the city of Cincinnati and at other points.

The question now forces itself upon us, Will this Congress at any and every cost repeal this law, or shall it remain a standing menace to the good citizens of the country? Shall they be taxed annually $250,000 to pay a vast horde of these supernumeraries, who were never known to our fathers but are the progeny of a Congress long since consigned to oblivion?

THE JURY TEST OATH.

I come now to consider briefly what might be termed the last act of a grand farce were it not for the tragic consequences to those who become victims to the malice and ill-will of the petty officials above described. Let us contemplate its practical workings for a moment. The scene is laid in a court-room of the United States. The judge is upon the bench, reverend, grave, and dignified, having taken the "iron-clad oath," if a Union man in the late struggle, if not, then the modified oath such as he is about to refuse to the jury to be empaneled. The bustling district attorney, who may have been a confederate soldier and could not take the oath about to be administered to the jury, is hobnobbing with the marshal for a sound and partial jury which will be sure to convict. The marshal, eager to show his fidelity to his master, the President of the United States, has gone out into the highways and by-ways and gathered up as far as he could do so by any stretch of power, a venire of the truly loyal, many of whom as they muster into court present much the appearance of Falstaff's army, which he refused to march through Coventry. The first juror is called, and instead of administering the old-fashioned oath, "a true verdict to give according to law and evidence," he is required if admitted to the jury-box to take the following oath:

You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not, without duress and constraint, taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not, directly or indirectly, given any assistance in money, or any other thing, to any person or persons whom you knew, or had good ground to believe, to have joined, or to be about to join, said insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion against, or to resist with force of arms, the laws of the United States.

Any person declining to take said oath is debarred from serving upon any grand or petit jury called to try these cases.

This first juror is perchance a man of unquestioned integrity and the soul of honor, who stood by the flag of his section in the late war until it went down in defeat and darkness, and finding nothing more could be done for the "lost cause," renewed, in good faith, his allegiance to the Federal Government. Since that day no charge of infidelity to the old flag has been made against him, no taint of dishonor attaches to his name, he is the trusted neighbor and faithful friend; and yet he is excluded from the jury-box, lest his honest heart, his unbiased judgment, should respond to the oath he had taken and acquit some unfortunate citizen of a false charge preferred against him. He stands aside and the next man upon the venire is called. He is a "chosen vessel," of rare qualities as a juror; a carpet-bagger, a home traitor, or perhaps some ignorant negro. He can take the oath; hastens to do it, and is ready to say guilty in every case, with or without evidence. His verdict is made up the moment he is ordered to take his seat in the jury-box. And so the case proceeds until the panel is completed. In and around the bar of the court-house appears a motley crew of witnesses, each one of whom has his lesson by rote. They swear to what is expected of them. The district attorney asks the court to charge the jury as to the law of the case, which is done in bomb-proof style; and notwithstanding the severe logic, the bitter invective, or eloquent appeals of counsel for the defendant, a verdict of guilty is a foregone conclusion.

Call you this trial by jury, by peers? If so, better it should be by "wager of battle," by walking over hot plow-shares, or any other of the modes known to antiquity, by which a man's innocence was required to be tested. Away with this solemn mockery. Repeal the infamous act, is wafted to the ears of Congress upon every breeze that reaches this Capitol.

And why should it not be repealed? The men of the South who constitute a part of the law-making power of the country, we who sit in this Hall, are exempted from the stringency of this oath. Judges who sit upon the bench to interpret the laws made by us are not required to take it. The ministers of the law, of high or low degree, are allowed to take the modified oath. Even a member of the President's Cabinet can enter upon his responsible duties, as did Postmaster-General Key, by taking the following oath, now administered to all officers and functionaries of the law who took part with the South in her effort for independence:

I do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

Then why not exempt jurors from the "iron-clad oath?" The answer will suggest itself readily to every mind, because it has a reflex influence upon the ballot-box, and tends to deter voters from approaching it, who would rather be disfranchised than take the hazard of arrest and conviction.

But again the question recurs, why not repeal it? It was enacted in 1862, during one of the fiercest struggles the world has ever witnessed, when the passions of men were aroused to a pitch that dethroned reason; when individual liberty, and even life, were esteemed things of little value in comparison with the grand aims of the contending parties. It cannot be justified even as a war measure, taking into consideration its vindictive character; but the deepest disgrace which attaches to the party giving it existence is, that for so many long and weary years, the same party being in power and able to repeal it at any time, it has been permitted to hang like a dark cloud over the South, giving out its bolts to the discomfiture and ruin of our citizens.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am rejoiced to know that the hour of deliverance has come. Could I express my preference in the provisions of this bill, I would not leave upon the statute-book a single vestige of these laws. Could I wipe the dark spot from the nation's escutcheon which they have placed there, could I blot from the memory of man all recollection of them, I should esteem it one of the proudest moments of my life. But fealty to my party teaches me submission to its superior wisdom, and I acquiesce in the partial repeal of the supervisors law, with notice to all concerned that I accept this as only the first installment of justice due to a long-suffering people, and that I shall hereafter claim full payment of the debt by the abrogation of every line, word, and letter of said act. Repeal these statutes and the people will take heart again, feel a renewed interest in our country's institutions, and cherish hopes of a return to the old methods and practices of administering the Government. Leave them upon the statute-book, and ever after let there be no more eloquent tirades against the Spanish inquisition or the English star chamber.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, permit me to declare that I shall follow my own convictions of duty in reference to the provisions of this bill. I neither know nor is it my duty to speculate upon or inquire into the views of the President of the United States. He is responsible to the people for his actions, and must stand or fall by them. I have no threats for him, and heartily contemn any threats made against this House by his friends. For myself, President or no President, veto or no veto, I am prepared to fight upon this line until the work proposed is done, effectually done, whatever of time, labor, or expense it may involve.

Mr. MONEY. I ask unanimous consent of the House to occupy five minutes in answering a question put by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] to my colleague [Mr. SINGLETON] with regard to the Chisholm matter. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for closing general debate has been fixed and cannot be extended without unanimous consent.

Mr. SPARKS. I do not object; but as the debate is to close at three o'clock——

Mr. HAYES and others objected.

Mr. MONEY. My only reason for asking to occupy the time now—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The call for the regular order is equivalent to an objection. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] is recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I assure you that the people of this country have witnessed for many years with painful impatience the continuation of this sectional strife. It has become distasteful to them in every part of the Union where they have the control of their right reason. It will be remembered that during the Forty-fourth Congress the sectional difficulties growing out of the war were discussed in a partisan spirit from the beginning of that Congress until its closing hour. The "plumed knight" from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] and the distinguished parliamentary gladiator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] were the central figures in the discussion in that Congress. It ought to be within the memory of all gentlemen on this floor how perfectly flat that controversy fell upon the public mind. And I risk nothing in saying that a similar fate awaits this attempt to revive fratricidal strife. All through the Forty-fifth Congress the same eternal broil was kept up. And now in this the first and extraordinary session of the Forty-sixth Congress, when the people are confidently looking for substantial relief, the same old difficulty is again introduced and weeks of precious time are being wasted in the discussion.

Sir, I have changed my mind entirely as to the remedy necessary to drive away from the politics in this country this disturber of our peace. I, sir, was a republican for twenty-one years. As soon as I obtained my majority almost I joined that party and fought in an humble way both at home and in the field to ingraft upon the laws of the country the measures which I believed were rightfully advanced by that organization. But in my opinion no remedy applied merely to the surface of this wound will give the people permanent peace. We must have constitutional treatment that will remove even the cause of the disease, and this makes it necessary to have a change of physicians. [Laughter.]

I was amazed yesterday at the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] when he alluded to the hereditary right of the democracy to rule this country and compared that party to the children of Israel in their wanderings from Egypt to the promised land; but upon reflection I thought there might be some similarity, but I did not know but he had mistaken the army of Pharoah for that of Israel. [Laughter.] Let us, however, notice the similarity between the children of Israel and the democratic party. The democracy have succeeded in getting their Joshua into the Senate and their Caleb into the House, but thousands of their carcasses have fallen in the wilderness on their way to the Caanan of their hopes. And I say to him and to the gentlemen on that side of the House that their Moses in 1880 will die on Mount Nebo, especially if he should be a hard-money Moses. [Laughter.] That ancient leader in Israel died on that celebrated mountain in sight of the promised land, because he had presumed in his own name to strike the rock that was to give forth the water to refresh the famishing caravans of his people, and the new Moses, if he represent sectional strife and the financial views which are now starving the people of this country, will perish also without realizing his exalted hope; but not because he struck the rock from which the water was to issue, but because he and his friends have joined hands across this aisle with the hard-money men on the republican side of the House to dry up the fountains of the prosperity of the people.

I have not been unmindful, Mr. Chairman, of the fact that these gentlemen on the right and left can fight over sectional issues like maddened gladiators bent on mortal combat, and then in two minutes on Saturday evening stand up like loving brothers and vote to carry us over Monday, which is bill day, and thus prevent the "greenbackers" from introducing measures of relief for the people. [Laughter and applause on the republican side.] And I say to gentlemen on the democratic side of the House that unless they give the people at this session of Congress relief they will have forfeited their opportunity for victory in 1880 by a great and deliberate parliamentary blunder.

Sir, gentlemen talk about revolution—the eloquent gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] did so on last Saturday in the most adroit and forcible manner. I say to this House that if by the continuation of sectional strife and the withholding of substantial relief you force the people to much longer "eat the bread of idleness," it will not be long before they will thirst for the "wine of violence." There is where the danger of revolution is to be looked for. It does not come from the defeated confederacy, it does not come from the gentleman on my right, primarily; but it comes from the uneasy masses who are out of employment to-day, and out of food and destitute of raiment. It comes from those through whose enforced idleness the country is now losing more per diem than it cost to put down the rebellion at its most expensive period.

Sir, I want it distinctly understood that cotton is no longer king in this country, nor is gold, but that the laboring-man, the industrial classes are sovereign, and their behests must be obeyed, and be obeyed speedily. It is unquestionably the duty of the industrial classes, by means of the ballot, to speedily take the Government into their own hands, but in doing so to do justice to all.

But to return to this unpardonable sectional strife. We used to hear, sir, during the war that it was "all quiet on the Potomac." Now we have the reverse order of things, and it is all quiet except on the Potomac. For the only controversy that I know of on this sectional matter emanates from this Hall and from the Congress of the United States, which to-day I am led to declare is sadly misrepresenting public sentiment. We have had in this controversy everything that was nauseating, everything that was sickening to the public taste, brought in and harrowed up by the discussion; the invasion of bleeding Kansas; John Brown and the capture of Harper's Ferry; the entry of Boston by Federal troops to capture or kidnap Burns; the riots in New York; the destruction of the orphan asylum, and Governor Seymour's speech to his "friends;" and some gentleman spoke, I believe, in a serio-comic way of the invasion of the sacred soil of Pennsylvania by George Washington to suppress the whisky riot. I would suggest to my venerable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] that when an appropriation is asked for the Washington Monument, he should not let that pass until he has George Washington's conduct in that matter fully investigated. [Laughter.]

When I heard, Mr. Chairman, the bugle-call of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to his "skirmishers," and when I saw him gracefully bow his shoulder that that "chip" might fall off, if perchance some democratic champion did not knock it off, and when I heard the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] in a regretful manner complain that the confederacy had been shot to death, and saw him gallantly fire a parting shot at John Brown, as the soul of that patriot went marching on; and then when I looked to my right and saw the gallant commander of that grand march to the sea sitting on this floor, and on hastily looking around saw sitting in my rear the greatest living commander of the late forces of the confederacy—it was the first time he was ever in my rear, [laughter]—I must confess to you I felt the martial spirit rising again in my breast. I could almost hear the shout of the victor and the roar of the musketry. I "felt that stern joy that warriors feel in foemen worthy of their steel." But I controlled my feelings, Mr. Chairman, and reflected that of late years the distinguished commander who led the Union forces to the sea and the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] have both taken anew the oath of allegiance to the Constitution and are both drawing handsome salaries under the same Government, payable in greenbacks. Then that blessed quotation came into my mind, "how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." [Applause.]

But seriously, Mr. Chairman, when I look at the course taken here by the leaders on both sides of the House, I consider it unpardonable as keeping alive in the breasts of the American people sectional animosities. It is greatly to be regretted. It proves to my mind that the old parties are powerless to give relief to this country. It is a fact, sir, that it takes ten or fifteen years to develop the leaders of a great party, and fully as long to shake them loose again; and it is never done, and history will bear me out in that statement, except by movement from without that crushes the organizations over which they dominate. This is the only method through which the people can gather the fruitage of advanced civilization.

There is great force and truth in the remark among the people that the leaders of the old parties feed almost exclusively on sectional strife and hatred. It is apparent also that the leaders are determined to fight and refight the issues of 1876 in the coming campaign of 1880. It is perfectly apparent and beyond dispute that they intend to do this. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] spoke of the President of the United States and his laudable effort to inaugurate an era of peace and of his having met the opposition of the South in that effort. Now, I want to state the exact history as to this. The indisputable truth of the matter is that the President has been opposed by almost a solid North and solid South in his laudable effort. The partisan press and the partisan leadership of this country have opposed every effort on the part of the Executive to restore peace. There is no mistake about that. History will bear me out in what I say, and it is current history with which we are all familiar.

Sir, I repeat again, the old parties, because of sectional animosities that have been engendered between them, are powerless to give peace to this distracted country. It was said of David, after he had collected the material to build the temple that should be dedicated to peace and typify the Man of Peace, that "David shall not build the temple, for David is a man of blood." And so it has been said from on high, as I doubt not, that these old parties shall not build anew the temple of liberty in our beloved country, for they are parties of blood. A new organization must do it, and the Lord is raising up that party now. The workmen are all at work in the quarries, and every block in the temple shall be peace. As an humble representative of the national greenback party, I feel great solicitude that it shall commence to build on solid foundations; and I say here to the gentlemen on the right and on the left that the national greenback party wants neither soldiers nor bulldozers at the polls. [Applause on both sides.] Nor do we want them near where elections are being held; and I shall offer at the proper time, if recognized for that purpose under the five-minute rule, the following amendment, which I now read as a part of my remarks:

And under like penalties it shall be unlawful for any person, unless he be a police or other civil officer acting in the discharge of his official duties, to have in his possession, either openly or concealed, fire-arms or other deadly weapons, at or near any place where any general or special election is being held in any State, when there is to be voted for at said election either candidates for Representatives in Congress or electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.

I cannot see how this can be objected to by any member upon this floor. I say, further, we want no test oath for juries. We believe there is great force in the remark that if they who served in the confederate army are worthy to come on to this floor and make laws for the people and are worthy to occupy places in the Cabinet of the Executive of this country, they are worthy to sit on juries and try offenders against the law.

Nor does the national greenback party want United States marshals at elections, unless the history of the country, after we have tried the experiment, shall prove that we cannot get along without them. I want to say here, however, that I believe as a lawyer, indeed I have not the least doubt about the constitutional right of the Government to protect its citizens at the polls while voting for United States officers. It is only a question of policy as to whether it is needed at this juncture in our history. As to the supervisors, I think that provision ought to be retained in the law with this modification, that the supervisors shall be chosen not from two parties, as I believe the law now provides, but from the parties having congressional or electoral tickets in the field, and that will give the greenback party a chance. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARLISLE. My friend from Iowa is mistaken when he states that the law now requires that the supervisors shall be selected from the two old parties. All the law requires is that they shall belong to different political parties; and if my friend belongs to a healthy political organization he can have supervisors appointed for his party.

Mr. WEAVER. It is decidedly healthy, and the only one that is growing in the country.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Growing small by degrees and beautifully less.

Mr. WEAVER. It is not growing smaller by any means. We will measure strength with your party on any field that you may choose.

But, Mr. Chairman, in the method of the repeal of these laws the national greenback party wishes to respect the constitutional independence of the Executive. We would be glad to see adopted a constitutional amendment that will allow the Executive, if he have not that power now, to approve a part of a bill and veto the rest of it. It is a very nice constitutional question, however, whether he has not that power already.

Again, sir, we oppose the concentration of so much power in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations and favor its distribution to the various committees. And now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say to both the old factions here to-day that the national greenback party will see to it that you do not make this sectional issue, the issue for 1880; neither shall you make it the issue for 1879. There is another Richmond in the field, I would have you understand.

The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] speaks of the Chicago election. Sir, the issue of that election was decidedly a national-greenback triumph, for Hon. Carter Harrison was nominated by the greenback party first, and then by the democracy. Only one year ago, when the democratic party nominated a candidate for mayor, Mr. Perry H. Smith, a popular but straight democrat, he was buried beneath a majority of 10,000. In this instance, I am informed, Mr. Harrison was nominated on the Toledo platform without the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman if Mr. Harrison was not a democratic member of the last Congress?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes; and as soon as he went home and learned the temper of the people, he joined the national party. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Was not Mr. Harrison the regular nominee of the democratic party in Chicago for mayor?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes, after the national party had told them whom to nominate. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman another question. Mr. Carter Harrison, being a greenback-democrat as you might call him, was the representative of both parties. What lesson does that teach us? It is that whenever the democratic and greenback parties shall unite, then the republican party will be defeated; and when you keep the nationals in a separate organization it always is likely to result in the success of the republican party in Illinois.

Mr. WEAVER. The result proves that and more. It proves that the combination is always successful in Illinois when the democratic party rides behind. [Great laughter and applause.] But this is mere pleasantry.

I say to gentlemen on this floor that it is our recruiting offices that are crowded daily with volunteers ready and eager to be mustered into the new organization that is to liberate this country. We have a mission to fulfill. We know no North, no South, no East, no West, and any gentleman whether he lives in the North or in the South is perfectly eligible in our party for the office of Speaker of the House of Representatives. And this cannot be said of either of the old parties.

We have no desire to raise this sectional strife in our new organization nor will we permit it to be raised. Nor do we go before the people with pledges of financial reform, and then come into this body and unite in a caucus to bind ourselves hand and foot and thus deny relief to the people. We do not do that. Mr. Chairman, we are here to keep our pledges to the people. We are the avant courier of the army of progress that cannot be frightened back by waving the bloody shirt in our faces. That cannot be done, I say to you again. This old quarrel growing out of the war has become distasteful and disgusting to the American people. They want and intend to have less of it. I should think the old parties would see that they stand sadly in need of an addition to their wardrobe. Their only garment is that sanguinary article of underwear of which we have heard so much. It reminds me of an Indian I once saw out in the far West, whose entire toilet consisted of a red bandana around his neck and a plug hat; and, like these old parties, he was perfectly unconscious of the ridiculous figure he presented. [Laughter.] It is marvelous to my mind that gentlemen on both sides of the House do not understand the wishes and temper of the people.

In conclusion I will say, that unless you pass at this session, first, a law for the unrestricted coinage of silver; second, a law for the substitution of greenbacks for national-bank notes; third, a law stopping the further increase of the bonded debt and providing for the speedy payment of the debt now outstanding; fourth, a law liberating the five hundred or more millions now lying idle in the Treasury; fifth, give to the people an opportunity to escape from the impending loss of their homes; unless these things be done at this session, very few of the gentlemen who occupy seats upon this floor will ever see them again.

Gentlemen talk about starving the Government to death. The eloquent gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] did so the other day. Who constitute the Government of this country? The people. And I say to the gentleman that the financial policy which he and his followers have foisted upon this country with the aid of the hard-money democrats on my left, is now starving to death the laboring classes of this country, and they will not stand it much longer. [Applause on the democratic side.] If you do not want them to "drink the wine of violence," I say again do not feed them on "the bread of idleness."

Mr. Chairman, I am credibly informed that there are three thousand families in this city alone sustained by soup-houses and by charity. So in every city and manufacturing district in this country the people are absolutely perishing, starving for lack of labor and of bread; and that, too, when, as was said on one occasion by Henry Clay to Martin Van Buren, "this Congress could give relief in twenty-four hours." But members prefer to fight here like mad men over the ashes where the camp-fires of civil war once blazed, and allow their constituents to starve and go naked.

Our people out West do not like the combat to which you summon them, nor the feast that you set before them, nor yet the contrast that exists between the inflation mortgages upon their farms and the resumption hogs they are forced to sell. There is too great a contrast between them. There is a screw loose in Federal legislation, and the people have found where it is. They have learned that these parties are recreant to their trust and are not legislating for their interests.

About nineteen years ago the democratic party at the bidding of the people of this country ceased to control the administration of affairs, and the republican party came into power. Now, by what seems to many a tardy and to others a too rapid revolution of the wheel of fortune, the party displaced in 1860 by the public verdict has again obtained the control of both branches of the National Legislature. It will be recorded as the fatal error of that party that its restoration to power was not signalized by speedy legislation for the relief of the people. Do not allow, I pray you, an unnecessary sectional controversy to take precedence of the real controversy between the people and the money power.

The republican party has passed under popular disfavor, and is retiring rightfully and rapidly from supremacy in this country. The good deeds and the bad deeds of both parties are alike recorded. I am aware that precedents can be found in their history to justify almost anything that is wicked and impolitic. Let us not be controlled by their precedents, but let us act for the living present and do what we know is right and for the interest of the people. Let us act as Representatives of the whole people, and not as politicians, nor for the rings and cliques of the country.

I now yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DE LA MATYR,] and the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas, [Governor JONES.]

Mr. DE LA MATYR. Mr. Chairman, I shall detain the committee with but few words. I shall simply condense and emphasize what my friend from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] has so fully elaborated. I have no aspiration to engage in this inglorious debate. I desire rather to enter my earnest protest against its whole spirit and manner and purpose. Its only redeeming feature is the ability it has exhibited, ability mostly worse than wasted. It has obviously been a desperate effort to revive a dead and buried issue. Its main result has been the uncovering of putrescence. There is no mistaking its ultimate design, which has been to rekindle the fires of sectional hate and thereby turn the attention of a suffering people from a most vicious system of financial legislation, which has paralyzed their industries, loaded them with debts, and brought them to poverty and want. It must have been the inspiration of that motive which, in the exuberant imagination of the most gifted leader of one extreme of this body, transformed a worthless chip into a diamond of purest water and measureless value.

If I know anything of the drift of public sentiment, this wanton display of belligerent rhetoric will utterly fail of its unpatriotic purpose and will be signally rebuked by the people of both the North and the South. The successive appeals to the passions which a sanguinary civil war fanned to utmost fury, made for partisan purposes at every election for fourteen years, have exhausted their potency, and they will no more respond to call. Providence is bringing at least one good out of the distress inflicted by the money power through the republican administrations of the Government. Desire for financial relief has become the absorbing aspirations of the whole people, leaving no room or welcome for the unworthy and wicked sentiments of sectional hate; and the people, as well as every impulse of true patriotism and the whole spirit of our holy religion, command a final truce to this sectional strife.

The best interests of the freedmen pre-eminently demand that this war of sections cease at once and forever. It feeds whatever of animosity is felt toward them in any section of the South, and is and must be utterly impotent to shield them from the effects of this animosity.

It is my clear conviction (and I am egotistical enough to believe that I know something of the present status of popular feeling) that these leaders of parties, now ranging their forces for 1880, would manifest more wisdom in showing some desire to relieve the people than they do in utterly refusing to suffer the friends of the people to even present any measures looking to relief, and giving themselves wholly to a wrangle over the firing upon Sumter, returning to slavery of Burns, the fiasco of John Brown, and general criminations and recriminations. I do not charge them anything for the suggestion.

As to the statutes in dispute, I favor the repeal of all but one and the modification of that, for two reasons. First, in my judgment they are expressions of a dangerous tendency toward undue centralization of power. Our southern fellow-citizens as we thought imperiled our national life by assumptions of ultra "State rights," and we fought and defeated them on that issue, and buried it so deep that but few of them desire and none of them hope for its resurrection.

Now, sir, in perfect accord with the perversity of human nature we are swinging to an opposite extreme, as perilous as the one checked by a sanguinary civil war; and these enactments are the fruits of that tendency and they serve to accelerate it, and I am in favor of setting them aside. In my judgment, our safety lies in keeping the balance of power between the multiplying States and the General Government as adjusted by the framers of the Constitution.

My second reason for desiring the repeal of all but one of these statutes in controversy, and the modification of that one, is, they are serving to fan the fires of sectional strife, which every interest of the nation demands should be extinguished. The section in dispute of the bill now before the committee, with the exception of a single clause, I regard as germane; and that it proposes to lessen Army expenditures is in my judgment too clear for dispute; and taking no stock in the argument that this body is prohibiting action by a mere technicality, I shall vote for the bill with it attached.

While I do this, I am decidedly opposed to connecting any extraneous matter with appropriation bills. That mode of legislation may be justified in a partisan view by the fact that the opposite party has resorted to it, on the principle suggested in an old saying that a certain distinguished personage must be fought with fire; but I cannot be influenced by such considerations.

I believe that any party in power that will set the example of refusing at any present party sacrifice such questionable modes of procedure will gain favor with the people.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the fact that I am the only representative of the national greenback labor party from my State on this floor is my apology for trespassing upon the time and patience of this committee.

The section of the bill now under consideration proposes to amend section 2002 of the Revised Statutes. In my opinion the proposition embraces a distinct, separate subject, and as such should be presented in a separate bill and determined upon its own merits. Were it thus presented I should unhesitatingly support it, not because I attach any importance to the consequences that might follow from its enactment, but in order to eliminate a most mischievous element from political agitation. Why, sir, but for this agitation begun in the last Congress nine-tenths of my constituents, though of average intelligence, would have died without ever knowing anything of the existence of the statutes now so much complained of. The age in which we live is practical. Our people are earnest and progressive. Their genius and their habits require that we should devote our attention to measures of useful, practical legislation rather than waste our time and energies in florid declamation over sentimental abstractions. By the demand now made by the democratic party, so called, we are reminded of the foolish husbandman who locked his stable after the horse had been stolen. Why, sir, if this statute is capable or ever was capable of abuse to the detriment of the ballot, is not the danger past? In spite of its existence, our people after fourteen years have emerged from military rule, and the civil authority is to-day supreme throughout our borders.

The subject of the bill is an appropriation for the support of the Army. The object of the section under consideration is the amendment of an important section in the law regulating elections. The latter proposition embodies a different and distinctive subject, which should be presented in a separate bill and determined upon its own merits. This is the point; this the vice of the amendment which its friends so studiously avoid and so ingeniously maneuver to obscure. The object could not be mistaken, even if it were not confessed. Those of its friends who deny or disguise it will find great difficulty in convincing any reasonable creature that they do not intend the probable consequences of the act. The object is to coerce the executive department of the Government. Can it be done? Ought it to be done? Section 7, article 1, of the Constitution provides:

> Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law.

This section establishes the veto power and provides against its abuse. The duty to approve implies and assures freedom of mind and action. Hence, whatever denies the one or constrains the other infringes upon and disturbs the executive function, and in so much subverts the Constitution. "Every bill" is the language of the Constitution. "A bill consists of one or more propositions in which is declared the will of the law-making power in reference to a particular subject." A proposition which embodies a different, distinctive subject of legislation can properly constitute no part of a bill. The requirement found in nearly all of our State constitutions that every statute shall have one object is but declaratory of common parliamentary law.

I will not pause to consider whether if the President should approve the bill this section would be inoperative or whether he might veto this section and approve the bill proper. Deferring, however, to the democratic school of strict constructionists, I incline to the opinion that either would be consistent with the Constitution; for if Congress may anticipate and circumvent the veto power by so joining an objectionable measure to one indispensible to the performance of executive functions and thus extort the President's approval, then the veto is not a substantive power but a mere shadow. If Congress shall do so, then whatever it may have been intended to be it is reduced to nothingness and the President no longer stands as the tribune of the people to forbid sectional, class, or other mischievous legislation.

But the Constitution prescribes the mode of proceeding in case of veto, and thus precludes the possibility of any other legitimate mode. The rule that the inclusion of the one is the exclusion of all others is so familiar that it need only be stated. Our Government is wisely divided into co-ordinate independent departments. Each has its appropriate sphere of action, circumscribed by fixed and well-defined limits, and so long as kept in due bounds the action of the whole cannot be other than harmonious, co-operative, and promotive of the general welfare. But if any department shall transcend its own authority and invade or disturb the functions of another, organic derangement at once begins, and the pernicious consequences can be measured only by the extent and duration of the violence. If it be continuing, the loss of institutional liberty and the establishment of personal government become inevitable.

It is, then, of the first importance that the Constitution in all its parts be maintained inviolate. This consideration outweighs party ten thousand times. And surely the two old parties, relics of strife and hate, were not as feathers in the balances against it. Upon this topic the recent past bears sad and faithful witness. A little school sprang up and began to teach contempt and hate for the Constitution of our fathers. Pandora's box was opened. All know the evils that rushed out. Boston riots, Kansas wars, John Brown raids, personal-liberty laws; but why recount? Madness fell upon the people, Douglas was mocked and hissed in Chicago, Webster was denied a hearing in Faneuil Hall. The South became alarmed. Distrusting the sufficiency of the Government to protect, and fearing its machinery to oppress, the southern people in the exercise of the Heaven-given inalienable right declared at Philadelphia and consecrated at Bunker Hill and Valley Forge, attempted to secede, and following the example of their revolutionary sires, to form a new government laying its foundations on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them seemed best. War ensued. It was the misfortune of all rather than the crime of any. It was the result of an inexorable condition in progressive life and advancing civilization. Why, then, harrow sacred memories or renew strife? Why not address ourselves to the present and the future, and emulate each other in an endeavor to promote the happiness of all? The past is invaluable for the lessons of wisdom which it teaches; and its pre-eminent lesson is the importance of adhering faithfully to the Constitution, beyond whose boundaries there is no safety.

If this section be retained in the bill, it may precipitate a conflict between the Executive and Congress; and for what? The law now sought to be amended was passed by democratic votes. However objectionable it may be, the country has not only endured, but in spite of it, as I have already suggested, emerged from military rule. What is there in the conduct or attitude of the Administration to excite distrust or alarm our fears? Have not the troops been withdrawn from Louisiana and South Carolina and sent to the distant frontier? How has this dangerous tyranny so long escaped the vigilance of the democratic party? This formidable instrument of tyranny, this terrible statute authorizing the use of force to suppress riots at the polls, existed during the Forty-fourth and the Forty-fifth Congresses; and, notwithstanding the democrats had control of the House, not a step was taken, not a demand was made for any modification of this statute until the Forty-fifth Congress was on the eve of its adjournment.

Nor is it less significant that the Rip Van Winkle conscience of the republican party should just now begin to show signs of constitutional scruples. Is it "death-bed repentance, fear inspiring piety?" What assurance has the country that even if the patient survive it will not return to the sin it loves so well? The democrats supported with zeal and eloquence the passage of the law they now seek by tactics of joinder to annul. The republicans inaugurated the strategy now turned against them, and which they so fiercely denounce. Democrats fortify themselves with republican precedents; and the republicans assail them with democratic votes and arguments. How changed, indeed, by being changed! and yet without abatement of zeal and with increased devotion to principle. The mind naturally inquires the cause of this wonderful interchangeable transmigration. Is it the dread of financial and other vital issues now threatening the disintegration of both? Must the Potter and the Teller committees be re-enforced that the public mind may be still distracted and diverted from the great issues of the day, the financial issues that concern the welfare, the prosperity, and happiness of the country? Why does this House adjourn over Mondays in order to avoid the introduction of new bills? Why turn a deaf ear to the prayer of the people coming from city, town, and country, demanding the speedy passage of measures of financial relief? Why not replenish the depleted circulation, the life-blood of the nation? Why not reanimate the industries of the country, revive its trade, stimulate its enterprise? Can partisan success compensate for the injury that will inevitably follow a procrastination of these important measures? Is party paramount to country? Have not the people already sacrificed too much to implacable faction? These are questions that refer themselves to the people. In spite of the cry now raised here on the one side about "starving the Government to death," and on the other about "military despotism," it is to be hoped that the people will so consider and settle these questions as to put an end forever to the animosities of the late unhappy war, bring prosperity to the people, and with it honest, sincere, patriotic devotion to our whole country.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I will take my stand at this desk. It has strange memories associated with it. Here I stood seventeen years ago and denounced in the strongest language in my power the conduct of the people of the eleven southern States who were in arms to sever the American Union. The black cloud of internecine war was suspended over the nation. It was an hour of angry strife, and armies were in the field, each fighting to the death for victory. I took the side of the Union. The theater of my action was in this Hall, and I discharged my duty faithfully, if not well. My son was under McClellan, before Richmond, and there lost his life. We did our share of the work for one family. My argument then was, that the eleven seceding States should be brought back into the Union from which they had separated. That was the issue; and after one of the most sanguinary conflicts recorded upon the pages of history we succeeded. The offense has been condoned. The States are again in solid compact, and the strife ended. The green sward has covered the graves of those who fell on both sides. I am the last man on God's earth who would open these burial-places and expose the remains of the men who lie in rest there as an argument to inflame the passions of men in political strife.

Let there be peace. Peace and amity, good will and fraternal relations now exist; and it is a wicked policy to raise the fire-brand of controversy on the issues of the war. It is an issue of the past, and the national mind cannot be brought to the belief that such an issue should be renewed. The effort is in bad taste. It cannot be sustained by those who would reopen the healed wounds of the conflict. And if that shall be the question—as the debates in this Chamber for the last week indicate, in the presidential contest for 1880—defeat will assuredly await those who make it. A question involving the election of the nation's Chief Executive must be a living question, not a dead one. That party which will inscribe victory upon its banner must appeal to reason and discuss the living issues of the day; must make pledges to a suffering people that if successful they will carry out such measures as will grant relief and promote the general welfare, instead of appealing to men's passions by referring them back to the war. That has been fought out; the difficulty has been compromised, settled, and ended, and it is to be hoped forever.

It is my purpose to speak of some of the questions which will enter into and control the approaching election. But I will say a few words first on the bill under consideration. It is alleged that it is vicious legislation to include in an appropriation bill enacting or repealing clauses of bad laws; that it is without precedent in the legislation of the past.

During the last quarter of a century I have been at times a member of this body; and during the years of my service never, before the debate on this bill, did I hear questioned the right or propriety of ingrafting upon an appropriation bill other necessary and proper measures. I do not speak from the book, but from my own personal knowledge on this subject. It was reserved for the superior wisdom of gentlemen of the Forty-fifth Congress to make the important discovery that class appropriations are too sacred to be associated with the public wants and the public necessities. Strange idea! Better fitted for the stock exchange and money jobbers than the House of Representatives! I maintain that if such necessary measures cannot be passed separately, then they should be coupled with appropriation bills.

This same bill fell in the disagreement of the two Houses at the last session, and which was the means of reassembling Congress at a great cost to the nation, and now the veto is thrown into our teeth if it be passed. This veto power which is now made to play so important a part in modern legislation in the good and prosperous days of the Republic was confined solely to constitutional objections. The path laid out by the fathers has been widely departed from. It is used now when the mind of the Executive is not in accord with his peers of the two Houses. It is very likely that the opinions of two hundred and ninety-three men are entitled to as much respect and consideration as the opinion of one man. We had an exhibition of the veto mania on the silver bill, and when it came back the two Houses had the manhood to pass the bill over the veto by a two-third vote, the constitutional majority.

And then again was thrust in our faces a veto on the Chinese bill, which failed to secure a constitutional majority. And, sir, allow me to say that no project of law more appropriate and just ever passed Congress than this same Chinese bill. It was designed to intercept the immigration of a race of men differing with our people in all those necessary personal traits which give character and fame to the people of Europe from whence our fathers came. It is not congenial to the American traits of character and their social, religious, and intellectual qualifications to be forced into the same society and daily intercourse with a people who do not believe in the existence of a God nor a state of future rewards and punishments, whose habits and customs do not comport with our ideas of an enlightened people. We have a hundred and fifty thousand of them on our Pacific slope and "the cry is, still they come." We do not want their presence. They are not the material to build up our population. So thought a large majority of the two Houses of Congress. His Excellency, however, thought otherwise; and, pray, is the wisdom of the Government concentrated in this one head? It is a grave matter of doubt whether this vast power should be lodged in the Executive at all. Exercised as the early Presidents did, confining a bill to a strict constitutional test, and perhaps it is well enough. It is a power unknown to the English constitution. Sovereign nor the House of Lords have any right to interfere with the acts of the Commons where money appropriations and revenue are the questions. The House of Commons is supreme in such matters. This was settled at Runnymede.

And who are we, the Representatives of the people, assembled in this Hall? Our acts and opinions are not worth the scroll upon which they are transcribed, at least so far as vetoing important bills was concerned in the last Congress. And now the very gentlemen who at the commencement of the Forty-fifth Congress were by no means loud in the praise of their man in the executive chair seem to have lost that feeling of coolness which they manifested; to-day they are loud in their praise and adulation. Why is it? There is a charm attached to power, especially when clothed with patronage.

But I leave the bill, which will be taken care of by its friends in this House—Army clauses, test oaths, and supervisors—and come to speak of some of the grave issues which must determine the approaching presidential election. It is early to begin this fight, but the tocsin has been sounded. I do not believe either that this bill, which will be passed in the same shape it was at the last session, will come back maimed and mutilated by a veto. If the Executive shall be that way inclined, it is to be hoped that his friends who have him in keeping will restrain him from the commission of so wanton and indiscreet an act. Let them see to this. The country will become exceedingly restive under another extra session without cause. And now I shall speak of some of the duties of Congress which if unheeded and passed by will not prolong the tenure of the party in power in the two Houses.

The people have a right to be heard. Their wishes and demands are known. It is not a secret to us, nor a sealed book. Notwithstanding, during the whole session of the Forty-fifth Congress, no one act, save the passage of the silver bill, was passed which gave the masses of the people the least aid or comfort. Capital stood in the road with a drawn sword and the Executive with a veto in his breeches pocket. Class had it in its own way, the millions looked on stupefied and amazed that their promised pledges of relief were unheeded, neglected, and forgotten. Were their demands ungenerous? Were they wrong? A bait was thrown to them in allowing the specie resumption act to take effect on the 1st of January, 1879. This was held out by what is called the hard money party as a sovereign remedy for all the ills which existed, and a relief for all the suffering in the land. It was to revive trade and commerce, give employment to the workingman, and restore business generally. All was to go smoothly when the day of specie resumption dawned. The farmer, the merchant, the mechanic, the day laborer, were all to be made happy with specie resumption. And what has been the result? What quickening influences have been felt in all the industries of the nation produced by specie resumption? The promises of its friends were all fair, but the fruit was the apple of the Dead Sea, full of ashes and bitter to the taste.

By resumption has there been an additional sail set upon the sea? Has there been a languishing manufactory revivified into life? Has any one seen the black smoke ascend from the mill, or seen the bright fire of the furnaces? Has there been a dollar invested in any new enterprise? Have the crops of the farmer increased in price? Have we not the same prostration in business as before? Who, save the bondholder, the stock-gambler, and the money-lender, have been in the least benefited by what is called resumption? And to-day, sir, we are as far off from realizing the absolute fact of resumption as we were during the civil war. The business men of the country in all its various branches—the laborer, the farmer, all were opposed to resumption. They were all overruled. The voice of the multitude was stifled, and all done to satisfy the avarice of the men who hold the purse-strings of the nation. They hold the ear of those who could make or repeal laws, and the great masses of the people were nowhere. The time had not come for resumption, even in name only as it is. The country did not want it, but their protest was too feeble to prevent it. And this is one of those living questions which has to be met, instead of retaliation for the bloody acts committed nearly twenty years ago.

The people demanded an increase of the currency. Many of them had bought on credit and mortgaged when the national dollar, with its Government stamp known as legal tender, was worth two or three times more in value compared with what it is now. The whole policy of the Government has been to contract the volume of currency, and the result is now a national currency, including legal-tenders and bank issues, of some $700,000,000—but about one-third of what it was at the close of the war. In what did the policy of this wild system of contraction of the money circulation of the country consist? Those who pursued the empty phantom and senseless vision of specie basis and specie payment did not stop to notice the ruin and distress which were pervading the land. Real estate encumbered with mortgages; commerce at a point of depression unknown before in the country; all the industries languishing, and the laboring-man almost reduced to starvation. They did not stop to see the sheriffs' proclamations in countless numbers posted over the doors of the dwellings of the people of the country, "this estate will be sold at public auction and outcry." Terrific words! They did not observe that the national debt was daily growing larger and taxation daily increasing. Resumption was the cry, and every interest dear to the people must necessarily yield to the Moloch of money. The banker and the bondholder were happy; and what did it concern them as to the general welfare of the nation outside of their rings and combinations? Money became less and less in volume and interest became higher. The property sacrificed at judicial sales became vested in the men who held the money of the country. It had gone out of the necessary channels of trade to be locked up in the Treasury or invested in interest-bearing bonds.

The press informs us this morning that on yesterday eight and a quarter millions of dollars were deposited in the Treasury, and to-day were deposited fifty-nine millions more. For what? To be invested in interest-bearing bonds? In two days sixty-seven and a quarter millions drained from the channels of trade, commerce, agriculture, mining, manufactures, and labor. It is, sir, in my judgment, a most destructive and ruinous policy. It teaches the lesson of idleness and a false political economy. Our people should be thoroughly imbued with the idea of living by their industry, not to rely upon the interest accruing upon their bonds. How infinitely better that this constant flow of money into the Treasury for the purpose of procuring bonds should remain in active employment. It is an inexcusable blunder that the industrial affairs of the country should be robbed in this way. The people, to carry on their business affairs, must have the necessary currency to do it. They had a currency as good as any nation ever enjoyed till those in power by chance occupied a position which clothed them with authority to enforce the rule of ruin, France, the best financially administered government in the world. has a circulation upon a scale of some $45 per capita. This Government, the worst financially managed country in the world, has some $12 per capita. France is prosperous. Prussia and England, somewhat approximating to the measure of currency compared with ours, but much better, are in as deep despair as we are. Riots, strikes, political commotions, and threatened outbreaks of the people are of daily occurrence there. In the place of seven hundred millions of circulation we should have a thousand millions, and this in legal-tenders, without interest, would save the nation a round hundred millions a year.

The banks say no, the bondholders say no, John Sherman says no, and Congress, in a submissive, half-suppressed voice says no, while the people, leading off in public opinion and twenty years ahead of the men to whom they have intrusted their power, beg, plead, and petition Congress to save them from total ruin. They demand an increase of the national currency, and sooner or later they will have it. Nor can the representatives in Congress deceive them by making a national political issue as to whom was at fault in a civil war which is ended, with sixteen years of peace succeeding. It is not who was at fault in that war as to future legislation, but it has become a question of life and death, a question of starvation. The money which has been taken from the great industries of the country must be restored to them; and this question of the restoration is one that must become an important and leading question in the campaign of 1880, and let not the hard-money leaders deceive themselves by the side issue of a war fought, ended, and finished almost a quarter of a century ago. There is no way in which the country can be restored to prosperity but by giving them a sound and abundant currency, stamped by the great seal of the nation, and the nation's honor pledged for its redemption. Here is a political issue that has meaning and substance, and if Wall street scowls it is a sure indication that the policy is right.

Another issue which will arise, if not in the mean time met and provided for by the Forty-sixth Congress, is the unlimited coinage of silver. Who, pray, in these modern days of profound wisdom and deep philosophy, was the author of the wonderful idea, that the products of our mines should be made the subject of barter and trade, in the place of being coined into dollars? And yet, strange as it may seem, there is a bitter conflict between the great masses of our people and the bank and bond coalition to suppress the coinage of the silver product of our mines. What, pray, would they do with it? Send it to other countries as an article of commercial exchange? Manufacture it into baubles to please the whims of the men who deal on change? It was the currency of the world ages before gold. The penny paid to the laborer in the vineyard, and the coin with the inscription of the head of Cæsar upon it, which was exhibited to Christ nearly two thousand years ago, were silver coins. Gold as a currency is five hundred years the junior of the silver coin. But in these modern, degenerate days in which we live the silver dollar is decidedly vulgar! It is common, oh, how common! We did manage by hard labor to introduce and pass a bill in the last Congress authorizing the coinage of a limited amount of silver. And why in the name of reason should the sum have been limited? The measure met the approbation of the people; they desired the passage of a law unlimited as to the amount to be coined; but the restriction of limitation must be put upon it. Why? The money power of the country can answer the question. It did not comport with their idea of their own interests. But just so sure as the sun rises in the heavens to-morrow, this popular boon shall and will be conceded. If this Congress shall fail to do it, the succeeding one will not.

For what purpose do we occupy this Chamber? For none other than to obey the power that sent us here; and when we fail to do this it is Punic faith upon our part, and we are unfit and unworthy to be here. It is the constituency that is master of the situation. I trust that this Congress will add the word unlimited as to coinage in the law of the last session; if not, it will be one of those issues which must go over to the campaign of 1880, and as a set-off to the evils produced by a defunct and dead rebellion, of which the bloody shirt is the talisman.

Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the committee to another issue, and one which will put in or keep out of the Treasury some seventy millions a year. I mean a tax upon incomes. That is a wise provision in the laws of the States generally, that taxation shall be equal. Money and other property, real or personal, should be alike subject to the payment of its share of the public burden. The bonded debt of the nation may be some two thousand millions. A great part of these bonds are held at home, the rest in Europe. These bonds are not taxable, but the interest received upon them annually is the subject of taxation. Why should there not be imposed upon this an income tax? And why should not the merchant and the man of wealth, without regard to his occupation, also be taxed on his yearly income? And yet these classes are exempt, while the laborer in most of the States is taxed for his occupation, the farmer for every acre of his land and the live stock which he owns, the mechanic for his trade, and also the small and often half-paid tenement of the poor. These are legitimate subjects for the attention of the assessor; but there is no law by which he can put on his duplicate the name of the man who has an income of a hundred thousand a year. It is said to be inquisitorial to pry into the secrets of the man of wealth as to the income he receives annually. There is no inquisition in the way when the man of moderate means (and in fact the man who generally pays the money to run the Government) is made to render a report of the number of acres of land that he owns—how many cattle and sheep and horses; how many watches in his home; how many dogs; how many dollars on interest, and a hundred and one other items. This is all very well; but to ask the millionaire what interest he receives, what is his income, that is monstrous—that is inquisitorial. That fact disclosed may be detrimental to him; but not, however, unless he is sailing under false colors. Equal taxation of all property and all income is the rule of justice. But as class and privileged persons are the peculiar favorites of high officials and law-makers, there will be a struggle before the country will see this important measure entered upon the statute-book.

And the passage of an income tax will be one of the issues of 1880. A bloody rebellion will not offset this. As there is not much probability that this Congress will pass such a bill, the question again reverts to the people.

I would speak, too, of the condition of the laboring-man and of the necessity of granting him aid and assistance in this hour of his distress, and in many cases destitution. This question, in my view of the whole political phase, is paramount to any other subject. True it is that there were but twenty-three votes cast in the last Congress in favor of the homestead supplement which I introduced. But I do not despair of favorable action on this subject or some other kindred measure of relief when the project shall become more thoroughly understood. Considering the vast number of laboring-men who are out of and cannot procure employment, and the deplorable situation in which thousands of them are placed, it seems to me that a wise and generous government ought to provide for them liberal aid. I have heretofore given my views at length on this subject of affording assistance to this class of people. The terrible condition that many of them are reduced to appeals to our generosity with great force.

If these people could be assisted so far as to enable them to settle upon our great domain, or make them a small loan to sustain life till they could make a beginning in their new homes, it would be an act of great wisdom on the part of Congress, and be a much better course of procedure than the granting of subsidies to railroad corporations and gifts of millions of acres of land. It is not in character with the dignity and humanity of the Government to allow its poor to suffer from want and allow many of them, as is the fact, to die of absolute starvation. National aid in this manner is one of those momentous matters that should claim the careful consideration of Congress. It is one of the issues in the campaign of 1880, and one which will have a much larger number of people to sustain it than many of you are aware. As to myself, though but indifferently sustained here at the last session, it is not my purpose while I have a seat in this Chamber to abandon this idea. If I am in a small minority, I shall still work on undiscouraged and without flagging in what I conceive to be one of the grandest charities that was ever brought to the consideration of Congress; an act of justice, too, on the part of a great Government to a distressed and an impoverished portion of its population.

The disabilities under which our laboring people are placed are caused by no act of theirs. In the general crash of the great industries of the country the employer and employed occupy one common level. It is poverty and destitution, and this is known and fully understood by the people generally and should be by Congress. It will be, and is now, an important question. Let those who do not understand its force and character look to it before it may be too late. I therefore conclude that this labor question will play an important part in the future. It cannot be set off as a side issue and swallowed up in the great rebellion—dead and buried. Labor and the rights of laboring-men are big matters for politicians to deal with. They have too long been "coerced," in the language of a member of this Chamber. The power of "coercion" may be transferred. It is among the events of the future.

Another question, and a living issue too, will be whether it may not be time to retire the bank issues and supply their places with legal-tenders. This in my judgment would afford a better currency and save to the Treasury some twenty millions or more a year. To this measure there can be no reasonable or sound objection; and the day will assuredly come when such a line of policy will be adopted. This Congress will not of course do it, but let us hope for a better state of things. Let us pray for the time to come when money shall not be king, and when the sovereign will of the people may be firmly established—firm as the rock of ages. Then prosperity may again dawn upon us; but not till we rid ourselves of the base shackles that we wear. So long as we bend the knee to Baal and worship the golden calf, so long discontentment and want and privations will be in the dwelling of the poor man—the wolf at his door. He should have liberal wages and be put in position to rear, support, and give his children the rudiments of a common education.

The withdrawal of the bank issues and the substitution of legal-tenders will not be a side issue in the campaign of 1880, nor will the "bloody rebellion" be an available set-off. It, too, will be a living issue—not a dead one.

And then, too, will come in the great question of making eight hours a legal day's work. Such is the law now, but the Government official refuses to carry it into execution. At the last session this House enacted an enforcing law compelling those who had charge of the men who labor in our navy-yards and all of our public establishments to limit the day's work to eight hours. The Senate refused to pass it, and the bill fell. It was a just bill, and a humane one; but as class was not interested in any way it did not have friends enough to procure its passage. The "wicked rebellion" was a matter of more moment. In this there is supposed to be political capital. The people of this land may not come to the same conclusion in 1880.

Mr. Chairman, I have thus enumerated, in as condensed a manner as I could, these questions and issues which are before the country, and must in some way be disposed of. The right of suffrage is large, and there will be very, very many to record by their votes their opinions on these subjects.

And now, sir, will this Congress adjourn without acting upon these measures, or some of them, which I have alluded to, and which concern the welfare of the whole country? If so, it will be the greatest error ever committed by a legislative body. It should not be the object of a congressional session to look to the privileges of any one class. We are the representatives of the people, and should frame laws for the people as well as privileged persons. Heaven knows we have had enough of class legislation; and, strange to say, the action of the last Congress had class in its view, and that only. We came back this session and the same line of procedure is adopted, and there seems to be a settled determination by a majority of this body to look exclusively to the Army, the Executive, the Legislature, and the judiciary. Is there no other portion of our immense population of nearly fifty millions of souls that have no place here? In this hour of calamity and distress throughout the length and breadth of this land is there no kindly measure of relief to be considered? Three weeks have passed, and what has been done? The "bloody shirt" during that time has engrossed the entire attention of this House—and millions of our people in the straits of starvation! Wise statesmanship that, which makes political and party capital paramount to a nation's welfare!

You cannot escape the public censure if this House shall adjourn without an effort to do something for the relief of the country. Seventeen millions may console the Army, but how as to the remainder of our people? Twenty-five thousand cared for, who wear the uniform of the Army, and more than forty-five millions taxed to raise the amount and whose voice or opinion is of no earthly account. The people clamor for more currency to transact their industrial affairs; the unlimited coinage of silver, taxation upon incomes, substantial aid for the great number of laboring-men out of employment asking for bread, starving; for the withdrawal of bank notes to be supplied by legal-tenders; for an end to special legislation for capital, an end to the issue of interest-bearing bonds, and that eight hours shall be the limit to the man who labors in the Government shops. All these popular demands ring in the Representative ear; but the wrongs of the rebellion perpetrated long, long ago is the reply to the appeals, the prayer, the supplications of a suffering people.

Here, sir, in this Chamber, is where the public opinion of the masses should prevail. But public opinion, in opposition to the money power of Wall street, is a feather only in the balance. There, sir, is the great maelstrom that engulfs presidents and cabinets, legislatures and peacemen. The opinion of the jobbers of Wall street governs the nation; and woe to the man who has the hardihood and effrontry to open his mouth for popular rights or honest government. He is at once denounced as a lunatic or a fool. Wall street takes snuff and the central powers of the Government and large numbers of the two Houses of Congress sneeze. Wall street says let us have the bloody shirt for a flag, and up it goes to the masthead. Wall street would put the hounds on a false scent. Wall street would encourage a fight on a dead issue, that it can reap all the benefits that would result to the millions in sustaining the living issues of the day. The magnates of Wall street are very clever in their way, but their ways are remarkably selfish. It was Wall street that forced specie resumption—and the result is that the finances and trade and commerce of the country are sinking, sinking, and so will continue. Resumption was a sovereign panacea—it was to restore trade, establish public confidence, give bread to the suffering people. Wall street had said so, and that was enough. Resumption was a problem to be decided by the business men of the country. It was not a matter for Congress to interfere with.

Mr. WHITE. We ought, then, not to pass any laws at all.

Mr. WRIGHT. There is no doubt, sir, but that the country would be infinitely better off if there was much less of legislation than there is; especially that part of it which relates to laws for the benefit of privileged classes, and a glance at the statute-book will show that this is at least three-fourths of it; ay, more. A very distinguished statesman of this country—a great, good, and pure man—told me years ago, in talking about the intricate, inexplicable, unintelligent, and arbitrary rules which are supposed to govern and control the action of this Chamber that they "were shaped to retard and prevent legislation, upon the principle that it were better to have no legislation than bad legislation, which was but too often the case."

Mr. WHITE. Who was that?

Mr. WRIGHT. John C. Calhoun. The most distinguished and profound statesman of his time; and, in my judgment, this country has never produced his parallel. Is it possible, sir, that this long debate, upon a question heretofore considered to be not upon disputable ground, is provoked for the purpose of delay in the progress of necessary legislation for the real benefit of the country? It is not for me to make the allegation, but all the just conclusions lead me to think so. I understood the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in reply to a question from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] to say that he would vote for the amendments to this bill as separate propositions.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; I have never said that at all. I said I was willing to vote for the repeal of this whole law that authorizes or restricts the use of the Army at the polls. I was willing to vote for the repeal of it all, but not for passing the mangled restrictive powers of the law.

Mr. WRIGHT. I beg the gentleman's pardon if I have misstated his reply to the question of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.] I fail to see, however, that there is much distinction between what he now says and what I represented him to have said. I cannot for my life discover why good legislation, and especially such as is germane to an appropriation bill, may not as well be made a part of the bill as to be made the subject of distinct and separate action. The bill with its riders I regard just and proper, and it shall have my vote And such I believe to be the opinion of a large majority of this Chamber. Nor do I believe that if this bill shall receive the sanction of both Houses of Congress that it will ever come back with a veto, notwithstanding the threatening remarks made by its enemies. This consigning a bill to the tombs by the veto power before it is known what the bill may be, before it leaves the Senate and House, is, to say the least of it, indiscreet and unwise.

Mr. WHITE. Is my colleague, in what he is now saying, a democrat or a national—which side is he speaking on?

Mr. WRIGHT. I am speaking on the side of the Lord and the people. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. Is that the national party?

Mr. WRIGHT. I have said. If the gentleman is not satisfied with the answer he will refer to the dictionary of common sense, a copy of which the gentleman should have, if he has not.

We have heard much said about "coercion." That is a term that may be applied to any vote upon any question in this Chamber. The majority is always "coercion." I speak of the application of the term especially to the acts and proceedings of this House. I can name a very insignificant number of persons who have for many years back "coerced" the people of this country. I mean that "coercion" upon the part of the National Executive and the National Legislature which has turned a deaf ear to the demands of the people, whose prayers they have disregarded, whose wants they have neglected to provide for, and whose strong voice has not reached effectively the executive chamber and the Halls of the Capitol. The masses have plainly made known their wishes, but the favorable response is yet to come. Suffering humanity is an unpleasant matter in the eyes of those who hold the mace of power and sway the rod of empire. But, sir, in this land of ours the appeal of suffering humanity will yet be heard in these Halls if the people are but true to themselves, and being true to themselves they are true to their country and true to civil liberty. They will not submit to "coercion" at the threat of those to whom they have delegated their power.

This Chamber must be aware, and members cannot close their eyes upon the stubborn fact, that the people are restive; they feel that a great wrong has been done them in making no advance whatever for their relief. Would you by your inaction drive them to despair? Would you wait till anxiety, hope, and despondency drive them to violence? Why not give them some of the measures of relief they have asked for, are praying now for, by night and by day? You cannot afford to trifle with the will of the nation. The Congress of the Union is now in session. What has engaged its attention for the whole time it has been in session? A brawl and dispute on a question which has lain quietly in its grave for fifteen long years. Can it now be exhumed and manufactured into political capital? That is what Congress has devoted three weeks to, and exclusively; and it is now proposed that when this broil is ended the book shall be closed; the speeches printed and circulated as the questions upon which the election of 1880 shall be decided, and that then Congress will adjourn. There is one in your midst who will never cast his vote for an adjournment without a strong effort to do some of those things which the people intrusted to us to do.

What a record it would be, that Congress should have met, made provision for the Army, the Legislature, (ourselves,) the judiciary, and the Executive, and then have gone to their homes without an effort looking to the wants, necessities, and wishes of the people having been done. The idea strikes the mind as absolutely monstrous. Let this House beware that it close its doors, after providing for yourselves and the privileged classes, without a step in advance toward granting the wants of the people. Do not delude yourselves with the idea that you can make peace at home by running up or hauling down the "bloody shirt." That will not fill an empty stomach, give employment, or make amends for your failure to give the people currency and not having discharged the duties they intrusted to your hands. The "bloody shirt" is not bread; it is not an increase of legal-tenders; it is not an eight-hour law, not a tax on income, not the unlimited coinage of silver, not the substitution of greenbacks for bank-notes, nor small material aid to the unemployed workingmen of the land. The "bloody shirt" is the ensign of a dead issue; and you will be required to face living issues, popular demands that cannot well be resisted—demands based upon solid arguments and fortified by reason and sound common sense.

Mr. COFFROTH. I hope the time of my colleague [Mr. WRIGHT] will be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would hope the Committee of the Whole will indulge the gentleman from Pennsylvania with ten minutes more. The Chair had expected to recognize the gentleman for a longer time; but, owing to the prolongation of the debate yesterday by other gentlemen, it was not possible for him to do so. The Chair suggests that if the committee will grant the gentleman from Pennsylvania ten minutes, not to be taken out of the time for general debate, it will be a perfectly fair arrangement.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the debate is not to close at three o'clock, I have no objection.

Mr. CONGER. The Committee of the Whole cannot extend the time.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. General debate must close at three o'clock by order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can rise that the House may extend the time. The Chair presumes there will be no objection to that. If such is the understanding the gentleman from Pennsylvania can now continue, and when he has concluded the committee may rise and extend the time.

Several members objected.

Mr. WRIGHT. I appeal for my right.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have the floor.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will state to the Chair a question of order. My colleague [Mr. WHITE] yielded me yesterday ten minutes of his time, and my other colleague [Mr. COFFROTH] yielded me thirty minutes. But I have been overridden, have been deprived of the right to which I was entitled according to the arrangement.

Mr. SPARKS. By the order of the House this debate will close at three o'clock. I insist that the general debate close at that time. [Cries of "That is right."] We have been as indulgent as it was possible to be in extending the debate, and now I insist that the general debate shall terminate at the time fixed with great unanimity by the House. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania can get some time from gentlemen who are to follow him I shall be glad, as I would like him to finish his remarks; but the debate should close at the time already fixed. I shall object to extending it one minute.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope there will be no objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of extending the debate. The motion I desire to make when the committee shall rise——

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know that I yield the floor.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to move in the House that my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] have an hour, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] an hour——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] moves that the committee rise.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Connecticut has the floor, and he has refused to yield it. There are many of us desiring to speak whose names are down on that list, far down, but we have no opportunity at all, under the order of the House closing debate at three o'clock, to be heard on this important question, I myself among the number; and yet, with the other gentlemen, I yield to the decision of the House. Now let the gentleman from Connecticut have his time.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not object to the gentleman from Connecticut having his time, nor to any other gentleman having the time allowed him; but I do insist on having my right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut has the floor and he declines to yield.

Mr. WRIGHT. I raise the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yesterday my colleague [Mr. WHITE] yielded to me ten minutes of his time.

Mr. HAWLEY. Why did not you take it at that time?

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman has put it off until now cannot he put it off until three o'clock, taking his time after that. [Laughter.]

Mr. WRIGHT. If I occupied one hundredth part of the time of the House that the gentleman from Michigan has, then perhaps I might be liable to its censure.

Mr. SPARKS. I insist on the gentleman from Connecticut proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no discretion in the matter. [Cries of "Go on!"] The gentleman from Connecticut has the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, you will remember that I opposed limiting this debate, because I said the country did not grudge us time sufficient to consider the most important question that has been before us for some years. So the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot shake his silver locks at me.

I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I rise with a good deal of hesitation. This question has been debated at very great length, and by able men, but, as John Stuart Mill has said, "on all great questions much remains to be said," and as I set forth my own views the subject may possibly appear in a light a little different from that exhibited by others.

At the cost of much exasperation and anxiety and much injury to the material interests of the country, we have assembled in an extra session to discuss two important appropriation bills giving about $46,000,000 to the Government—the Army and the legislative and executive and judicial appropriation bills. In a moment you will see that without them this nation, theoretically, cannot live. If it live, it lives by the patriotic devotion of men who are willing to work two years for nothing and to trust the future, or by the voluntary subscriptions of the patriots who came forward in 1861 with as many millions as Abraham Lincoln asked for. We are asked to put the country in that condition.

Each of these bills contains provisions not essential to the purposes asserted in its title. Those provisions were so placed at the close of the late session of the Forty-fifth Congress in order to compel the assent thereto of the Senate, and with the alternative of withholding the supplies entirely. One House attempted to do it then. The political character of the Senate having changed, the experiment is to be renewed, with the avowed purpose of compelling the assent of the Executive under the same capital penalty. This introduction of the Executive is none of our doing. We were told at the end of the session, and we have been told repeatedly—indeed, we were told yesterday by a prominent member that he did not wait for us to make the issue, that he tendered it—we have been told, sir, that it is the purpose to compel the assent of the Executive under that same capital penalty. If any man knows the opinions and purposes of the President he may not announce them here. We must vote as we deem best for our country without fear or favor, bearing our full share of the responsibility; but should he feel bound by his conscience and judgment to veto these bills, we are freely told by some, not speaking I hope, I would fain believe, for all of the majority, that the inquisitorial thumb-screw will be applied to us of the minority to the end that a two-thirds vote may be obtained or those bills must fail. We have a right to say we will go no further in this debate, but content ourselves with an inflexible, unvarying nay to the end of the chapter, and then appeal to the country.

Mr. PRICE. That is it.

Mr. HAWLEY. But it is right that we should examine with extreme care the whole ground upon which we stand. There should be no false pride and factious stubbornness in this serious matter; and if the appeal is to be taken to the grand court of the whole people the sooner we take up the argument the better.

THE SUBJECTS OF THE DEBATE.

Our discussions group themselves under three heads:

1. The proper functions of a standing army in our complex Republic.

2. The extent to which the National Government may regulate the election of Representatives in Congress, and what it may do to enforce its regulations and protect the people in voting.

3. Propositions to force the President and the minority of Congress into abandoning their constitutional right of disapproval under penalty of stopping supplies.

These comprehend substantially the whole discussion.

At the risk of repeating what every boy familiar with the textbooks on the science of government knows, I shall devote a few minutes to the functions of an army in this Republic. It is an obvious truism to say that a free government is not a government without force. It is quite popular in cheap places to declaim to the ignorant mind against the power, the cruel power, that is above them. I hold it is the theory of our Government that whatever is to be done by a whole people can be best done by a free people. If force is to be exercised anywhere, let the people say where and how it shall be exercised, and force under no other form of government can equal it.

That this is a Government of all men does not mean that there is to be no force, no compulsion in it. Without the supreme power to absolutely crush, to bring overwhelming force, to take life, to stop argument, to resort to brute force, no government can exist. Now, that is not what they like to talk about at the cross-roads; but it is the truth laid down in every primer upon the science of government. Without the power to absolutely crush, at the proper emergency, a government cannot exist.

Why, sir, on the statute-books of my old conservative State, that has been a thorough-going democracy since 1634 and never had a governor in that time that it did not elect—on the statute-books of my State there are due and careful provisions that the sheriff, if there be resistance or opposition rising to the dignity of a riot, may give notice in a loud voice warning the evil-disposed to disperse. If they persist he may summon all good citizens. If the violence and disobedience continue he may summon the militia of the county. After that, whoever is wounded or killed, it is his own fault. If he stay a moment longer it is at his own peril from the bludgeon or the pistol or the musket or the cannon. And that is drawn from good old English doctrine. That is law wherever there is a government that is not a farce. The commands against trespasses and assaults and robbery and burglary and murder, if without force, are but the teachings of moral science, the advice of good citizens. The turbulent and the thieving, the burglarious and the murderous, will laugh at the advice. Go to these western Territories where sometimes far in advance of laws the people gather in multitudes. It is just as unlawful and wicked to steal horses and murder men and jump claims there as here; but what care these bad men for that, for there are no statutes and no sheriffs? But by and by the people come together, and some morning there is a vigilance committee, and the trees are adorned by the hanging corpses of the scoundrels. There you come down to your fundamental principles; and that hanging is legalized when the government comes to be formed and the indispensable reserved element of force is duly organized.

We are told that the United States marshal must rely on the militia and has no right to call for the interference of United States troops. Yes, but when these troubles arise, as in the old whisky insurrection or Shay's rebellion, or now with the moonshiners and the ku klux, probably the militia are the very men who are committing the crime, and to say the officers can call only them is simply to say they may sin with impunity.

No, sir; the government that gives the order must have the power to enforce it. Are there no occasions for the use of troops in this country? Is there no occasion for the element of cruel force? It is very pretty to tell the people there is not, but we know it would be telling a falsehood. Are there no prejudices of caste and of race here? Do not narrow and ignorant men sometimes hound the yellow men, the red men, the black men, or the Protestants, or the Catholics, or the Jews? Do our angry passions never rise? Do multitudes never get together here and trample on all law and order to the degree that the sheriff and the constable become a laughing-stock? Something of this has happened in every State, even in the orderly "land of steady habits;" and see the Pittsburgh and accompanying railroad riots for a terrible example.

No, sir, you have no Federal statute that will command the respect of the people unless there be back of it the power to enforce it. Is the trespass on the ballot-box the only crime that will never be committed? All these other things happened. Will it never come to pass, when men come together on the most exciting and excitable day of the whole year, in great multitudes, discussing great questions angrily, that they will trespass on each other's rights and stormily break the public peace? Is that the only day in the year when the strong arm of the Government is not to be ready, the only day in the year when the arm of the sheriff may not be made heavy? Yet that is your theory. It is all very pleasant to talk of the sovereign people, but we do not deceive even them.

We do not deceive the slums of New York when we talk about their right to a free ballot and to roam at will through that city. If you wish to find hostility to organized power, you will find there habitually, and in similar cities all over the world, in the fierce denunciation of the police, the same spirit that in more elevated circles here and elsewhere finds relief in denunciations of military force, and especially of the regular Army.

ENGLISH PRECEDENTS.

Our Army, sir, is a small one; it is relatively insignificant; it has always been an honorable Army; it is wholly under civil authority. The money for its support is voted only for one year, and cannot be voted for more than two in advance. It can be disbanded by us here. Who is afraid of our regular Army? Who fears it will take away the liberties of the people when it is absolutely under our control? You refer us to English precedents. There for centuries the king raised his own troops out of his own revenues, with no vote from any Parliament, with no constitution, but merely some traditions that served in place of a constitution.

And yet you pretend to draw an exact analogy between us and England. Why, we took the benefit of all her thousand years of experience, of her Magna Charta, her bill of rights, and her voluminous interminable legislation, and consolidated it in our Constitution. We have the benefit of her centuries of struggles to reach control of the king in exercising power over the Army. We started where she ended. It is our Army, and not the king's. The very fundamental principle that the money appropriated can be applied for specific objects is now so well understood that nobody thinks of it at all. This principle was well established as long ago as the reign of Charles II; and Hallam, in his standard work on the constitutional history of England, says that as the result of these combats for the rights of the people against the king there remains an excess of jealousy against a standing military force. The Federalist makes a similar observation.

We inherit a natural, wholesome, extraordinary jealousy of this form of the element of force in the Government from our English ancestors. I do not wish to weaken this sentiment. I wish to give it its proper place. The Articles of Confederation, before the Union was established, restricted the authority of the State Legislatures in maintaining troops, but put no restriction upon the Confederation. Only two of the old colonies had any provisions in their constitutions against standing armies, and these two simply said that standing armies ought not to be kept up, but did not forbid them.

The power to support and maintain the Army given in the Constitution to the Federal Government is unrestricted. It may raise an army as large as it pleases, and keep it in the field as long as it pleases.

Mr. KITCHIN. You say this Congress can create an army at its pleasure and abolish it at its pleasure; then on what grounds do you claim that Congress cannot say how it shall be used and for what purpose?

Mr. HAWLEY. That is a question that will be duly answered as I proceed. No army can be raised or put in service without the consent and general direction of Congress. This prejudice arises partly from a just fear of arbitrary government and partly from the natural depravity of many who dread the law and dread the force back of it because they have unlawful purposes. I make no intimation against any portion of the majority here. I speak abstractly of the general distrust of force throughout the lower grades of society.

DIMINUTION OF EXECUTIVE POWER.

Now, sir, the danger is not in the element of force in the Government, so carefully guarded and watched with such jealousy. We are weakening the executive and drawing to the legislative branch all the powers of the Government. This is the most prominent, though gradual change in our system. The Senate has gradually come to claim a heavy share of the appointing power. The House follows the example. A President is thought to be unfair, untrue to his party, and too self-asserting if he insists upon nominating from his own free choice.

AN ANALOGY.

A member of the majority [Mr. CARLISLE, of Kentucky] acknowledged the entire rightfulness of sending a body of Federal troops to quell a riot at the polls in the District of Columbia, because the Government has complete and final jurisdiction over the District. Now, if we have complete and final authority in other matters of Federal direction we alike have the right to use there the necessary force to carry it out. Therefore it is that in certain popular elections where the ultimate control of the Federal Government is absolute we have no right to proclaim in advance that force shall never be used to repress injustice and violence.

FEDERAL REGULATION OF CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS.

Now, sir, to my second topic: to what extent may the Federal Government regulate and control the election of Representatives to Congress?

Article 1, section 2, of the Constitution tells us of how many the House of Representatives shall be composed. It says that they shall be chosen every two years by the people of the several States, and it proceeds to define the qualifications of electors. It was a matter of much argument among the founders whether they should lay down one uniform set of qualifications for the whole Union. That would have been embarrassing, because those requisites would certainly have conflicted with the varying State laws prescribing qualifications for purely State elections. By a happy thought it was provided that the electors entitled to vote for the members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures should be the electors qualified to vote for members of the national House of Representatives.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] insisted that this leaves the determination of the qualifications of the electors of Representative in Congress wholly to the States. But no State Legislature can add one name to the list entitled to vote for a Representative who may not at the same time vote for members of the most numerous branch in the State Legislature; nor can it take one from the list. It establishes a list for its own purposes, and the Constitution says those on that list, all of them and no others whatever, may elect members of this House.

The fourteenth and fifteenth amendments afford further examples of supreme national control in regulating suffrage.

TIMES, PLACES, AND MANNER.

In the fourth section, article 1, of the Constitution it is said:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Now, we have already prescribed the time, already altered the regulations of the States as it was thought convenient, and we have ordered that the members of the House be elected on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November biennially. The places are of less importance, but Congress may appoint even the places, except for choosing Senators. If the places are not acceptable, if a faction controlling a State should declare that all the electors in a congressional district shall vote in one town at the extreme corner of a district of twenty counties, this Congress certainly has the right to interfere and to say that there shall be a voting place provided for so many inhabitants or for so many square miles.

And "the manner" of holding an election; how much does that embrace? I do not see why that does not embrace the whole. The "manner," the "mode" of choosing. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr.

HURD]—I will excuse the other gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] once from being referred to in this debate as the "gentleman from Ohio"—said that in the State of Ohio they vote for State officers and Congressmen on one piece of paper. It is so in my State. And he asked what business the Federal Government has to interfere with the election of State officers? Nobody has asked that; nobody has proposed to do it. But it is perfectly competent for this National Legislature to say that congressmen shall be voted for on a separate piece of paper. That may be essential to the very purpose of this control. It may be the purpose of a local faction to so prejudice and involve the election as to make a fair election impossible.

It is therefore quite in our power to say that members of Congress shall be voted for upon a separate ballot, and, if you choose, upon a separate day. I do not see why this Congress may not say that members of Congress may be elected on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November, or if any State shall select that day for the election of its officers, and a distinct consideration be advisable, then the election of Congressmen shall take place on some other day. And then we can prescribe the size and color of the ballot and the manner of counting and making up the returns, and even, if a rebellious and insurrectionary State authority interfere, appoint the men to conduct the election. How can one make an argument to the contrary? Why not? As lawyers say, quoad hoc, the Federal Government is entirely absolute and clothed with complete authority.

It may not choose to exercise that authority. It may be that matters will move smoothly and gently for many years, as they did in what have been termed the better days of the Republic. They may go along so quietly as to present no occasion for interference. But the power was put there very thoughtfully and with the intent to do just what I have indicated. It was put there deliberately, and, if you choose to say so, with malice aforethought.

THE OPINION OF MADISON AND HAMILTON.

I hold here in my hand the Federalist. In regard to the two articles from which I propose to read, it is quite interesting to me that they are claimed both by Madison and by Hamilton. Each in his own copy of the Federalist has marked these two articles as his own, showing that the extreme Federalist and the Virginian States-rights man agreed on this matter:

The definition of the right of suffrage is very justly regarded as a fundamental article of republican government. It was incumbent upon the convention, therefore, to define and establish this right in the Constitution. To have left it open for the occasional regulation of the Congress would have been improper for the reason just mentioned.

The reason is that it is "a fundamental article of republican government."

To have submitted it to the legislative discretion of the States would have been improper for the same reason; and for the additional reason that it would have rendered too dependent on the State governments that branch of the Federal Government which ought to be dependent on the people alone.

Therefore they defined suffrage.

It will be safe to the United States, because, being fixed by the State constitutions, it is not alterable by the State governments, and it cannot be feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitutions in such a manner as to abridge the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution. The qualifications of the elected, being less carefully and properly defined by the State constitutions, and being at the same time more susceptible of uniformity, have been very properly considered and regulated by the convention.

So we see that the National Constitution orders that a Representative must be twenty-five years old, seven years a citizen of the United States, and a resident of the district electing him.

Now, in this matter of regulating the "time, places, and manner"—of ultimately regulating them—this is what both Madison and Hamilton say in their wonderful argument to persuade the people to accept the Constitution:

I am greatly mistaken, notwithstanding, if there be any article in the whole plan more completely defensible than this. Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation.

* * * * * * *

It will, I presume, be as readily conceded that there were only three ways in which this power could have been reasonably modified and disposed; that it must either have been lodged wholly in the National Legislature, or wholly in the State Legislatures, or primarily in the latter, and ultimately in the former. The last mode has, with reason, been preferred by the convention. They have submitted the regulation of elections for the Federal Government, in the first instance, to the local administrations, which in ordinary cases, and when no improper views prevail, may be both more convenient and more satisfactory; but they have reserved to the national authority a right to interpose, whenever extraordinary circumstances might render that interposition necessary to its safety.

Now hear this:

Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power of regulating elections for the National Government in the hands of the State Legislatures would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy. They could at any moment annihilate it by neglecting to provide for the choice of persons to administer its affairs. It is to little purpose to say that a neglect or omission of this kind would not be likely to take place. The constitutional possibility of the thing, without an equivalent for the risk, is an unanswerable objection. Nor has any satisfactory reason been yet assigned for incurring that risk. The extravagant surmises of a distempered jealousy can never be dignified with that character. If we are in a humor to presume abuses of power, it is as fair to presume them on the part of the State governments as on the part of the General Government. And, as it is more consonant to the rules of a just theory to intrust the Union with the care of its own existence than to transfer that care to any other hands, if abuses of power are to be hazarded on the one side or on the other, it is more rational to hazard them where the power would naturally be placed than where it would unnaturally be placed.

There is more to the same effect, and the whole article might be read or delivered here as a speech before this Congress—this article written in 1789 and adopted both by Hamilton and Madison. It justifies to the full extent everything I have claimed on this subject.

GIVING AWAY THEIR CASE.

I understand that in the next bill which will come before us, (the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill,) which I have not examined carefully, there are to be two supervisors who are to look on at the elections. They may not count the votes. They are to be witnesses merely, with no power to correct an abuse, check an abuse, or prevent a denial. They may make complaints afterward, as of course any witness might do. Their authority is nominal. But how came you to acknowledge their right to be there? If this were a law applying to State elections, I should join you in saying: "Take your supervisors away; what are they doing here? You may not send supervisors to help Connecticut to choose a governor." On a question of that kind I would take as strong ground as anybody. But you propose to continue the supervisors, overlooking an election of Federal Representatives, while you deny them all power of interference or control, and deny them or the marshals, or any Federal appointee, any power, or force to back a power.

Why do you put those men there, bearing the badge of Federal supremacy, pretending to represent the authority of the General Government, when they cannot lay a finger on any one, when they cannot call for a constable or a marshal, or, if the marshal is called for, he cannot read a riot act, arrest a repeater, rebuke a bully, or call for a soldier? In the last emergency, under the legislation you propose, these officers are only a laughing-stock. If that is all the legislation that is to stand upon the statute-book, I pray you take it out of this bill, that our great National Government may not justly be a cheap scarecrow to the men who trample upon its authority. Take away the pitiable effigies of national majesty. Why let them come to the polls? Yet you acknowledge the authority of the General Government under the Constitution to supervise elections, and thus give away your whole case, while you do no good to the fair ballot.

THE PROPOSED REVOLUTION.

But I must pass along and come to my third topic, the proposition to force assent to your demands or kill the Government.

I come to what is called in English parliamentary practice "tacking"—a new issue as presented in this bill. This is not an old practice in this Government. The thing has never been done precisely as you propose to do it to-day. I know that the republicans during the last ten or fifteen years, I know that other political parties as long ago as 1846, have been in the habit of doing something in attaching extraneous matter to supply bills. I know that the republicans, time and again, have put into an appropriation bill something really foreign to its purpose—additional legislation not germane to the subject of appropriations. But that was when they had control of both Houses of Congress and had a President of their own party; so that there was not the same constitutional and conscientious objection to the measure as now. Once they sent a bill containing such legislation to President Andrew Johnson, knowing that he wholly disapproved and bitterly hated the provision "tacked" on. He sent in a protest, but ought to have sent a veto, for the executive power was a trust in his hands, and he was false to that trust in that he did not do more than merely protest when he believed that the constitutional powers of the President were encroached upon. But even that case was not parallel to this. We had a two-thirds majority in each House of Congress. The President knew it; everybody knew it. Bills were passed and sent to him with that understanding. There was no pretense of an attempt to coerce him into approving any measure against his conscience. It was expected that he would veto measures obnoxious to him; and he was welcome to do so, as the bills were passed first and were to be passed over his veto by a two-thirds vote. But if there was any attempt to coerce the Executive at that time, it was as wrong as it is in this instance; and two wrongs do not make a right, as everybody knows. If republicans have sinned in this matter (and they have never sinned as you sin here to-day) the quicker they repent the better.

But barring that single case, I assert that in the majority of instances where extraneous matters were placed upon appropriation bills it was done by the common consent of the Senate, the House, and the President. It was as if there were a special train to take a party to Baltimore, the last train of the week, and some friends wished to crowd in with baggage that ought not to go on passenger trains, but must go then or never. Rather than have them left we consent. That quite differs from an attack of "road agents" who pull up the rails, saying, "The train shall not go unless you take us and all our crew, with our burglarious implements." [Laughter and applause.]

A LOGICAL RESULT—DESPOTISM OF A MAJORITY.

The other gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] asks, "Is it revolution to pass an appropriation bill?" I cheerfully answer, "no." Then he asks, "Is it revolution to repeal the election laws?" Again I answer, "no." Then he asks, "How can it be revolution to put the two bills together?" I never saw such simplicity as that pass for logic. Now I will give you another case. If you have the right to put this odious legislation upon an appropriation bill and say, "Take this or nothing; take this or have no money," then you have an equal right (mark to what your logic brings you) to come forward any day from your secret caucus with a bill which you say is in your judgment essential to free government, and say, "Gentlemen, we of the majority have made up our minds that this bill must go through; and we give you notice that if you do not accept it and permit it to become law, we will not even report an appropriation bill." You have exactly as good a right to make this demand upon distinct bills as upon consolidated bills. And you say that this is not revolution! Let the people judge between us. I say it is. I say it is a complete overturning of the whole theory of this Government. I do not care whether the clause to be repealed is one word or eight, as in this case; I claim the right to stop at the threshold and say, "I shall vote 'no' to the end of time."

NO CONSTITUTIONAL COMPULSION OF CONSCIENCE.

The Constitution does not provide for this or any other dead-lock. It contemplates no lock without an easy key. The Constitution and laws of the United States never ask a man to vote a lie under penalty of stopping the Government. There is always a loop-hole; there is always some mode of legitimate escape; so that every member of the legislative body as well as the Executive may act and vote as in their or his judgment may seem best for the good of the country. There is a way provided in every case for their being overruled peacefully and constitutionally. If it were not, this Government and this Constitution would be the most infamous despotism. If I may be required to submit contrary to my conscience; if in order to carry what the majority desire I can be compelled to vote for something which I think in my conscience is wrong, is not that the worst of all tyranny? And that, sir, is what you are applying to me to-day.

You tell me if the President vetoes that bill, which he may or may not do, and it comes back here, that if I do not give up my convictions and vote with you to make up the two-thirds vote requisite under the Constitution to carry the bill with the obnoxious measures in it over the objections of the President, then this Government shall not have the money to carry it on. What is the proper and constitutional remedy? It is this: that you shall vote as you please and I shall vote as I please—vote as we consider right, both of us, and that the President shall act as he thinks right, and then if the bill should come back here vetoed by the President, you shall vote as you consider right and I shall vote as I consider right, nobody being compelled to sacrifice his convictions. Then, if the bill fails, it is but a short time before there can be an appeal to the people of the United States; a new Congress elected; all has been done which is required to be done under the theory of our Government. Either may have been overruled, but neither will have been bullied or made to vote a lie. Why cannot you do this, not compelling the conscience of anybody, but submitting to authority duly provided? You may go to the people in the congressional and presidential elections of 1880; submit to the grand tribunal of the people these measures, both of them, and you may come back here (which God forbid) [laughter and applause on the republican side] with a majority here ready to pass them and with a President ready to sign them.

You may do it. All right, gentlemen; if after the appeal to the people the country sustains you, you then may carry these laws. You will then not have compelled me to vote against my conscience and oath. You will not then have made the President sign the bills to avoid running a Government two years without money. There will have been a reasonable, constitutional, democratic remedy, saving every man's sense of right and duty.

WHAT IS THE CONCEALED PURPOSE.

Now, why cannot you take that course? Do you think you have a good issue before the people? Is it not a nice thing to go to the hustings with? Then put the bill through independently; let us vote against it; let the President veto it if he will, if that is to be the course of affairs; try to pass it over his veto; if you fail, take it upon your shoulders as a grievance, blazon your war-cry upon your flag, and go to the people in 1880. Are you afraid to do that? Is there any necessity between this day and 1880 for your pushing this bill through by revolutionary process? There is no election this fall of any consequence. There are three or four members to be elected, and some local elections not touched by our laws. The provisions here discussed cannot come into immediate requisition before that time. Why cannot you wait until next winter? Why did you compel this extra session, making all the business and patriotism of the country anxious? Why did not you wait until next winter as your best men advised you to do?

Who compelled this democratic party in some mysterious way to bring this revolutionary measure here when man after man tells me he regrets it; he regrets it; it was a mistake; it was a mistake? Why is it? In obedience to what mysterious purpose and plan, or shall I say conspiracy, have you called me here and told me I shall vote for what I think is wrong or you will starve my Government; that it shall not have a dollar? [Applause on the republican side.] Who sent you? Did a popular sentiment send you here for any such purpose?

Now, if you had a good issue on those bills, why did you not keep it? You must have known, in making the issue in the form you have now, you have added to our chances in the election immensely. We know it.

Several MEMBERS on the democratic side. We are glad of it.

THE THUMBSCREW.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, so am I glad of it in one sense; but I would not take that advantage at the expense of my country, [applause on the republican side,] at the expense of the suffering of my people. [Laughter on democratic side.] Gentlemen smile. Such considerations produce smiles among them, but not so with us who have foregone much more than this for the good of our country. [Cries of "Good!" "Good!" and applause on the republican side.] You think because we love this child we will stand here and at the last moment yield rather than see you strike it, don't you? You know we love the country; you know what we will do for it; you know what we have done for it. [Applause on the republican side.] Yet you have put the thumbscrew on me here and tell me this Army is not to be paid; the President shall not have his salary; the judges shall not have their salaries; the Departments of the Interior, of the Navy, of Justice; that the whole Government shall go penniless for two years unless I shall vote against my conscience. Do you think I would do it? [Cries of "No! no!" on the republican side.] Have you a shadow of an idea that I would do it, or that any man on this side would do it? [Applause on the republican side.] In obedience to what conspiracy do you come here and try to make us do it? [Applause on the republican side.]

ENGLISH PRECEDENTS PRECISELY CONTRARY.

But we are told this is according to English precedent; that Englishmen do such things. No, sir; they have not done them these two hundred years; not since they became civilized, [laughter and applause;] not since they had a constitutional government; not since the splendid declaration of rights in 1688, to be found in some respects word for word in our own Constitution. Before that they did it. Oh, yes, they did everything; they cut off the head of their executive when they did not like him, and their king cut off the heads of his wives when he did not like them. [Laughter.] They not only cut heads off, but they robbed one another. The king often got his money by "benevolences." He would call upon a Vanderbilt or an Astor and say, "I want a million pounds." He had his hereditary rights, and he collected his rents and his imposts and gathered his treasure and enlisted his ten thousand or fifteen thousand men and let the Commons fight for remnants of liberty. And they fought and won. They carried their point that no army should live without the consent of the House of Commons. And once that right was established this bullying of the executive was stopped.

But what a difference there is between the executives! What power has ours? Theirs has an absolute veto, ours a conditional. Our Executive could not raise a soldier; their executive could raise a whole army. Our Executive would be impeached if he should declare war; their executive could declare war, as Her Majesty the Queen can to-day. But why should I go on? The differences are wide—ocean wide. And yet you try to trace analogies.

There are some analogies in their parliamentary government, to be sure, but not of this kind. No, gentlemen. My friend from Ohio [Mr. HURD] quoted an ambiguous selection from De Lolme, a French writer on the English constitution, who published a brief treatise in 1781. He was an enthusiast who saw complete glory in the free institutions of England. It is a clever but imperfect treatise of slight or no authority upon the constitution. But if you wish to reach what is really constitutional law in England I would rather take the views of some old English lawyer. I ask my friend from New York [Mr. MCCOOK] to read a passage from a work of Professor Amos, professor of law in the University of Cambridge,—The Constitutional History of England in the time of Charles II.

Mr. MCCOOK read as follows:

A very objectionable course was sometimes adopted by the Commons in the reign of Charles II which, if it had not been subsequently exploded, would have been a blemish in the constitution, namely, the practice of tacking bills of supply, with an intention of thereby compelling the Crown or the Lords to give their consent to a bill which they might otherwise disapprove of and reject. The practice of tacking indicates that the mode of passing bills between the two Houses was unsettled in the reign of Charles II. Thus, on the 11th of November, 1675, it was resolved in the House of Commons, upon a division, "that the bill for appropriating the customs to the use of the navy should be annexed to the bill for raising a supply for providing, equipping, and furnishing twenty ships." In March, 1676, a similar proposition for a tack was rejected, on which occasion Sir George Downing made a forcible speech against the practice. The practice is reprobated by Lord Chancellor Finch in a speech to both Houses on the 23d of May, 1678. It, however, survived the revolution, but is now deemed unconstitutional. In 1704 the tories attempted to make the famous occasional conformity act a tack. In 1702 the Lords passed a resolution, and ordered it to be added to their roll of standing orders, "that the annexing any clause or clauses to a bill of aid or supply, the matter of which is foreign to and different from the matter of the said bill of aid or supply, is unparliamentary and tends to the destruction of the constitution of this government."

Mr. HAWLEY. Just what I have been saying. Since 1688 it has been deemed unconstitutional and it is unconstitutional to-day in Great Britain to do what you are trying to do here. I can find more than authority enough, if you choose, on that subject. Here is May on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings, and Usage of Parliament, which is a recognized standard authority, the vade-mecum of English legislators, often quoted in this House, as old members well know:

The constitutional power of the Commons to grant supplies, without any interference on the part of the Lords, has occasionally been abused by tacking to bills of supply enactments which, in another bill, would be rejected by the Lords; but which, being contained in a bill that their lordships have no right to amend, must either be suffered to pass unnoticed or cause the rejection of a measure highly necessary for the public service. Such a proceeding is as great an infringement of the privileges of the Lords as the interference of their lordships in matters of supply is of the privileges of the Commons, and has been resisted by protest, by conference, and by the rejection of the bills.

And then he also quotes the rule of the House of Lords, adopted in 1702, which was invoked again as late as 1807, though it does not appear that in the whole one hundred and five years there had been another attempt to do what you are doing to-day, and when some attempt of that sort was made in 1807 the old rule was invoked and the thing was defeated. Yet you are telling us that you are acting in accordance with English precedents! They have a right to do what we have a right to do, to say "We shall not have this gigantic war, or this or that other unwise project of the Crown carried out, and we will not give any money for it." But that is a very different affair. Suppose the sovereign is about to declare unnecessary war against Russia or Turkey and sends down estimates for £10,000,000. The Commons say, "We will not give you one shilling;" that is a species of coercion, but a legitimate, constitutional, and comparatively harmless one. But if they should offensively attach to a bill of supplies for the army or the courts a repeal of any enactment or any new and foreign enactment, the House of Lords would regard it as "destructive of the constitution" and call a dead halt.

I do not perceive, as I have said, any necessity for this extraordinary demand. I see it in no important elections to come off, if I look for the cause of your demands in the political field. I see no occasion for it in the general legislation of the country. If the existing laws on the subject in question be wrong they will do no hurt, for there will have been no case for their application until after you shall have had seven months to consider them next winter.

THE DEMAND FOR ALL OR NOTHING.

But I avow I do not base my objections upon the details of any bills that you propose. I do not profess to defend the details of existing legislation. It is quite likely it ought to be greatly altered. The power to use troops should be very carefully guarded and explained. That simple line of eight words is not enough for the authorization of the use of the troops under all circumstances. It was put there as a general reservation of the constitutional and logical right to use force, in the last resort, to defend law and justice.

You are not proposing a better bill, a better law, a better way of using the force of the Constitution and Federal power. See whether you could not put it on a better ground. I will meet you gladly there, but you come with the sweeping demand that your provision must pass, and say that the Federal troops must under no circumstances be employed. It looks to us, gentlemen—pardon me for being frank—like a determined attempt to take possession of the Government and carry the country at any cost in 1880, to take possession of the whole country as you have taken possession of a large portion of the South.

THE SOLID SOUTH.

I know and you know that you said three or four years ago, all among yourselves, "we are going to have a solid South." You were not going to outrage the black man, to shut him out, to beat him down, oh, no! but you were going to have a "solid South." You disclaim the purpose of wronging any man, white or black, but you vowed to have, somehow, anyhow, in spite of the world, a "solid South," and you have it. In the same spirit you say, as one gentleman said yesterday, you propose "the recovery of your long-lost heritage." Are you speaking for the democratic party or for the heavy end of it, the controlling portion of it? [Laughter.] If you are speaking for your section, and I hope you are not, what are the purposes of that section? You say that you are honorable men, and as I look upon you individually I like you, but as I look upon the mass as a party I detest it. I am troubled about what you intend to do. I know a man who had a promise from every director of a bank that his note would be discounted and they failed to discount it. He said, "Gentlemen, I respect you individually, but collectively you are a set of wicked scoundrels." [Laughter.] Let it serve as an illustration, not a literal application.

You say, "What is the danger? Did you not whip us back into the Union? What, then, is the danger?" I hardly know. I wish you would tell us what your purposes are.

THE COMBINAITON OF HERESIES.

You say that you give freedom of elections. I do not find freedom of elections at the South. It is not there. We learn from the public press and your orators, and even your felicitations upon this floor, that you indulge a purpose to unite with the greenbackers in the hope that you may come into your heritage in 1881, followed by the ragtag and bobtail of financial legislation which is about to empty itself into your party. Every man who has a scheme and a policy that nobody will adopt; every man who has failed to reach office, and failed in anything and everything; every man who hates all existing things and has no hope but in universal destruction; all the inhabitants of the Cave of Adullam, will come to you. How many of them are you to gratify?

There are men in the North who walk around with ponderous brows and oracular utterance, saying, "see me; I am a statesman. The North will stand by you; put me forward and I will take you to victory." They cannot deliver the goods. [Laughter.]

You ought to know those men. You fought four years like brave men, while they—well, they climbed a tree to get out of the draft. They went to Canada—anywhere, anywhere—out of the storm. [Laughter.] You know and have said many times that they cheered you to the gates of secession and the battle-field with the prophecy that the North would never unite to resist you.

Sir, those men do not represent the conservatism, the labor, the capital, the intelligence, virtue, and patriotism of the North; but perhaps some men do not care for that. It may be that they may carry enough votes out of the depths of the great cities to give them and you national control so that the democratic party may win. Is that the peace you invite us to when you shall have come back to your heritage? These are matters that make us anxious. Will you bring to your Government of the nation the financial morals and practice that are leading you in State after State in the South to the default of interest, the scaling down and the repudiation of your debts? You urge the greenback elements to join you. History teaches us that the creeds and speculations of that party are fraught with expansion, inflation, disaster, national bankruptcies, repudiation, and utter national and private ruin. The gulf is fairly before this nation if it starts on that march.

You plainly avow that you will wipe from the statute-book the last vestige of the laws called for in our Constitution by the exigencies of war and the consequent obligations of reconstruction and protection. I know it. I always said you would do that. You would go as far back as you could; but you accept the three amendments of the Constitution. Oh, certainly; thank you! It takes three-fourths of the States to revoke them, and that you cannot get. All that can be reached with the sponge you propose to wipe out.

Your orators throw down the glove and put on the plume to ride in the forefront of the contest, and all that. I do not propose to throw away all my gloves as gages of battle, or cover myself with feathers and dance around to provoke an issue; but I am as much in earnest when I warn you that you are mistaken in your estimate of the North.

CONCLUSION.

I am as warmly an advocate of the true doctrine of State rights as the gentlemen of the majority can be, and my education was obtained early. When you had the power, twenty-nine years ago, you made it our duty at the North to hunt your runaway negro to the very foot of the altar, catch him, and bring him back to you.

You put the troops, the Army of the Stars and Stripes, behind the marshal to run him down. Some of us declined to be made negro-hunters; and my State passed a law for the protection of personal liberty, which forbade you or anybody else to take any human being out of our State without a jury trial. You may call it a defiance of Federal authority if you please. If it defied the Federal authority it obeyed a higher authority. When it comes to a question like that I am with you, whether you call it secession or by the more respectable name of revolution.

Oh, yes, I remember the old days. (I do not reproach you with them. We were so indescribably, unutterably doughfaced that we were as much at fault as you.)

I had at one time the extraordinary satisfaction of going into a Southern State and purchasing for a friend the title to a learned clergyman. I actually carried home in my pocket the title-deed to a doctor of divinity. [Laughter.] A man ran away in his youth, educated himself, became an honorable preacher of the Gospel, and got his diploma as D.D. When your slave law came out he wanted to be free, and I went South to purchase his freedom from the one who claimed to own him. I was willing under the circumstances to purchase him, but as he had made himself a doctor of divinity I did not think the estate had a right to claim pay for the improvements, [laughter,] so I bought him as "Jim," one negro man Jim. He received his title-deed of freedom. It is upon the records in Hartford, Connecticut, that in consideration of $1, and, above all, of the indefeasible right of all men to be free, he was entitled thereafter to own himself.

You reproach us for a violation of State rights. If so, we trespassed in a good cause. You undertook to make us negro catchers. You made it a crime in Kansas for a man to question the claim to own and sell men, and marshals and soldiers hunted those who did it. All this to maintain the abominations of human slavery. But if we have pressed closely upon the lines of the reserved rights of the States, if we have infringed upon State rights at all, we have done it in a zeal (which I hope God will pardon) for the Union, for universal justice, liberty and equal rights, and a free and fair ballot. [Great applause.]

Mr. TUCKER obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBESON. Yesterday half an hour was given to me by the courtesy of this House and the kindness of gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber. To-day the whole burden of that courtesy falls upon the residuary legatee of the time allowed for this debate, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER.] I wish now to move that the committee rise for the purpose of extending his time to a full hour. I hope that no one will object to that who does not want me to feel under an intolerable burden of obligation.

Mr. KELLEY. In the event of the motion being agreed to that the committee now rise, I desire to include the name of my colleague, [Mr. WRIGHT,] so that he may have the forty minutes which was accorded to him yesterday and withheld from him to-day.

Mr. HOOKER. That is right.

Mr. SPARKS. It is nothing but fair that the time should be accorded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WRIGHT,] and I hope that will be the understanding.

Mr. ROBESON. I am willing to include both.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection both will be included

Mr. CONGER. The House has limited the time for debate. Many gentlemen wish to speak; I am among the number, and having been myself precluded from the opportunity of speaking, I hold that this committee has no power to extend the time.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that the time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] and the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] be extended so that each may have——

Mr. WRIGHT. Let me have thirty minutes.

Mr. ROBESON. I move that when the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] be allowed one hour and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] be allowed thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The effect of that motion, if adopted, will be to extend the time for general debate one hour; the extension to be equally divided between the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that the order fixing the time for debate was reconsidered and tabled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the record to be read.

Mr. CONGER. I desire full debate, and have urged it from the beginning. Gentlemen have put on the thumb-screw; now let them feel its pressure.

Mr. ROBESON. I trust that my friend from Michigan will not object.

Mr. CONGER. I notice that gentlemen who have had the floor are all willing to give up to others.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman want? The Chair will endeavor to obtain the time for him.

Mr. CONGER. Let the time for general debate be extended, and give it equally to both sides of the Chamber.

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition.

Mr. CONGER. No, sir. The proposition is to give the whole time to the other side. I admit that they need it.

Mr. SPARKS. On motion of a gentleman upon the other side, the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] the time for closing general debate on this bill was fixed at three o'clock to-day. Now, upon the motion of a gentleman on that side, it is proposed to extend the time just one hour. I insist that gentlemen on that side are precluded from insisting that anybody is putting "thumb-screws" on them.

Mr. ROBESON. I make no such suggestion. I believe that the gentleman who has charge of this bill has behaved in the most considerate and patient manner.

Mr. SPARKS. I thank you, sir.

Mr. ROBESON. If he will permit me, I will make a new motion—that the time be extended to allow the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] one hour, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] thirty minutes, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] thirty minutes. [Cries of "All right," on the republican side, and "Oh, no," on the democratic side.]

Mr. SPARKS. That will not do. The rule at any rate would exclude the gentleman last named.

Mr. ROBESON. Very well. If there is objection to that, I renew my original motion.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the decision of the Chair on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the Journal the order made by the House upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

WEDNESDAY, April 2, 1879.

Mr. STEPHENS moved that all general debate be closed on the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, pending in said committee, on Saturday, the 5th instant, at two o'clock; which motion was not agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. DUNNELL, it was Ordered, That all general debate on the said bill of the House close in said committee on Friday, the 4th instant, at three o'clock p. m.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan insist on his point of order?

Mr. CONGER. I do, so far as it concerns the motion now pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is desirous that the respective sides of the House should reach some adjustment in regard to this proposed extension of time.

Mr. CONGER. If it be agreed that after three o'clock an equal amount of time shall be given to each side, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. The proposition now is that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] shall have half an hour in addition to the time to which he is already entitled, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] half an hour, and that a full hour in addition thereto shall be given to the side of the House represented by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] In other words, the proposition is that one hour be given to each side of the House; which the Chair thinks just.

Mr. FINLEY. I object.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to proceed with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I shall exclude from my discussion all questions which have entered into this debate that have nothing to do with the point at issue before the committee. The question is, what should cause us to hesitate to pass this bill? Is there anything in the Constitution of the United States prescribing the form of bills, or forbidding such a form of bill as that now before us? Nothing. Does the Constitution contain any provision preventing our passing such a bill? None. Is there anything in our rules to prevent it? We have decided there is nothing in the rules of the last House, even if they are binding on us, which I deny. Our rules are self-imposed. If we violate them, it is a question for our consideration, but for no one else.

What, then, is the pretension advanced against our action? It is that our rule is not a right one. I understand that gentlemen on the other side of this House have obtruded the opinion of a stranger to our deliberations. What right has any member here to say that the President of the United States will object to the method of our proceeding according to our own rule? I have before me a resolution of Parliament in 1783 that such a statement made upon the floor of the House of Commons in reference to the King would be an invasion of the sacred privileges of the Commons and subversive of the British constitution. I read from Hatsell's Precedents:

> On the 17th of December, 1783, the house came to a resolution, "That it is now necessary to declare that to report any opinion or pretended opinion of His Majesty upon any bill or other proceeding depending in either house of Parliament, with a view to influence the votes of the members, is a high crime and misdemeanor, derogatory to the honor of the Crown, a breach of the fundamental privileges of Parliament, and subversive of the constitution of this country."

And yet the President's objection to our method of proceeding is suggested here to prevent our legislation. It is a violation of the privileges of this House by the indiscreet friends of the President, for which I will not hold him responsible.

The question is, what right has the President to object to our method of proceeding? Our rules under the Constitution may be prescribed by this House and by it alone. No other house can call in question our method, nor can the President. The President, therefore, notwithstanding the threat made in his behalf, cannot, without an unjustifiable intrusion upon our privileges, veto this bill upon the ground of the method by which it is passed. He must veto it, if at all, upon the merits of the bill.

And what are those merits? The only ground of objection is that the majority in Congress proposes to deny the right of the President to preside with his troops at the polls over a free election of the people. [Applause.] That is the whole issue.

The gentlemen on the other side say there must be no coercion. Of whom? Of the President? But what right has the President to coerce us? There may be coercion one way or the other. He demands an unconditional supply. We say we will give him no supply but upon conditions. We will give him the Army, but he must keep his Army away from the polls at elections by the people. [Applause on the democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, upon this issue, the only thing left for me to consider is this: have we the right, are we in the right, in insisting upon this bill? What is "right?" I would formulate it algebraically in this way: right is equal to power plus duty. We have not the right to do an act merely because we have the power. But where power is coupled with a trust, with duty or obligation to exert it, then the power intrusted for the performance of a duty gives us the right to do this thing, obliges us to do it, and we are bound to stand there forever. [Applause on the democratic side.]

Gentlemen say they will never yield. I tell gentlemen that in a conflict between power and liberty, if power will not yield, liberty must be just as firm. [Applause on the democratic side.]

In discussing our right to pass this bill, according to the analysis of right just presented, I ask, first, have we the power to pass it? Can there be any doubt about that? My distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] to whose courtesy I am very much indebted always, has said the great trouble here is, that we run against "the granite foundation of free consent." His rhetoric is very powerful; I always admire it; but what is this "granite foundation of free consent?"

In the sense of absolutely free consent in legislation, with great respect, I say the doctrine is impracticable and absurd.

Did any bill ever pass this House with the free consent of the minority, or even with the free and full consent of every member composing the majority? And when a bill has passed one House and goes to the other, though that other passes it rather than reject it and prevent all action, there will be the absence of free consent. But if the other House proposes to amend, and we reject the amendment, there is a conference. The other insists upon its amendment and we concur, or we refuse still to concur and the other recedes. Is it not obvious there may be the presence of constraint upon the will of each and the absence of the free consent of both? And so when a bill passes both Houses, which the President signs despite his dissent from many of its provisions, though upon the whole he approves rather than interpose his veto, the "granite foundations of free consent" are shaken, and the principle invoked by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is set at naught.

Was there no danger to that principle when the republican party, the gentleman from Ohio voting with them, in 1867 passed an appropriation bill for the Army on which was ingrafted a provision by which Andrew Johnson, the then President, was required to abdicate his constitutional functions as Commander-in-Chief of the Army or veto the appropriation bill? Did the gentleman perceive no danger to the granite foundations he so much admires of a free consent by the President when he voted for that bill? What makes the difference then and now? It is our ox that is gored now; it was his bull then. [Laughter and applause.]

What, then, is the true constitutional doctrine? In all governments based upon the idea of checks and balances between its departments there will necessarily be some constraint upon consent, though no coercion. The requirement of concurrence of distinct wills in governmental action involves the reconciliation of antagonisms of views and opinions, in order to a harmonious conclusion. Constraint by each upon the other is inevitable, and a compromise of divergent and opposite ideas is the result. Consent in such a system is not free, but constrained; not absolute, but conditioned. This, so far from being an evil, is a good. Neither party has its own way absolutely. The result is not wholly satisfactory to either of them. The contrary forces produce a resultant which is better than either would have produced alone. Edmund Burke, when advocating the government of concurrent wills in preference to a government controlled by one will only, with an eloquence of which he was the supreme master, shows that the antagonism of the departments of such a system produce "all that action and counter action which, in the natural and in the political world, from the reciprocal struggle of discordant forces, draws out the harmony of the universe." From the government of one will springs despotism; from that of concurrent wills has been evolved the free institutions of that great race to which we belong; and I shall show that the use of the very method we now adopt by our ancestors has given us the liberties we have inherited, and must continue to cherish and maintain.

I am willing to concede that in ordinary cases this putting of general legislation upon appropriation bills may be inconvenient and injudicious. To use a homely phrase, it should not be used as our daily bread in legislation, but it is the medicine of the Constitution, and proper to purge away the diseases of the body-politic. When, therefore, vicious laws have fastened themselves upon the statute-book which imperil the liberty of the people, this House is bound to say it will appropriate no money to give effect to such laws until and except upon condition that they are repealed. [Applause on the democratic side.]

You will see, Mr. Chairman, that the propositions of the gentlemen on the other side amount to this, that if by hook or crook vicious legislation has been once put upon the statute-book which requires an annual appropriation of money in order to make it effective, and if we are precluded from repealing it upon an appropriation bill, it follows that every such appropriation becomes mandatory upon this House unless the President will consent to its repeal. Is not that clear? In this case there is a vicious law which we think invades the liberties of the people. Will the President say (as his supporters here say he will) "I will not consent to its repeal; the law is upon the statute-book; go to work, send me supplies; hurry them up and let the law stand?" Will the President of this Republic say this as the Stuarts and the Tudors used to say to the House of Commons—"Hurry up; hurry up my supplies, and then adjourn?" Is that the idea of gentlemen on the other side? Then will it be our function only to come here to vote his majesty's supplies and then go home to our people, declaring we have furnished the sinews to the law which oppresses them and strikes at the vitals of their freedom.

I ask gentlemen, if this Congress is thus bound to appropriate the people's money to their injury and against their liberty, because of an existing law the repeal of which the President refuses to assent to, are not the granite foundations of their free consent to the laws, by which they are governed, undermined and destroyed by their own Representatives? Are not the people coerced to give their money to carry out a law to whose repeal they consent but which their Executive vetoes? To coerce a President to repeal a law passed by Congress is revolutionary, but to coerce the people into obedience to a law retained on the statute-book by the will of the Executive against that of Congress is constitutional and right! Can the President of this country hold such a view and maintain such a position?

In the further discussion of our power to pass this bill let me premise one or two things:

First. This law giving power to use troops to keep peace at the polls was passed in February, 1865, when eleven States were unrepresented in this Congress. Whether they were right or wrong in this matter is not pertinent to the argument. All the States are now represented. It is not unreasonable that they should seek to repeal a law which they regard as vicious and to which in fact they never assented but by which they are bound.

Second. It seems to me that the doctrine, that no bad law can be repealed upon an appropriation bill, is unsound. It turns all appropriations into permanent ones, though in form they are annual. Especially is this unsound, as I shall show hereafter, as to an Army appropriation bill. For if, because an existing law has fixed certain administrative machinery, an appropriation must be made to sustain and continue it, it makes the appropriation as permanent and continuous as the machinery itself. Because the Army organism has been fixed by law at a certain number of men and officers, at certain rates of pay, &c., the appropriations must conform, with no right to condition them upon a consent to a change in the organism. It follows from this, that as all the checks which the Constitution opposes to positive legislation are thrown against its repeal, so appropriations must (here is the coercive principle, contrary to the granite foundations of free consent) continue to be made to support the existing system, if the President opposes repeal, unless two-thirds of both Houses can overrule him. A doctrine which gives such enormous power to the President, against the will and upon the purse of the people, would be abhorrent to every subject of the British monarchy, and cannot be tolerated by the citizens of a free republic.

But I proceed to show that the power over the purse of the people is a part of those inherited privileges vested by the people in this House and in the Senate, by means of which the people's representatives in the legislative department may check executive usurpation and constrain a redress of grievances.

After Magna Charta had been confirmed again and again under the early Plantagenets, and the Commons had succeeded, in the reign of Edward I, in securing the right to sit in a separate body, and the constitutional recognition of the principle that no tax could be imposed but by the power of Parliament, the Commons grew in authority, and were in the habit of attaching to their supply bills petitions for a redress of grievances. This was early in the fourteenth century. (Hall, Const. History of England.) At a later period money grants were conditioned on such redress; and during the reigns of the Tudors and the Stuarts, this was constantly done.

In the early part of the reign of Charles I, in 1628, Rushworth, in his historic collections, gives us the language used in Parliament which furnishes texts for us to-day. Sir Thomas Wentworth said: "Unless we are secure in our liberties we cannot give." The speaker said "that by ancient course of Parliament grievances have been first considered of before supply." And the committee of the whole house resolved "that grievances and supply go hand in hand."

Be it noted, the consideration of grievances was never postponed until after supply was granted. It either preceded or went hand in hand with supply. And I may say this House might have adopted either of the last two methods. We have adopted that taken by the last House; and repeal of grievance and grant of supply go hand in hand.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] says these were the days of English barbarism, and no such thing has been done since its civilization. I can scarcely think that the Elizabethan period of England was one of barbarism. The age of Spenser, Shakspeare, and Ben Johnson, of Bacon and Raleigh, of Coke and Hampden, was not one of barbarism. That half century which preceded the revolution of 1688 was a splendid period, when the enlightened Commons saved England from the barbaric despotism of the continent of Europe and gave liberty to the people against the tyrannical purposes of the house of Stuart. Yet the gentleman thinks these were the days of barbarism, and the use of the money power against the Crown was a barbaric weapon.

Mr. Chairman, this money power was the lever by which the Saxon people upheaved the solid centralism of the Norman polity and transformed the monarchy of the conquest into the noblest type of constitutional government in the Old World. This power over the purse in the hands of the Commons made the sword impotent in the hands of the king. And shall we discard the use of this power and claim less for the House of Representatives against a President in a Republic, than the House of Commons asserts against monarchy in England?

The power was used there as the medicine of the constitution. The Tudors and the Stuarts demanded supplies for their schemes of ambition in war and peace. The Commons halted on grievances. The Crown sent messages to them to hurry up supply and adjourn without redress of grievances. But the Commons said, "The purse is ours to give or to withhold, to give absolutely or on condition; abandon dangerous power and practices; let go your hold on our liberties, and we will give you money."

Hard, long, and obstinate was the conflict. But liberty won and despotism was vanquished. This weapon for a people's defense, well and wisely wielded, has reformed the British monarchy, purged away its despotic principles, enlarged popular authority, secured public liberty and the personal rights of man by the splendid muniments of law and an independent judiciary, and brought the whole Government under the influence and control of the will of the people. So far from the remedial methods of the Commons being barbarous, it was the light of civilization which banished the night of barbarism from the kingdom.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] the other day, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] have said that this money power to redress grievances has not been used in England for two centuries, or since 1688. Concede the historic fact. But does it prove the power is gone? Why is it disused? The veto of the Crown, too, has fallen into disuse since 1688. Why?

The philosophy of the history presents an overwhelming answer to the position of the gentlemen. The use of the remedy has ceased, because since 1688 the disease has been extirpated. The right to withhold supplies from a Crown reluctant to redress a grievance has been conceded since the revolution of 1688. If the Commons demand a repeal of an obnoxious law, or the redress of a royal grievance, the monarch yields, because he knows the remedy is in their hands. He raises no contest because he must lose the battle. The truth is, as Mr. Bagehot, the most interesting writer of late years on the British constitution, has said, the executive government of England is a cabinet of ministers, appointed by the Crown but holding office as tenants at the will of the Commons. The will of the Commons commands the assent of the Crown to a repeal of a law, for if the Crown vetoed the repeal, the ministry would have to resign and the government would stop until the popular demand for repeal was responded to with favor by a new ministry. A vote of want of confidence is the signal for the dismissal of a ministry. Let the Commons of England demand the repeal of the law we propose to repeal, and it would die. Let them demand the passage of a law, and it will pass. Let the executive ministry obstruct their will, and it would be dissolved. The reform bill of 1832, the disestablishment of the Irish Church in 1870, were willed by the Commons and became law against the will of the Lords in both cases, but without dissent of the Crown.

But it has been said elsewhere that the grievances of which we speak in English history arose from the use of the prerogative, and not from any law. As far as the precedent goes it is made stronger for the objection. For if the Commons by means of this power curbed the royal prerogative, a fortiori it would avail to keep him from obstructing the repeal of an obnoxious law by his veto. But the answer already given is complete. The Commons in repealing a law are never obstructed by the Crown. Such a thing would be at once remedied by a withholding of supplies.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] cites Mr. Amos for the doctrine that to attach such a provision to an appropriation bill in England would now be unconstitutional. I do not think this is held by any other authority; nor can it be so. It has fallen into disuse as a means of securing new legislation for the reasons already stated. But the resolution of the Lords cited by Mr. Amos does not sustain the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.] It reads thus:

> In 1702 the Lords passed a resolution and ordered it to be added to their roll of standing orders, "that the annexing any clause or clauses to a bill of aid or supply, the matter of which is foreign to and different from the matter of the said bill of aid or supply, is unparliamentary, and tends to the destruction of the constitution of this government."—Amos's Constitution, reign Charles II, page 73.

This applies to an amendment not germane. Now, an amendment regulating and controlling the use of an Army is clearly germane to a bill for supporting one, as it prescribes a condition on which the Legislature wills to support it. Besides, this order was an objection from the Lords, and was not the objection of the Crown.

Having thus considered the general use of the money power in British history, I call attention to the power over the army in England. During the reign of the Stuarts the Crown claimed and exercised the power to raise and keep troops without consent of Parliament. The Commons contested it.

By the bill of rights adopted at the revolution of 1688 it was provided "that the raising or keeping a standing army in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of Parliament, is against law." And this is inserted to this day in the preamble to the army bill in England. But the Crown may with the consent of Parliament do so. Besides he is generalissimo of the army and navy, and as such, officers, governs, and regulates both. Such is the constitutional distribution of power over the army of England. But despite this, there are two checks on the royal power as to the army which are of controlling influence. I quote Mr. Hallam, (Constitutional History, chap. 15:)

> This annual session of Parliament was rendered necessary, in the first place, by the strict appropriation of the revenue according to votes of supply. It was secured, next, by passing the mutiny bill, under which the Army is held together and subjected to military discipline for a short term, seldom or never exceeding twelve months. These are the two effectual securities against military power; that no pay can be issued to the troops without the previous authorization by the Commons in a committee of supply, and by both houses in an act of appropriation; and that no officer or soldier can be punished for disobedience nor any court-martial held without the annual re-enactment of the mutiny bill. Thus it is strictly true that if the king were not to summon Parliament every year, his army would cease to have a legal existence, and the refusal of either house to concur in the mutiny bill would at once wrest the sword out of his grasp. By the bill of rights it is declared unlawful to keep any forces in time of peace without consent of Parliament. This consent, by an invariable and wholesome usage, is given only from year to year, and its necessity may be considered perhaps the most powerful of those causes which have transferred so much even of the executive power into the management of the two houses of Parliament.

Thus it is seen that the army of England can exist only one year. No punishment for mutiny can be inflicted at the end of that year. It disbands. Besides, the purse power puts its support completely at the will of the Commons. This mutiny bill has been passed annually since 1693. When the army is raised and a supply voted for one year, the king can command it, regulate, and govern it. But the Commons have conditioned its supply upon a limitation of the use of troops. In many bills, it will be seen, so many troops are raised for use in England, so many in Ireland, so many in Canada, &c., and it cannot be doubted that the monarch would not, without the consent of Parliament, be permitted to concentrate the whole British army in London or at any other point.

But I call attention to a point more germane to this discussion. In 8 George II (1735) an act passed forbidding the use or presence of troops at an election. Hear the preamble to that act, which rings out upon our republican air like a bugle-blast of freedom:

> Whereas by the ancient common law of this land all elections ought to be free; and whereas by an act passed in the third year of the reign of King Edward the First, of famous memory, it is commanded upon great forfeiture that no man, by force of arms, nor by malice, or menacing, shall disturb any to make free election; and forasmuch as the freedom of elections of members to serve in Parliament is of the utmost consequence to the preservation of the rights and liberties of this kingdom; and whereas it hath been the usage and practice to cause any regiment, troop, or company, or any number of soldiers which hath been quartered in any city, borough, town, or place where any election of members to serve in Parliament hath been appointed to be made, to remove and continue out of the same during the time of such election, except in such particular cases as are hereinafter specified.—Pickering's Statutes, volume 16.

This asserts, as a principle of common law and common right, the right of the people to have an election free from the presence of troops, from the time of Edward I, in the fourteenth century. It limits by act of Parliament the royal power in regulating, governing, and commanding his troops. Such use invaded the liberty of Englishmen, and the sacred privileges of Parliament as an independent branch of government. Parliament curbed the use; no royal veto or protest was interposed.

In 1741 an incident occurred mentioned by Mr. Hallam in a note, page 635:

> The military having been called in to quell an alleged riot at Westminster election in 1741, it was resolved, December 22d, "that the presence of a regular body of armed soldiers at an election of members to serve in Parliament is a high infringement of the liberties of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of elections, and an open defiance of the laws and constitution of this kingdom." The persons concerned in this, having been ordered to attend the House, received on their knees a very severe reprimand from the Speaker.—Parliament History. IX, 326.

Is it possible that it is revolutionary and unconstitutional for us to present to the President a bill forbidding the use of troops at the polls, when the English offender though an officer of the royal army on bended knee was reprimanded by the British Commons? Then are we less free from despotic power in this Republic than an Englishman under a monarchy.

Let us look at the power over the Army here. The President has no power to raise or keep troops. Congress has power "to raise and support armies." (Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 8, clause 12.) The King of England has this power.

Congress has power "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." (Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 8, clause 14.) The King of England has this power. The President of the United States has not.

The king is generalissimo. The President is Commander-in-Chief of the land and naval forces. (Constitution of the United States, article 2, section 2.)

It thus appears the power of the President is far less than that of the king, and of Congress far greater than that of Parliament as to the army; but Congress and Parliament have the power of the purse alike.

Now, if in England Parliament can limit and has limited the use of troops by the king, and notably in the case of their use and presence at elections, is it revolutionary or against the letter or spirit of the Constitution for us to condemn the supply for support of the Army upon their non-use at elections? If it be, then is the case of American citizens as to liberty and free elections less favorable than that of the subjects of the British monarchy.

But it has been hinted in debate that when Congress raises an army and votes money for its support the President as Commander-in-Chief can do with it as he pleases, and Congress cannot limit its use.

I read from Mr. Hamilton's number of the Federalist, No. 68, page 480:

> Secondly. The President is to be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. In this respect his authority would be nominally the same with that of the King of Great Britain, but in substance much inferior to it. It would amount to nothing more than the supreme command and direction of the military and naval forces as first general and admiral of the Confederacy, while that of the British King extends to the declaring of war, and to the raising and regulating of fleets and armies; all which by the Constitution under consideration would appertain to the Legislature.

The President is ex officio no more as Commander-in-Chief than the General-in-Chief of the Army, who now sets before me on the floor of the House. He is the executive director of the troops in military operations. But how, where, and when he and they are to be used, is for Congress, which is the raising, supporting, regulating, and governing authority of the Army. The President has no other power as Commander-in-Chief than if he held that position, and was not President. The presidential office, in other words, does not increase the power of the President as Commander-in-Chief.

Now, sir, the power, therefore, which the legislative department has to condition the grant of supplies for the Army upon its use under prescribed limits, is a power which is unquestioned in England, and cannot be questioned here. Let me go a step further. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] admitted this morning the Army was our Army; we can make it, we can unmake it. I tell you, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, the Army dies on the 30th day of June unless we resuscitate it by legislation. And what is the question here on this bill? Will you resuscitate the Army after the 30th of June with the power to use it as keepers of the polls? That is the question. It is not a question of repeal. It is a question of re-enactment. If you do not appropriate this money, there will be no Army after the 30th of June to be used at the polls. The only way to secure an Army at the polls is to appropriate the money. Will you appropriate the money for the Army in order that they may be used at the polls? We say no, a thousand times no. We will not support an Army, whose sword and bayonet the President can turn, if he please, against the liberty of the people. [Applause.] Never with our consent will we give money for the support of the Army to be used as keepers of the polls at so-called free elections. That is the whole question. Will we re-enact the existence of the Army with any such power in the President to use it? Is it revolutionary or unconstitutional for us so to act?

So far from it, I hold it is revolutionary and unconstitutional to oppose us in it, for I proceed to show that this money power over the Army was given to us for the purpose of such a supervision and limit to its use. If we do not so exert the power we are violators of the trust reposed in us by the grant of it to us. You will find in the twenty-sixth number of the Federalist the remarks of Alexander Hamilton, the great leader of the old federal party, on the clause of the Constitution which limits the power to raise and support armies by the words "But no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." Hamilton says:

The Legislature of the United States will be obliged—

That is we and you, Representatives of the people, will be obliged—by this provision—

The two-year limit on appropriations—

once at least in every two years, to deliberate upon the propriety of keeping a military force on foot—

That is exactly what we are proposing to do now—to come to a new resolution on the point—

This bill is the new resolution we are coming to on this subject—and to declare their sense of the matter by a formal vote in the face of their constituents. They are not at liberty to vest in the executive department permanent funds for the support of an army if they were even incautious enough to be willing to repose in it so improper a confidence.

Now you see we are not at liberty to make a permanent appropriation for the Army, in form or effect. If the mere fact of keeping the Army on foot with this legislation on the statute-book enables the President to use it to keep peace at the polls; God save the mark! we come to the new resolution now that we will not raise an army or support it for any such purpose; and we say to the President, "You can have the Army, and command it according to your constitutional power for the defense of the country against the foreign foe, and for the execution of the laws under the provisions of acts of Congress, and on the call of the judicial authority, but you must never use it to secure a so-called free election by keeping peace at the polls."

This view of our Constitution is the clearer, because the provisions in it in respect to the support and control of the Army were taken from the British constitution, with all the meaning attached to them by the historic precedents to which I have referred. If an English Parliament each year re-enacted the mutiny bill by which alone the army was continued, and so restrained its use as that it could not be present at elections; and if with these British precedents in view our Constitution was adopted in the form already commented on, how can it be revolutionary, how can it fail to be right, for us to place the same limit on its use which the English people did?

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the power is so clear, if so far from our proposed action being revolutionary or unconstitutional the power was vested in us for the purpose of doing the very thing we are doing; if, as Mr. Hamilton says, it was intended that every two years we should consider this question in order that we might determine whether it was safe any longer to keep the Army on foot; we propose to say, we have come to the conclusion that there is not only no propriety, but there is a manifest impropriety, there is danger to public liberty, to the rights of the citizen, and to free election by the people, in having an army on foot, to keep the peace at the polls under the command of the President of the United States. So believing we will support the Army, but for no such use.

With so clear a power, intrusted for so definite a purpose, there can be no question as to our duty.

Many considerations may be urged to show this; first, the great danger to liberty from such a use of the Army. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] this morning has spoken lightly of the alarm felt on this subject.

History is of little avail if it does not teach us to dread the influence of a standing army upon the existence of liberty in a country. De Lolme, in his very able work, Hallam, Macaulay, and other English historians have taken pains to show that the difference between the free institutions of England and the despotic governments of continental Europe is to be attributed to the advantage, obtained through the use of the money power, by the Commons as the representatives of liberty over the Crown, in making the existence and support of his army dependent on the will of the people.

In the debates of the Federal and State conventions which led to the adoption of our Constitution, the dread of a standing army and the importance of subordinating the military to the civil power were continually held up to the consideration of the people.

In the English army bills there is an exclusion of all provision for its use except as a defense against a foreign foe. The Englishman does not like to admit the soldier as an element in the force needful to support the civil authority. I quote from Mr. Hallam's Constitutional History of England, (chapter 16:)

This army was always understood to be kept on foot, as it is still expressed in the preamble of every mutiny bill, for better preserving the balance of power in Europe. The Commons would not for an instant admit that it was necessary as a permanent force, in order to maintain the government at home.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Pulteney, so late as 1732, a man neither disaffected nor democratical, and whose views extended no further than a change of hands, declared that he "always had been, and always would be, against a standing army of any kind; it was to him a terrible thing, whether under the denomination of parliamentary or any other. A standing army is still a standing army, whatever name it be called by; they are a body of men distinct from the body of the people; they are governed by different laws; blind obedience and entire submission to the orders of their commanding officer is their only principle. The nations around us are already enslaved, and have been enslaved by those very means; by means of their standing armies they have every-one lost their liberties. It is, indeed, impossible that the liberties of the people can be preserved in any country where a numerous standing army is kept up.

But what need have we of any history but our latter-day annals? In the last twenty years what has not been done by the Army in civil affairs, sometimes under act of Congress and sometimes not?

By act of Congress eleven States were put under the absolute control of the President through the Army. Legislatures were dissolved, constitutional conventions were called, suffrage was extended, taxes were collected, and public moneys of the States disbursed by the orders and under the control of the Army.

In my own State all the judges of the court of appeals, elected by its State government, which had been fully recognized as the lawful government by the Federal authorities, were removed and successors appointed by order of the military governor of district No. 1, which was the Old Dominion. Circuit judges were removed at the will of the military power, and replaced by others. Citizens in the South were tried by court-martial, and the privilege of the habeas corpus was denied to them. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, stretched out to rescue McCardle from the grasp of the military, was taken away by the passage of the Drake bill over the veto of President Johnson. The execution of Milligan, an Indiana citizen, by sentence of court-martial, was only prevented by the Supreme Court's judgment, in accordance in part with the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] And who can have forgotten the part played by the military in the legislative halls of Louisiana and South Carolina?

I have myself seen a subaltern of the Army enter a court of justice in Virginia and deliver a military order to the judge upon the bench to enter a judgment in favor of a party to a case on his docket. I had myself, as a commissioner of the court to sell land, been ordered by the military to refrain from doing so, which order I refused to obey, and learned that for a public avowal in court of such refusal I was threatened with court-martial.

Mr. HAZELTON. In what year was that?

Mr. TUCKER. I think my statement is a sufficient guarantee.

Mr. HAZELTON. But we want the facts.

Mr. TUCKER. It was about the year 1868.

Mr. HAZELTON. Who was the judge?

Mr. TUCKER. I am sure the gentleman does not mean to question my statement.

For myself, Mr. Chairman, I am jealous of the military power. The old Anglo-Saxon race to which we belong has always cherished this feeling in the interest of liberty.

I like the Army in its place, defending the country against invasion; but I do not like the Army as the holders of the polls at an election by the people, nor to constitute courts for the trial of citizens for crimes, nor on the judgment-seats in civil courts, nor to organize Legislatures of the States. Against these civil functions for the Army we protest.

But it is said, Why should the Army not keep peace at the polls? Is not peace desirable there? I do not deny this; but who shall do it, is the question. Quis custodiet custodes? Who shall keep the keepers? I venture to apply the story of the old Virginian who offered to bet upon the race between Henry and Eclipse. The bet was taken. "Who'll hold the stakes?" he said. "Squire Jones," was the reply. "But who'll hold Squire Jones?" he demanded.

The question is not whether peace shall not be preserved; but is there not danger to liberty, to the freedom of the election, to put this power in one man, the President, to use the Army as the keepers of the polls and holders of elections?

Mr. Chairman, do you notice that this act which it is proposed to repeal gives to the President the right to keep troops at the polls at any general or special election? It is a power applicable to a State or municipal election, to a congressional or a presidential election. At the very time the President may be appealing to the people to say whether he shall longer remain in the office of President or not he may muster the troops of the United States at the polls to decide an election in which he is himself a candidate.

Louis Napoleon used the French army to keep peace at the polls when he was a candidate for empire; and we all know what was the effect. The empire was peace, but it was the peace of despotism, secured by the armed troops of France. The troops kept the peace no doubt, but in the interests of their master and against the liberties of the people.

The trouble is in all these cases to appoint such a guardian against fraud as will have no interest to perpetuate it—to give the armed force of the country into the hands of a party interested in the elections, is to insure an unfair election by force.

Now, all gentlemen must know that partisan feeling and prejudice do affect everybody in an election. Is it then possible to believe, when the President has appointed his marshals to go to the polls and to make arrests, and sends troops to the polls for the purpose of keeping the peace, that if a question arises in which he is interested he or his agents will exercise that power in a fair and unbiased manner; that they will so exclude or admit voters, so that the result will ever be decided against himself, or in favor of his opponents?

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has closed.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman can move to strike out the last word, and continue his remarks.

Mr. KEIFER. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Virginia be extended. [Loud cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. CONGER. Let the first section be read. I will not object to the gentleman continuing his remarks, because I would very much like to have his speech to send to my constituents.

Mr. TUCKER. I would take great pleasure in furnishing the gentleman with a large number of copies.

Here lies the great difficulty. Where troops are used at the polls it is to be feared that the cartridge-box might be exchanged for the ballot-box, the bullet for the ballot. The bayonet which has pierced the writ of habeas corpus issued by the Chief-Justice of the United States might be used to destroy the ballot of the citizen seeking to vote. The sword, professing to guard the voters at the polls, might intimidate the voter and keep him away from the polls. The timid and unarmed and disorganized body of citizens cannot hold their place at the polls against a band of Federal marshals with their batons of governmental authority and the organized troops of the Government with the flag of the country floating over them.

Think of a presidential election in which the Commander-in-Chief of the troops is a candidate, and it is folly to suppose that it is safe to leave the unarmed citizen to stand his ground against the whole civil and military force of the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee long on the unconstitutionality of this legislation. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] thinks there is no difficulty about the constitutionality of this law.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not say quite that. I held that it was not unconstitutional to do something in this direction.

Mr. TUCKER. I understood the gentleman to assume the position of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that on the merits of the question, if brought to a vote on the merits, they would vote with us.

Mr. HAWLEY. I stand on the rightfulness of force as an element of government. I am not required to discuss the details; I only stand upon that broad principle.

Mr. TUCKER. The question I make is this: whether this use of troops at the polls is a thing which the gentlemen from Ohio and Connecticut will vote to retain on the statute books if they were presented in separate measures?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have said that I would vote to repeal this clause if it was brought in as a separate measure.

Mr. TUCKER. Then the gentleman from Ohio stands upon very narrow ground. He admits that upon the merits this clause ought to be repealed, and yet he says that because of the method in which it is to be repealed the President ought to veto the bill. In other words, were the gentleman in the President's place he would approve the measure on the merits, but veto it because of the method. How can that be? What right has the President to say anything in reference to our method of legislation if he has no objection to the measure on its merits?

But to return for a moment to the constitutionality of the measures proposed to be repealed. Two of them relate to the elections, and the third to the constitution of juries in the Federal courts. The constitutionality of the laws as to elections is maintained on article 1, section 4, clause 1, of the Constitution:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

It is obvious, from the use of the mandatory word "shall" as to State power, and of the permissive word "may" as to congressional power, that the purpose was to give to Congress the authority to save its organic life from destruction by the omission of the State to exert its power to prescribe time, place, and manner of holding elections. Congress is not justified in acting unless necessity calls for it.

Again: Congress cannot do more than make or alter regulations for holding elections. The manner of election is not within its power, but only the manner of holding it. It cannot regulate suffrage. That is fixed by State regulations according to the agreement of the parties to the Federal Constitution. (Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 2, clause 1.) It cannot interfere with the voter before he comes to the poll, nor exclude him from it by force or intimidation. His right to vote must be decided according to the State law of suffrage. He must be admitted to assert his right to vote, and even if it be denied, to record his claim with the denial, in order that this House, which is to judge of the elections of its members, may see whether the claim was just or the denial was right. But the right of marshals or supervisors to arrest before and at the elections, and thus detain the voter from the assertion of his claim, is unconstitutional, unjust, and dangerous to liberty. The law which Congress may pass must be "necessary and proper" to carry out its power to regulate the manner of holding elections. (Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 8, clause 18.)

Is it necessary to the "holding of an election" to arrest citizens on the ground of their want of right to vote? Is it necessary to marshal troops at the polls? Is it necessary to give supervisors and marshals authority before and on the day of election, with or without warrant, to hurry thousands of citizens to prison, and thus keep them away from the polls? Is not this a mode of defeating, and not a manner of holding an election?

Again, is it proper or (in the language of Judge Story) is it bona fide appropriate to the end in view, or appropriate to the nature of our free institutions, to use troops at the polls at all? The act of 8 George II (1735) was known to the framers of the Constitution. The Declaration of Independence, with its charge against George III, "that he has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power," was ringing in their ears. Could it be proper that in elections of Representatives to this floor or of Senators by State Legislatures the President, with the Army at his back, should hold the election of the former at the polls where the citizen voted, or in the halls of a Legislature of a State?

These views suffice to make the whole of this legislation unconstitutional even as to the election of Representatives on this floor. But the law we propose to repeal in this bill authorizes the use of troops at all elections, State and Federal, congressional or presidential. Congress has no power to touch in any degree an election for State or municipal officers, nor for electors in a presidential election. In this respect the law is a flagrant violation of the Constitution.

On the jury question the constitutional objection is very clear.

By the sixth amendment to the Federal Constitution an accused person is entitled "to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury," &c. He must be tried by his peers. The test-oath law, once really repealed, but by some mistake still in the Revised Statutes, excludes in some States nearly half of the citizens of the State from juries. Can such juries be impartial? And the exclusion is for participation on the confederate side of the civil war, which does not exclude a man from the bench or these Halls, but would shut him out of the jury-box for the trial of a fellow-citizen.

But I take higher ground. I say that the matters we propose to interfere with in these provisions of these appropriation bills are matters that are peculiarly under the guardianship of the members of this House. I beg the committee to bear with me for a moment while I state my views on this point.

Let us look at the relations of the executive and legislative departments to these grave questions. Take the President. Who is the President, whom does he represent, what function of government does he perform? He is the representative of colleges of electors, who may themselves not be elected by the people, but in such other way as the Legislature of each State shall determine. He has no direct contact through the elective process with any individual citizen in the land. His contact with the individual citizen is cut off by the electoral colleges. Practically he represents the States, each with its solid suffrage proportioned not to numerical strengh, but to its numbers and its equality as a State combined. In fact, he thus represents, because his election depends, on the larger States as such, and not on the citizens of the country as individual men with personal rights of life and liberty.

In him is concentered the patronage of the Government. He is the representative of the great tax-consuming classes, that feed upon the Treasury; that love to have it full, that they may have the pleasure of emptying it by lavish expenditures and fat schemes for plunder. He represents, therefore, the great body of the "ins," eager to give him all power to keep in him and them, and the "outs" out, without much scruple as to the degree or character of the authority given to him. He represents, therefore, the most centralizing tendencies of the system; its centripetal and consolidating principles—the natural result of which must be, unless checked, the perpetuation of power through patronage and force in the hands which hold it. The executive power is vested in him. (Constitution of the United States, article 2, section 1.) All legislative power is vested in Congress. (Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 1.) The President is not a branch of the legislative department. He may obstruct legislation by a veto, but can take no part in it.

Now look to the Senate. The Senators are the representatives of the States, and are elected by the Legislatures of the States. The Legislatures are interposed between the Senators and the people.

Now whom do we in this House represent? What do we represent? There is not a man of us here that is not in intimate contact and relation with the Johns, Williams, and Josephs all over our districts. The men themselves, the individual citizens, with all their rights and with all their personalities, are in close and intimate contact with every member of this House as constituents of their respective Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The five minutes of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUNTON. I will take the floor and yield my five minutes to my colleague, [Mr. TUCKER.]

Mr. TUCKER. It therefore becomes necessary that we should see that those citizens whom we represent have a fair trial by an honest court and that there be no packed juries upon them. It is our duty to see that they have freedom to elect their Representatives. It is our duty to see that the organization of this House is made by such a method as will exclude executive interference and any other influence except the free and honest choice of all the people.

You will remark that of the three measures which it is proposed to repeal by this legislation, that relating to the use of troops at the polls invades the freedom of election by giving the control of it to the person who commands the troops that may be at the polls. Do you not, therefore, see that in the election of members of this House the President has the power under this law to control that election, and thus to dictate to the people who shall hold seats in this House? It would make us perhaps the representatives merely of rotten boroughs, holding our seats as before the reform bill members of Parliament in England did, at the pleasure of the Crown! We would hold only at the will of the President. To guard the integrity and independence of this House from executive control and influence we must repeal these laws.

Now look at it in another point of view. It is necessary that we should protect the citizen in his right to elect whom he pleases. This is peculiarly under our guardianship. He is, as a voter, our constituent. He sent us here to guard his personal rights and his constitutional privilege as a voter. It is not under the guardianship of the President. It is not under the peculiar guardianship of the Senate, but is specially under the guardianship of this House.

But again: the Legislatures of the States elect the Senators. Under this law the President may keep troops at the polls for election of the State Legislatures, and thus by the use of the Army influence and control the election of Senators. This law gives him an improper influence in the election of members of both Houses of Congress. Is this right? Can this be defended?

Therefore, we come forward and say to the President that we do not propose to limit any constitutional function of his executive office, (as was done by the act of 1867, and which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the republican party carried;) but simply that in reference to the use of the Army, which we have the power to put in his hand or to withhold from him, we will give him the Army on the single condition that it shall never be used or be present at the polls when an election is held for members of this House, or in any presidential election, or in any State or municipal election.

We propose to re-enact the Army bill, putting the Army on a new footing with that qualification and condition. Suppose the President should say he will withhold his consent from that bill. To interpret his meaning by other words, if he should veto this bill, he will say in substance that unless we give or leave with him the power to control the election of the members of this House and the members of the Senate of the United States by the use of troops, he will let the Army die and starve for want of support. [Great applause on the democratic side.]

In other words, it would be the language of the highwayman, if the President should say any such thing as his friends say here for him—"your money or your life"—the life of the Government or the money of the people. We simply say, on the other hand, we will not give the money unless upon a condition which will limit his power in the use of the Army, so as to free this House and the Senate from his influence and control through such use of troops.

Now, the question is, which is revolutionary; which is acting according to the Constitution or against it? I hold that we are not acting in a revolutionary manner, because we are doing the things which we were appointed by the Constitution to do, and that Mr. Hamilton, in the Federalist, said we were expected and obliged to do every two years at least. We are not permitted to leave the Army in the hands of the President. The Army is to be governed by Congress, not the President. It exists by our word and dies by our decree. The President has no right to require us to renew its life or to support it. He who gives may give absolutely or on condition. We choose to give conditionally not absolutely. We agree to renew the life of the Army which ends on the 30th of June for the want of supplies, upon the condition that the President shall not use that Army at the polls. How can he say let the country be without defenders unless you let me use them to control elections? Who destroys the Army in such a case? Congress which exercises its legitimate power for a proper purpose, to take away a power it once gave to the President, but which it can take away as it gave it, or the President who would insist on no Army unless he is allowed to use it for his purposes and against the freedom of elections by the people?

How, then, stands the issue? It is well defined.

I have shown that we have the constitutional power to pass this bill in its present form, and that the power to support the Army for a limited period was conferred on us in order that we might so use it as to check the President as the Commander-in-Chief of the Army. That is clearly Hamilton's meaning, contemporaneously expounding that clause of the Constitution.

I have, then, shown that it is our imperative duty to exercise this power, to put an end to the unconstitutional and dangerous control of the President through the military at the elections of the people—because the dread of standing armies in time of peace, inherited from our ancestors, has been increased by our experience of its danger—because the executive influence in elections to both branches of Congress must be curbed or the balances of the Constitution will be overthrown—because the authority claimed for the President is not conferred by the Constitution, but was reposed in him by law and may be recalled by the authority of Congress which gave it—and because in respect to all this legislation, the right of the citizen to a free ballot, uncontrolled by the force of the Army or the influence of the Executive, and his right to life and liberty under the protection of a fair and impartial jury, are placed peculiarly under the guardian care of this House by the Constitution of the country.

Clothed thus with unquestioned power, bound by clear duty, to expunge these vicious laws from the statute-book, following a constitutional method sanctioned by venerable precedents in English history, we feel that we have the undoubted right, and are beyond cavil in the right, in declaring that with our grant of supply there must be a cessation of these grievances, and we make these appropriations conditioned on securing a free ballot and fair juries for our citizens.

What can the President object to this? Not to the method nor the merits of the bill. The method is ours exclusively to regulate. The merits of the question lie in this: shall the President insist on his controlling elections and having packed juries? It is a power derived from us, which he would thus decline to surrender at our demand. In so declining he would declare, "I hold control and influence over the seats in your Houses of Congress by the use of the swords and bayonets of my soldiers and the batons of my marshals. I can prosecute and convict more readily the citizen with packed than with impartial juries. Rather than relax my grasp, military and civil, upon popular elections, rather than give you fair juries, I will reject your appropriation bills and let the Government and the Army starve and die."

I will not attribute such a purpose to the President of this Republic. Such a position he cannot maintain, and I will not believe he will assume it before the American people.

But if his friends should induce him to veto these bills, to refuse the redress of grievances demanded by the people and their Representatives, we are willing to trust the popular verdict on the issue. The people will declare that judicial machinery must not grind out condemnation of free and innocent citizens to the penitentiary through the agency of packed juries. Better no elections than those controlled by the soldier or dictated by the parasites of the Executive, whereby the Representatives of the people on this floor would be exchanged for the favorites of the President, chosen from rotten boroughs against the voice of the people by force or fraud. The people will see that these laws will convert our Federal system into a despotism, and finally into a military imperialism.

It might be said, that as a southern man I am opposed to the Army. Such an idea is unjust and untrue. I have never given a vote against its support, nor to impair its efficiency. I am more interested to secure liberty by limiting its uses, than to lessen its numbers. But the Army must be a servant of the people, not their master. It must be subordinate, not superior to the civil power. It should defend the country, and not assail its freedom. Our purpose is to make the Army the instrument of good in the service of the country, and to take away the authority of the civil government to use it against public liberty and the rights of the people.

I have thus discussed this subject with the frankness and candor which it merits. The committee will pardon me for adding some general remarks in conclusion.

My hopes and aspirations for the future of our country are in accord with those of patriotic men in all parts of the Union. I remember the four years of civil war between the States, now fourteen years past, with sorrow. I have no palinode to sing. My deepest convictions assured me we were right in the course we took then. Claiming nothing which I do not accord to our then opponents, I think we may each respect the conscientious beliefs that impelled us into that unhappy conflict.

That time, that conflict and its causes have passed away. The institution of slavery as a question of property, of caste, and of social polity is gone forever. The once slave is now a citizen, with his rights under the law and Constitution assured equally with our own. The South has come back into the Federal Union, under the Federal Constitution. The doctrine of secession as a constitutional right has been settled against us. We have returned with an honest and sincere purpose (and no one who knows me will doubt the sincerity of my declaration) to make this a glorious Union among the nations of the earth and this Government a great and noble one for the security of the liberties, the independence, and prosperity of the people of all of these united Commonwealths. As a citizen of Virginia and of the United States and as a member of this House I declare this to be my earnest and hearty purpose.

The past is gone, and though it cannot be forgotten, let it in our deliberations be buried from our sight. Its opinions and convictions should have no longer any motive, power, or influence upon present action or future aims and purposes. My action here is dictated by what I believe my duty now requires, and by what I believe to be the highest interest of every State of the Union, as well as of my mother Commonwealth, there across the Potomac, who sends us here to watch and wait and labor for a good and honest government and for the freedom and happiness of the whole people.

Standing upon this ground I look upon the struggle of the civil war as nothing but the convulsive throes of the infant Hercules in his cradle—marking growth, development, and progress. That time has passed away. The wounds of the war are healing—God knows I wish I could say, "had healed entirely." I believe they would have healed long ago, by the first intention, if gentlemen had not prevented it by keeping the sores open. I think it will be admitted that I have never done anything on this floor to open, and everything in my power to heal the wounds of the civil war. Let us have done with these bickerings and strifes about the past. Let us join hands in one noble resolution to do all that each of us can do for the promotion of the common glory and prosperity of our common country.

Under the inspiration of this common desire why should not the meridian glory of our country be worthy of its morning splendor? When I contemplate this virgin continent, peopled by that great race which has been and is in the van of modern progress; its vast material and moral resources for influencing the destiny of mankind and promoting the happiness and well-being of the human family; when I remember how liberty slept in its colonial cradle only to arise in revolutionary strength to shake off foreign bondage and lay the foundations of our temple of free institutions; when I think of the living and unborn millions whose fate is bound up in the success of our experiment of a federated republic of commonwealths—I feel that to doubt the triumphant destiny of the American people is weakness, to despair is crime.

If the committee will pardon me I will say that no man in this House has loved and admired our constitutional system more than I have done from boyhood to the present time. I believe, if preserved in its purity and integrity, it is the wisest system of government ever devised by the wit of man.

But our faith must connect itself with a wise, broad, and comprehensive policy.

If, Mr. Chairman, I should venture to predict the policy of a triumphant future, I would fix its land-marks thus: Let us cling to the Constitution as the tabula in naufragio, as our only hope under God, on the breakers and amid the storms which beset us; that Constitution which is a bundle of the institutional liberties of the Anglo-Saxon race secured by new and republican forms of government:

Let us uphold the Federal authority in all its integrity to the full and legitimate extent of its delegated powers, and preserve to the governments and the people of the several States all their rights and powers for the maintenance of their autonomy and for the promotion of their local, distinct, and peculiar interests; so that, with the common progress of all under the control of our federative system, each State may have its distinct and separate type of civilization; "distinct as the billows, one as the sea:"

Let us strictly and zealously secure to every citizen his individual and personal rights to life, liberty, and self-development by the abolition of special privileges, and opening the gates of enterprise to all, as equal contestants for the prizes of life; by the preservation intact of the sacred writ of habeas corpus against military and civil power; by the supremacy of the civil authority over the military; by a non-partisan judiciary; by fair and impartial juries. as the palladium of freedom; and by free elections, free from the force of military or civil officers, and from the fraud of government or citizens:

Let us grant to governments the minimum of power, and to the citizen the maximum of liberty, consistently with the order and safety of society:

Let Law, with the civic crown upon his brow, and wearing the judicial ermine, treading the pathway of our civilization with no iron heel, and gently and with unmailed hand lead forth Liberty as his wedded wife; and when asked for her most precious jewels let her, like the mother of the Gracchi, point to her happy children looking up with loving hearts to these honored parents of their peace and joy:

Let the Army and Navy be the willing servants of this noble pair, ready at the command of law to execute its decrees and to put down lawlessness, and at the cry of liberty to drive out the usurping intruder upon her sacred precincts or to quell the many-headed despotism of a licentious mob.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, feeling as I do that the fire of early ambition is flickering faint and low in the socket; that I have reached that period, when soon I must fall into the "sere and yellow leaf," and the shadows of life's evening will be lengthening to its close—if, when the last hour shall come, my hopes and aspirations, my dreams and visions for free institutions under the genius of American civilization shall have been realized, I shall be content with humble reverence to paraphrase the prayer of the pious patriarch: Lord! now lettest Thou thy servant depart in peace, for my eyes have seen the salvation of the liberties of my people, and the restoration of the beautiful and profound system of government established by the Constitution of our noble forefathers! [Loud applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT resumed and concluded his remarks, as will be found complete on page 228.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, during the last four days, some fifteen or twenty gentlemen have paid their special attention to the argument I made last Saturday, and have announced its complete demolition. Now that the general debate has closed, I will notice the principal points of attack by which this work of destruction has been accomplished.

In the first place, every man save one who has replied to me has alleged that I held it was revolutionary to place this general legislation upon an appropriation bill. One gentleman went so far as to fill a page of the RECORD with citations from the Congressional Globe and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to show that for many years riders had been placed upon appropriation bills. Now, if gentlemen find any pleasure in setting up a man of straw and knocking it down again they have enjoyed themselves.

I never claimed that it was either revolutionary or unconstitutional for this House to put a rider on an appropriation bill. No man on this side of the House has claimed that. The most that has been said is that it is considered a bad parliamentary practice; and all parties in this country have said that repeatedly.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] evidently thought he was making a telling point against me, when he cited the fact that in 1872 I insisted upon the adoption of a conference report on an appropriation bill that had a rider on it; and he alleged that I said it was revolutionary for his party to resist it. Let me refresh his memory. I said then and I say now that it was revolutionary for the minority party to refuse to let the appropriation bill be voted on. For four days, they said we should not vote at all on the sundry civil appropriation bill because there was a rider on it, put there not by the House but by the Senate.

I was sorry the rider was put on, and moved to non-concur in the amendments when they came to the House. But when the minority on this floor said that we should not act on the bill at all, because the rider was put upon it, I said and now say it was unjustifiable parliamentary obstruction. We do not filibuster. We do not struggle to prevent a vote on this bill. I will be loyal to the House that I am a member of, and maintain now as I did then the right of the majority to bring an appropriation bill to a vote.

You have a right, however unwise and indecent it may be as a matter of parliamentary practice—you have a perfect right to put this rider on this bill and pass it. When you send it to the Senate, that body has a perfect right to pass it. It is your constitutional right and theirs to pass it; for the free consent of each body is the basis of the law-making power.

When it goes to the President of the United States it is his constitutional right to approve it; and if he does, it will then be a law which you and I must obey. But it is equally his constitutional right to disapprove it; and should he do so, then, gentlemen, unless two-thirds of this body and two-thirds of the Senate pass it, notwithstanding the objections of the President, it is not only not your right to make it a law, but it will be the flattest violation of the Constitution, the sheerest usurpation of power, for you to make it a law in any other way. Without these conditions you cannot make it a law.

What, then, is the proposition you have offered? You say that there are certain odious laws that you want to take off the statute-book. I say, repeal them, if you can do so constitutionally. But you declare that you will compel consent to your will by refusing the necessary support—not to the President, not to any man—but to the Government itself. This proposition I denounce as revolution, and no man has responded to the charge either by argument or denial.

No member on this side brought the question into this Chamber. The issue was not created by us. Who brought it here? The proclamation of your caucus, the declaration of your conference committees. They announced it in the last House as their programme. They said you would combine these measures of legislation together and send them to the President in a separate bill, and if he did not approve them you would never vote the supplies for the Government.

You threatened the President in advance, before you allowed him an opportunity to say yes or no. You entered this Hall, fulminating threats against him in a high-sounding proclamation. You thundered in the index. It remains to be seen whether in the body of your work and in its concluding paragraphs your thunder will be as terrible as it was in the opening chapter. By adopting the programme of the last House you have made it your own; but you have put the measures in their most offensive forms by tacking them all to the two great appropriation bills.

Another equally groundless charge against me and my associates, is that we have threatened your bills with an executive veto. I repel the charge as wholly untrue in fact. I said nothing that can be tortured into such a threat. It would be indecent on my part; it would be indecent for any of us even to speak of what the Executive intends to do; for none of us have the right to know. But you, in advance, proclaimed to the country and to him that if he dares to exercise his constitutional right of refusing his consent, you will refuse to vote the supplies for the Government; in other words you will starve it to death. That is the proposition we have debated.

My distinguished friend from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] who has come nearer meeting this case with argument than any other man on this floor, has made a point which I respect as an evidence of the gallantry of his intellect. He says that under our Constitution we can vote supplies to the Army but for two years, that we may impose conditions upon our supplies, and if these be refused the Army ceases to exist after the 30th of June next. In short, that the annual Army bill is the act of reconstituting the Army. He is mistaken in one vital point. The Army is an organization created by general laws, and so far as the creation of offices and grades is concerned, it is independent of the appropriation bills. The supply, of course, comes through appropriation bills. I grant that if supplies are refused to the Army it must perish of inanition. It becomes a skeleton; but its anatomy was created by general law and it would remain a skeleton, your monument of starvation. The gentleman from Virginia says, "Unless you let us append a condition which we regard a redress of grievances we will let the Army be annihilated on the 30th day of next June by withholding supplies." That is legitimate argument; that is a frank declaration of your policy. Let us examine the proposition. What is the "grievance" of which the gentleman complains? He uses the word "grievance" in the old English sense, as though the king were thrusting himself in the way of the nation by making a war contrary to the nation's wish. But his "grievance" is a law of the land—a law made by the representatives of the people—by all the forms of consent known to the Constitution. It is his "grievance" that he cannot get rid of this law by the ordinary and constitutional methods of repeal. [Applause.] When he can get rid of any law by the union of all consents that are required to make or unmake a law, then he can lawfully get rid of it, whether it is a grievance or a blessing. But his method is first to call a law a "grievance," and then try to get rid of it in defiance of the processes which the Constitution prescribes for the law-making power of the nation. I denounce his method as unconstitutional and revolutionary, and one that will result in far greater evil than that of which he complains.

If he goes to the American people with the proposition to let our Army be annihilated on the 30th day of June next, unless the President, contrary to his conscience, contrary to his sense of duty shall sign whatever Congress may send him——

Mr. KEIFER obtained the floor, and yielded his time to Mr. GARFIELD.

Mr. GARFIELD. I say, if the gentleman from Virginia puts that proposition before the American people, we will debate it in the forum of every patriotic heart and will abide the result. If the party which, after eighteen years' banishment from power, has come back, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] said yesterday, to its "birthright of power"—or "heritage," as it is recorded in the RECORD of this morning—is to signalize its return by striking down the gallant and faithful Army of the United States, the people of this country will not be slow to understand that there are reminiscences of that Army which these gentlemen would willingly forget, by burying both the Army and the memories of its great service to the Union, in one grave. [Applause.]

We do not seek to revive the unhappy memories of the war; but we are unwilling to see the Army perish at the hands of Congress, even if its continued existence should occasionally awaken the memory of its former glories.

Now, let it be understood once for all that we do not deny, we have never denied, your right to make rules for this House just as you please. Under those rules, as you make or construe them, you may put all your legislation upon these bills as "riders." But we say that whatever your rules may be, you must make or repeal a law in accordance with the Constitution by the triple consent to which I referred the other day, or you must do it by violence.

Now, as my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] well said, if you can elect a President and a Congress in 1880, you have only to wait two years, and you have the three consents. You can then, without revolution, tear down this statute and all the rest. You can follow out the programme which some of your members have suggested, and tear out one by one the records of the last eighteen years. Some of them are glorious with the unquenchable light of liberty; some of them stand as the noblest trophies of freedom. With full power in your hands you can destroy them. But we ask you to restrain your rage against them until you have the lawful power to smite them down.

My friend from Virginia, whom I know to be a master and lover of mathematics, has formulated his argument into an equation: "Right equals duty plus power." Now, I say to the gentleman that his sense of duty resides in his own breast; but power, the other factor of the second member of his equation, must be found, not in his consciousness, but in the Constitution of the United States. His notions of duty lead him to tear down the laws which the Republic enacted to protect the purity of national elections and to authorize the Army to be used to keep the peace while the national voice is finding expression at the polls. That, I say, is his notion of duty, of which he is sole arbiter; but when he comes to superadd power, in order to complete his "right" as a legislator, I hope he will not evoke that power out of his consciousness, but will seek for it in the great charter, the Constitution of the United States. According to his own algebra, he must have both these elements before he can claim the "right" to overturn these laws which he denounces as grievances.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me add a word in conclusion, lest I may be misunderstood. I said last session, and I have said since, that if you want this whole statute concerning the use of the Army at the polls torn from your books, I will help you to do it. If you will offer a naked proposition to repeal those two sections of the Revised Statutes named in the sixth section of this bill, I will vote with you. But you do not ask a repeal of those sections. Why? They impose restrictions upon the use of the Army, limiting its functions and punishing its officers for any infraction of these limitations; but you ask to strike out a negative clause, thereby making new and affirmative legislation of the most sweeping and dangerous character.

Your proposed modification of the law affects not the Army alone, but the whole civil power of the United States. "Civil officers" are included in these sections; and if the proposed amendment be adopted, you deny to any civil officer of the United States any power whatever to summon the armed posse to help him enforce the processes of the law. If you pass the section in that form, you impose restrictions upon the civil authorities of the United States never before proposed in any Congress by any legislator since this Government began. I say, therefore, in the shape you propose this, it is much the worst of all your "riders." In the beginning of this contest we understood that you desired only to get the Army away from the polls. As that would still leave the civil officers full power to keep the peace at the polls, I thought it was the least important and the least dangerous of your demands; but as you have put it here, it is the most dangerous. If you re-enact it in the shape presented, it becomes a later law than the supervisors and marshals law, and pro tanto repeals the latter. As it stands now in the statute-book, it is the earlier statute, and is pro tanto itself repealed by the marshals law of 1871, and is therefore harmless so far as it relates to civil officers. But if you put it in here, you deny the power of the marshals of the United States to perform their duties whenever a riot may require the use of an armed posse.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] said the other day there was nothing in the Constitution which empowered any officer of the United States to keep the peace in the States. A single sentence, Mr. Chairman, before your hammer falls. I ask that gentleman, when he rises to respond, whether the United States has no power to keep the peace in the great post-office in Baltimore City, so that the postmaster may attend to his duties; whether we have not the power to keep the peace along the line of every railroad that carries our mails, or where any post-rider of the "star service" carries the mail on his saddle; whether we have not the right, if need be, to line the post-road with troops and to bring the guns of the Navy to bear to protect any custom-house or light-house of the United States? And yet, if the gentleman's theory be correct, we cannot enforce a single civil process of this Government by the aid of an armed posse without making it a penitentiary offense to be visited upon the officer who does it. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, almost half the life-time of a generation has passed since the last shot in the great American civil war was fired. Almost one-half of the entire population of the country who took part in that sanguinary strife, or witnessed it, have passed from among us. Nearly one-half of the present population of the United States who have come to participate in its affairs and who are concerned in its welfare have not even a remembrance of the days when the two sections of the country stood arrayed in mortal conflict. We pass from border to border, from lakes to Gulf, and hear nowhere the sound of hostile guns, see nowhere the commotions of war, but everywhere abundant evidence of peace. The "blue and the gray" fraternally meet in national reunions and recount the scenes and incidents of their former battles.

The graves of the heroes who fell in the strife were long since united under one cover of green, and, Mr. Chairman, until I came on to the floor of this House I had supposed that the war in truth was ended; I supposed that we had fought it out to the end in the open field fifteen years ago, and that our battle-flags had been furled; that our arms had been grounded to be taken never again except against a common foe, and that, with the Union restored and liberty established throughout all the land, we were here in the bonds of peace. And I have said, and repeat it now, accursed be the hand that would break the silver cord.

But, Mr. Chairman, from what has been heard on this floor since this debate began it would seem that there are gentlemen here who are still in the midst of war, some indeed who seem to have just got their armor on ready to begin the fight. The old familiar strains, "Anthony Burns," "John Brown," and "border ruffians," make one look around for bursting shells, or to see if some comrade has not been stricken down. Do the gentlemen not know that these and all of these were of the elements that went into that terrible crucible, war, that for five long years raged with relentless fury, drinking up the best blood of the land? Do they not know that in that ordeal slavery went out forever, and that in that fire this Union, if ever doubtful, was fast welded and this Government made perpetual? And I can have no sympathy with those, from whatever section they come, whether from the North or the South, who would, by whispers even, invoke again the red demon of war, or lift a finger to weaken the new chains that again bind us together as one people with one common destiny.

Oh, I am sorry that some of the gentlemen who have spoken on this floor were not living eighteen years ago to have shown by deeds then the warlike zeal they manifest by words now, and I am sorry if five years of war was not long enough for all to have satisfied their martial ardor.

But, Mr. Chairman, why are the old issues of the war brought to the front in the discussion of the questions now before the House? Is it claimed by any gentleman on this floor that the war meant that a single constitutional safeguard to free Government by the people should be taken away? Is it claimed by any gentleman that by the war it was decided that henceforth armed men shall, at the will of any executive, be stationed at the polls where a free people are to indicate their will and express their free choice for their own officers; or that marshals might appoint deputy marshals ad libitum to intimidate and, without process, arrest the citizen? Was it for that that this continent was made to shake beneath the tread of contending armies? Is that what was meant at Gettysburgh? Is that what was meant at Appomattox? Was that the dream of men who went down in the slaughter of the Wilderness? Was it for that that the red stream of life was made to flow so long? Oh, I deny it; we never meant that.

Mr. Chairman, when after perhaps one of the most bitter as well as sanguinary conflicts that history recounts, lasting through almost two generations, James II had vacated the throne and William had reached the court of the Saint James, it was suggested that he should assume the Crown by right as conqueror; but wiser counsel asked whether, if the Crown might be assumed by right of conquest, the great charter, the petition of right, and the habeas corpus act might not also be questioned.

The old Parliament of Charles II was convened. There the roundhead, the cavalier, and royalist met again, but no hand was raised against one of the established safeguards of British liberty. And I say that it was never meant by those who fought our country's battles that one jot or tittle of the old safeguards of our liberties should be taken away or infringed. And we do not mean that they shall be now.

The questions submitted to the arbitrament of the sword have been by the sword determined, and that should be the end of it. On those issues as settled we can know no differences either in the rights of members on this floor or in the rights of citizens anywhere else in this great Republic. I care not from what State one comes, we are citizens to-day, thank God, of a common country; sharers alike in its common blessings; partakers alike in its afflictions, and let me add, Mr. Chairman, that any attempt to open anew the old dissensions merits the condemnation of all good people, I care not whether it comes from the South, the East, or the North.

These issues of the past, as settled in the past, I, for one, relegate to the tomb of the past, and would like never to see them dragged forth but as warnings to the future. But while on this floor for the first time, that I may not be misapprehended, I will add that should ruthless hands from any part of our reunited country attempt to again open those questions, I stand as to those issues, where I stood eighteen years ago, by the stars of liberty and the guns of the Union.

Mr. Chairman, the questions of constitutional powers and legal rights involved in the matters under consideration have been clearly, fully, and unanswerably stated by the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] in the opening of this debate.

But, stripped of all disguise, this power to use at elections the military, this power to create an army of deputy marshals, paid out of the public Treasury, to stand at the polls, is simply so much party machinery, used always, and always will be, (if allowed to stand,) by the party at the time in power for party ends and party purposes.

This machinery, coupled with the not less threatening danger of the corrupt use of money with which it is sure to be accompanied, constitutes a Gorgon that will turn this Republic to a despotism, if allowed to become familiar by use.

We have, Mr. Chairman, an example of this corrupting influence in my own district. Sir, thousands of dollars practically drawn from the public Treasury through levies upon officers and employés of the Government, under the sanction of the same party and the same authority that holds the control of the rest of this diabolical machinery, was sent into the district I have the honor to represent, to be corruptly used, and was, there is good evidence for believing, so used to influence the election of a candidate for Representative to this House. These are the triple appliances to carry elections—money to corrupt, armed men to overawe, deputy marshals to intimidate—great power in petty hands to vex and annoy the free citizen. These are the means by which the sources, the very fountain-heads of popular government are to be contaminated and turned toward certain despotism. Either these partisan appliances must be put away or civil liberty will go down, as it has before.

Gentlemen tell us that to put this machinery away will be revolution. Oh, the revolution to be feared is that which lurks concealed in the existence and exercise of such powers, and for one I will never vote to extend the dominion of arms. I believe in a civilization of law and not of arms.

But, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen on the other side have been bold to tell us that if the bill under consideration is passed it will meet executive disapproval, and that then the Government will stop. Governments do not stop in that way, nor has one ever been known, I think, to starve, as intimated by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio. A government is about the last thing tax-payers think that is likely to starve.

But whatever may be the judgment or action of others, our duty as legislators is to act wisely, independently, fearlessly. For one, however, I take the liberty to say that I believe this appropriation bill as passed will receive the weighty consideration due to so grave a matter; and I believe moreover that wise counsel and the wiser examples of history will prevail over partisan sentiment. But, if otherwise, and gentlemen, as they say they will, appeal to public judgment, for one I say, so let it be.

This is a northern issue, it is a western issue, a national issue, and we will meet it in the North, we will meet it in the West, we will meet it before the people, ay, we will appeal with you to the men who, when "red battle stamped his foot and nations felt the shock," were first to arms, but first also to extend the hand of peace. I fear not that the men whose arms gave liberty to millions alien in race and blood with themselves will hurry to prepare thralldom for their own children, and that, too, at the bidding of a party which, by a mercilessly devised system of financial legislation imposed on the country since 1869, has made the people little more than hewers of wood and drawers of water to would-be masters, and that has laid upon this country burdens scarcely less oppressive, scarcely more tolerable, than foreign hands have imposed upon Egyptian and Turk, and to the perpetuation of which, as they who move the wheels full well understand, the machinery it is proposed in this bill to take away is necessary.

I have spoken, Mr. Chairman, to but a few points raised in these debates, and have preferred to meet gentlemen on the other side on their own chosen ground.

Mr. NEW. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment of which I gave notice on Saturday last, and which was then read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the first paragraph of the pending section as follows:

Provided, That nothing contained in this section as now amended shall be held or deemed to abridge or affect the duty or power of the President of the United States under section 5297 of the Revised Statutes, enacted under, and to enable the United States to comply with, section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, on application of the Legislature or executive, as provided for in said section.

Mr. NEW. I have but one word to say of the amendment which I offer. It is proposed by the bill now before the committee to amend section 2002 of the Revised Statutes, found under the title of "The elective franchise," by striking out the words "or to keep the peace at the polls." If these words shall be stricken out, the section as it would then read would not be at all uncertain or ambiguous, in my opinion. But, sir, after listening to the debates on this bill, and especially the colloquy on Friday last between the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] I am induced to offer this amendment. I do not think it really necessary, for the bill in no wise disturbs section 5297, enacted in 1795 and amended in 1807, which authorizes the President to carry out or make effective the guarantee of the United States as found in section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States. My amendment is intended to prevent misapprehension as to the motives of this side of the House, and misconstruction, and possibly some misrepresentation, of the meaning and effect of section 2002, if it shall be amended by striking out the words which I have already named.

Mr. ELAM. Mr. Chairman, much has been said of the grave consequences which may result from the passage of the pending bill. Especially has the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] dwelt upon "the solemnity of the crisis" and filled our ears with his cries of "revolution." I agree with the gentleman, and I imagine with every gentleman upon this floor, that the questions involved are of momentous importance; but, while the other side of the House claim that the passage of this measure portends evil, I assert, and without any hesitation, that its passage can be productive alone of good.

The issues which have been made, though encumbered with details and beclouded by partisan misrepresentations, are nothing more than questions growing out of a desire on the part of the majority of the representatives of the people to return to the principles which actuated our legislators in the days when the interests of the country held the first place and party success the second. Nothing but good can come from the repeal of an unconstitutional law. Nothing but good can come from the repeal of a partisan law. Nothing but good can come from the assertion by this Congress that the States of this Union are able and willing to maintain the only foundation of our republican form of government, the purity of elections. Is it not possible now that, in the opinion of the republican party, a solemn crisis is at hand for the representatives of the people to declare that party must fall before patriotism, and the laws, therefore, that disgrace our statute-books be repealed.

Mr. Chairman, it is as constitutional to pass this law repealing the existing law as it was to pass the law which we propose to repeal. It is as much in accordance with the custom of this House to repeal the existing law by a section attached to an appropriation bill as it was in accordance with the custom of the House for the republican party, following the precedent set by both parties, to enact the law we propose to repeal by a section of the sundry civil appropriation act of 1872.

Do members of this House imagine that the people do not think? Do members of the republican party on this floor think that the people will believe that it was right to pass a law which provided for Federal interference with elections in the States as part of an appropriation bill, and that it is wrong now to repeal it in the same way?

After attaching to appropriation bills hundreds of measures involving new legislation, and in many cases distinct legislation, how dare so great a party meet so grand an issue as this by such a paltry device? How do the great leaders of a great party dare to eat the words they have spoken, dare to stultify their records, and declare that their action for sixteen years was in violation of the established custom and the precedents of this House? When I refer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and to Mr. Bingham, now one of our ministers abroad, as exponents of the republican party in 1872, I do not think that the positions I assign them will be denied.

At the time when this very law we now propose to repeal was under consideration in this House, a small minority of democrats, comprehending the iniquities embraced in it, used every effort and employed every means within their reach to prevent its passage. They said then what gentlemen on the other side say now, that it was wrong to put general legislation in an appropriation bill. They exhausted all the resources at hand to prevent its adoption.

What did the gentleman from Ohio say of them? I read from page 4440 of the Congressional Globe for the second session of the Forty-second Congress, volume 91, (1872:)

Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio. * * * Now, the committee of conference having brought in a report under the rules, I do now insist and shall continue to demand that the bill before the House shall be acted on; and against all factious and revolutionary resistance I propose to stand, if need be, until December next; until this appropriation bill shall be considered, shall be voted on, voted up, or voted down. This must be done, or we abandon and surrender the right of parliamentary government in this country. We inflict a serious if not a fatal wound upon the freedom and efficiency of the National Legislature.

It is unnecessary to repeat, in this connection, what has already been so aptly said upon this floor, that the gentleman from Ohio is now sustaining what he then denounced as "factious and revolutionary." He now proposes to "abandon and surrender the right of parliamentary government in this country." He now proposes to "inflict a serious if not a fatal wound upon the freedom and efficiency of the National Legislature."

When the gentleman had made these assertions he went further and said:

And now, once for all, I say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Eldredge] and to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that I have said no word to them or to any man inconsistent with the declarations I have made in these remarks. I challenge any man to the proof if he venture to join the issue.

He can plead consistency no more. He stands convicted on his own record of shaping his principles to conform to the needs of his party. He says now, "the consequence of the programme just adopted, if persisted in, is nothing less than the total subversion of this Government." A democratic minority was factious and revolutionary, and a democratic majority proposing to repeal an unconstitutional law is charged with the contemplation of acts subversive of the Government. In other words it depends entirely on the question whose bull it was which gored the ox.

In the same debate Mr. Bingham, of Ohio, said, on page 4442:

The only thing I ask the attention of the House to is this: that it is unconstitutional and revolutionary, and cannot be supported by any precedent, on any pretense of right, to insist that the right of the majority to legislate can be indefinitely postponed by a minority.

I have referred to the positions held by these gentlemen merely to show what was the position of the republican party at the time they passed this law, which we propose to repeal, in an appropriation bill. There remains to be disposed of the real issue involved. The right to repeal this law and the right to repeal it in this way does not admit of question. The true question is, is it necessary that it should be repealed?

I shall leave to others the labor of showing in detail how it destroys the purity of elections and debars the people from the exercise of the elective franchise.

I leave to others the labor of showing that through the interference of the Federal Government with elections in the States fraud has taken the place of purity and the will of the people been supplanted by the mailed hand of power. I do not need to consider these evils, although I know them to exist, but so long as this law remains on our statute-books a greater, a more terrible danger is threatening us, and it is this danger which I wish to avert. Everything which has been done is as nothing to the injury which the retention of this law by the constitutional party of the country will inflict upon the Constitution itself. When gentlemen use the words "subversive of the Government" there appears before me our Constitution, marred and disfigured by the laws spawned by hatred and oppression which have been grafted on the body-politic. They are cancers, and each successive year they eat deeper and deeper into the body of that instrument whence springs our existence as a free people. One of these laws is the one we now propose to repeal. It is not simply unconstitutional, but every act growing out of it, performed by virtue of its authority, strikes directly at the relation between the Federal Government and the States upon which the Federal compact is based. Section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution is as follows:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Here in direct terms is the power conferred upon the States to prescribe the "times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives."

There would be no trouble in interpreting this section were it not for the concluding clause authorizing "the Congress at any time to make or alter such regulations." There is unquestionably here a conflict, to determine which we are compelled to apply to this section the well-known rules of interpretation.

It will be admitted without doubt that the framers of the Constitution never had in contemplation the existence at the same time of two separate and distinct systems of law, each controlling the same subject-matter. Such a proposition is too absurd for consideration; and since the power of controlling these matters was in the first place confided directly to the States, we are forced to inquire into the motive actuating the members of the convention when they added the latter clause. Fortunately the record of the debate upon this section is within our reach, and more fortunately still it makes as clear as noonday the reasons which prompted the members of the convention to add this qualifying clause.

To make this plain I will read from "Elliot's Debates on the Federal Constitution," on pages 366 and 367, upon the fourth section of the Constitution:

Mr. Monroe wished that the honorable gentleman, who had been in the Federal convention, would give information respecting the clause concerning elections. He wished to know why Congress had an ultimate control over the time, place, and manner of elections of Representatives, and the time and manner of that of Senators, and also why there was an exception as to the place of electing Senators.

Mr. MADISON. * * * It was necessary to give the General Government a control over the time and manner of choosing the Senators, to prevent its own dissolution. With respect to the other point, it was thought that the regulation of time, place, and manner of electing the Representatives should be uniform throughout the continent. Some States might regulate the elections on the principle of equality, and others might regulate them otherwise. This diversity would be obviously unjust.

* * * * * * *

It was found necessary to leave the regulation of these, (time, place, and manner,) in the first place, to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution. And, considering the State governments and General Government as distinct bodies, acting in different and independent capacities for the people, it was thought the particular regulations should be submitted to the former, and the general regulations to the latter. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments, the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State Legislatures, the congressional power will very probably never be exercised. The power appears to me satisfactory, and as unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution.

After an analysis of the explanation given by Mr. Madison, we can arrive at but one conclusion, and that is, that the absolute control of this matter given to the States was limited by this qualifying clause only with the purpose of enabling the Congress, in the event of failure on the part of any of the States to provide for congressional elections, in the manner contemplated by the Constitution, to interpose and, with a view of preventing its own dissolution, provide for the holding of such elections. It was, as Mr. Monroe expressed it, an "ultimate" power. It was a power which could be exercised alone upon the failure of the States to act, and was conferred solely with the view of enabling the General Government to protect itself from dissolution.

But the power thus conferred upon the General Government was not co-extensive with that conferred upon the States. The important element of this power is the right to determine the qualifications of voters; and in its most reckless disregard of the spirit of the Constitution the republican party has never ventured to claim directly the power to interfere with this right of the States. The second section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution provides for the reduction of the representation of a State in Congress to the extent to which the State shall deny to any portion of its male citizens of twenty-one years of age the right of suffrage; and the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution provides only that the States shall not abridge the right of their citizens of like qualifications to vote "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." Neither amendment ventures to dispute the right of a State to determine the qualifications of its own voters, and whenever that right is disputed and practically denied the very foundation of our system of government is swept away.

Mr. Chairman, the republican party have never dared directly to trench upon this right, but indirectly they have done so by the adoption of these laws the repeal of which we are now demanding. It is accomplished indirectly by the presence at the polls and the interference of marshals and deputy marshals and supervisors of election. It is accomplished by intimidation and force through the use of the Army of the United States at the polls. It is accomplished by the unjustifiable assumption of jurisdiction by the United States courts over alleged violations of the election laws.

Mr. Chairman, this Congress has no power to pass a law regulating any feature of the election laws of the States until it shall be demonstrated that the State or States have failed to provide for elections in the form necessary to secure the perpetuity of our Government. But I assert that no such contingency exists now or did exist when these laws were passed. There is not a State in this Union which does not provide for the holding of free and fair elections for Senators and Representatives in Congress in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution; and if Mr. Madison could behold the spectacle of to-day he would regret the short-sightedness which induced him to say, "the congressional control will very probably never be exercised. The power appears to me satisfactory, and as unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution."

I defy the gentlemen on the other side of this House to point me to a State whose system of laws does not provide for the "times, places, and manner" of holding elections for Senators and Representatives. If this cannot be done these laws which we are endeavoring to repeal are usurpations of power.

The presence at the polls in the States of these marshals, supervisors, and troops is in violation of the spirit if not of the letter of the Constitution. It is a denial of the ability of the States to maintain the purity and freedom of elections.

The grand jury of a United States court which frames an indictment against an individual for violations of an election law, as well as the district attorney who procures his conviction and the judge who wantonly assumes jurisdiction to which he has no claim, are equally conspirators against the individual and the whole people.

Two separate penal statutes for violation of election laws, two distinct judicial bodies, the one claiming jurisdiction over violations of a Federal statute and the other over violation of the statute of a State, both referring to the same subject-matter, and only the distinction existing that the statute of the State is in harmony with the Constitution, and the Federal statute is a violation of the Constitution, the bastard semblance of a law! This is the picture.

The men who have been arrested without affidavit or warrant for violations of Federal election laws were so arrested and convicted in the face of the very letter of the Constitution; and where they have been convicted and compelled to languish within the walls of a prison, it has been a violation of that liberty of the American citizen which is guaranteed to him under our institutions.

To the States is confided the regulation of elections, and if their laws provide for holding such elections in conformity with the Constitution, Federal statutes could not be passed regulating the same matter. But they have been; and the question is asked, there being a conflict, which must control? Unquestionably that one which is constitutional. Unless the emergency has arisen calling for the exercise of the "ultimate" power of Congress over this matter, laws passed by the latter are mere works of supererogation, and the constitutional statutes of the State must prevail and the jurisdiction of the State courts of offenses against those statutes must be maintained.

I have devoted so much time to the presentation of this question, because, in my opinion, affecting as it does the relations between the States and the General Government with regard to so vital an issue, it demands our careful examination and our firm and decisive action. We must maintain the barriers which are our only protection against centralization of power. That I have given the correct interpretation to this qualifying clause of section 4 I do not think admits of dispute. Mr. Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, says, on page 281, volume 2:

> Its propriety (the qualifying clause) rested upon this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation.

Again, he says on the same page:

> A discretionary power over elections must be vested somewhere.

And again, on page 282:

> But in extraordinary circumstances the power is reserved to the National Government, so that it may not be abused and thus hazard the safety and permanence of the Union.

And as an illustration of what this distinguished jurist regarded as an "extraordinary circumstance" justifying Federal intervention, I read again from page 282. He says:

> Nor let it be thought that such an occurrence is wholly imaginary. It is a known fact that under the confederation Rhode Island, at a very critical period, withdrew her delegates from Congress and thus prevented some important measures from being carried.

Will gentlemen hesitate to accord to this indorsement of my position the weight which it demands?

I propose, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, to say that I have no wish to forecast the action of the Executive should Congress repeal these laws. Nor do I desire to believe, nor shall I believe that the insinuations and the half-clothed threats which have reached our ears, that should the bill pass it would be vetoed, have other foundation than the fancy of those who imagine that done which they wish to be done. On the contrary, believing as I do this law which we propose to repeal to be unconstitutional, I am convinced that our virtual declaration to this effect would place it out of the moral power of any Executive to veto the repealing law.

Mr. BAKER. I rise to offer an amendment to the amendment of my colleague from Indiana, in the nature of an addition.

The Clerk read as follows:

> And no person other than a civil officer of the United States or the State, armed with any rifle, shot-gun, revolver, or other fire-arm, or having in his hands or upon his person any dirk, bowie-knife, club, bludgeon, or other deadly weapon, shall on the day of any general or special election held in any State at which Representatives in Congress are to be voted for, or on the days provided for the registration of voters for the election of such Representatives, approach nearer than one-half mile to any such voting place or place of registration in any State, except when lawfully called out as a posse comitatus to suppress a riot; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions aforesaid shall on conviction be fined not exceeding $5,000, and be imprisoned at hard labor not less than three months nor more than three years.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman, that proposition is so eminently wise and just, is so eminently in the interest of economy, not only of money but of blood, that I feel satisfied that there is no gentleman on the floor of the House who will oppose it. I do not desire myself to participate in the discussion which has been carried on for some days past. I simply submit that this proposition on its face is its own best commentary on its necessity and importance.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order as an amendment to the amendment, but the Chair will entertain it as a separate proposition.

Mr. BAKER. The amendment is an addition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW.]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order now.

Mr. BAKER. I would like to know why it is not in order as an addition to the amendment offered by my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated to the gentleman that he would entertain the amendment as a separate proposition when the question had been taken upon the amendment offered by his colleague, [Mr. NEW.] The amendment of the gentleman does not relate to the same subject as the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. NEW.]

Mr. CONGER. It is in order to amend any amendment proposed, and the Chair cannot decide as to its relevancy.

Mr. BAKER. The question cannot arise in that way. I offer it in the nature of an addition to the amendment offered by my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered must be in the nature of an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BAKER. I have offered it in that form.

The CHAIRMAN. No advantage will be taken of the gentleman. His amendment will be the next in order.

Mr. CONGER. But the gentleman offers it as an amendment to come in at the end of the pending amendment. Now, that is certainly in order.

Mr. BAKER. There is no rule among the rules of this House that forbids the offering of such an amendment as I have offered, to come in at the end of the pending amendment. Rule 120 does not affect the proposition at all; nor can it be said that it is not germane, for it relates to the matters of election and touches the use of the fire-arms and other deadly weapons on the day of the election.

Mr. NEW. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the rules of the House to know what the effect of this amendment would be, but I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the amendment which I have offered is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. NEW. The bill before the House proposes to amend a section of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. BAKER. The suggestion made by my colleague is not correct. The amendment that he offers is an amendment to the text of the bill and it cannot be said that any portion of the text of the bill is an amendment. It is the original bill itself. There is an amendment offered and I offer an amendment to that amendment. I have a right to do it, and I desire, with deference, to submit to the Chair that as no point of order has been made the proposition is unquestionably before the committee, and rightfully before it. It is something novel, if the Chair will pardon such a suggestion, that the Chair should raise such a point of order as this.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, there is such confusion that I hardly know what is before the committee. I would like to hear the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana read.

Mr. BAKER. I have no objection to that; for it is excellent reading.

The Clerk again read Mr. BAKER'S amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SPARKS. I raise the point of order upon that.

Mr. CONGER. He is too late.

Mr. SPARKS. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not entertained the amendment.

Mr. SPARKS. I would state to the Chair that this is the first knowledge I have had of the scope and meaning of the amendment, and I now raise the point of order upon it, that it is not germane to the subject-matter before the committee.

Mr. CONGER. The amendment has been read and discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not yet entertained the amendment. He asked the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw it, and the Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana to refuse to take that course.

Mr. BAKER. He did so on the ground that when an amendment was offered to the text of the bill any other member of the committee has the constitutional and parliamentary right to offer any amendment whatever to that amendment, and his doing so is not within the inhibition of any rule of the House. That is the ground upon which I insisted upon my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was not asking the gentleman for any argument upon the subject. The gentleman was discussing the question, and the Chair did make a request of the gentleman, stating to him the fact that he could bring in his amendment after that of his colleague was disposed of. Does he prefer to have it moved now?

Mr. BAKER. I have said respectfully and insisted upon my right at this time and at this place to offer this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can renew his amendment after the pending amendment is disposed of, when the Chair will recognize him for that purpose. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. CONGER. I object to this as an attempt on the part of the Chair to dictate when and how an amendment shall be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will take his seat; he is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. No; the gentleman from Michigan will not.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair will order the Sergeant-at-Arms to keep order.

Mr. CONGER. Let the Chair do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee must be in order. No business will be entertained until the committee is in order.

Mr. CONGER. And I rose to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be in order first.

Mr. CONGER. And the Chair threatens me with the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asked the gentleman to be seated, and he refused to do so. The Chair will now enforce order if there is any power in the committee to do it.

Mr. SPARKS. If the gentleman has a point of order to make——

Mr. CONGER. I have already made it, and I demand the floor to speak upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] to make a point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. And I made the point of order that the Chair cannot postpone the amendment in order to enable another member to raise a point of order upon it when the amendment has been read and has been discussed, as I stated as a member of this committee. The amendment having been read and having been discussed, it is too late to make the point of order upon it. My point of order is that the Chair cannot, by recognizing it as presented now instead of then, open the door for a point of order to be made against it.

A MEMBER. The gentleman can appeal.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman says I can appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order made by the gentleman?

Mr. CONGER. The point is that this amendment was entertained, read, and discussed.

Mr. BAKER. I discussed it myself at some length.

Mr. CONGER It is too late to raise the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order——

Mr. SPARKS. I desire to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will permit the Chair to proceed. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] makes the point of order that the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] comes too late. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to state distinctly what I said.

The CHAIRMAN. No discussion is in order. Does the gentleman appeal?

Mr. CONGER. I make this point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has overruled the point of order made by the gentleman.

Mr CONGER. I make another point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. It is that the Chairman of this committee has no right, after the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] has offered an amendment, after it has been read by the Clerk, after it has been debated, to put the question again as a new one and then admit the point of order. If the Chair may do that, then he may rule here as he will against all rules and against all law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will be in order.

Mr. SPARKS. I understand the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has made a point of order, and I want to address my remarks to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] pardon the Chair? The gentleman from Michigan made a point of order and he renews it again.

Mr. CONGER. I did not renew the same point of order. The Chair shall not misstate me with my consent.

Mr. SPARKS. Allow me to speak to the point of order one moment.

Mr. CONGER. If the Chair misunderstands my point of order I desire to restate it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman again state it?

Mr. CONGER. My point of order is, that the chairman of this committee, after an amendment has been presented, read by the Clerk, and discussed, has no right to put it as a proposition made now, and permit a point of order to be made upon it by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS;] that it is not germane, and is new legislation. I claim that the Chairman shall take the amendment as it was proposed, when it was proposed, as read by the Clerk and as discussed, as all the committee know it was, and that the Chair shall not say that "the gentleman from Indiana now proposes an amendment."

Mr. SPARKS. Allow me one word——

Mr. CONGER. That is the point of order, and no gentleman in this House misunderstands it.

Mr. SPARKS. On the point of order raised by the gentleman from Michigan——

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order has been raised by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SPARKS. Well, on my own point of order, then. I make the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] is not germane. I want to say this: I regret extremely that at this time in the debate there should be any bitterness of feeling at all. The gentleman from Indiana proposed something. The Chair objected to it, stating that it could not be entertained; and during the parley upon that I asked for the reading of the amendment. Is not that the fact?

Mr. CONGER. It had been read before.

Mr. SPARKS. Of course it had.

Mr. BAKER. I had already said——

Mr. SPARKS. I will set it right. The proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] had been made, and the amendment had been read. The Chair insisted that it could not be entertained at that time, but must come in as an independent proposition; and he stated that he would at a certain time recognize the gentleman for that purpose; pending which I asked that the proposition be read for information. I obtained that information and raised the point of order. These are the facts.

Mr. WILBER. The Chair did not insist, but simply made a request.

Mr. SPARKS. The Chair did not entertain the proposition.

Mr. WILBER. I beg to differ with the gentleman. After it had been entertained the Chairman, as a request merely, asked that it be withdrawn.

Mr. SPARKS. The Chair refused to entertain it. I beg gentlemen to remember that.

Mr. WILBER. I appeal to the Chair to state whether I am correct.

Mr. SPARKS. I know that I have stated the matter correctly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make a statement on the point of order.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to say a word upon this point of order. A few moments ago I sent an amendment to the desk, stating that I offered it as an amendment to the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. NEW,] to come in at the end of his proposition. After it had been read to the committee I proceeded to discuss the merits of that proposition; and after I had concluded what I desired to say on the merits the Chair inquired whether or not I wished the proposition to be submitted then or whether I would consent to its withdrawal? I then notified the Chair that I did not propose to withdraw my amendment; and, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what significance there was in the language of the Chair, on three several occasions inquiring whether or not I would consent to withdraw the proposition, if that proposition was not before the committee so that it could be withdrawn? The very fact that the Chair inquired of me whether I would withdraw it implied that in his judgment it was before the committee. [Cries of "That is so!"] Is there any escape from that proposition? None in the world. I insist, for the reason I have suggested, that the point of order comes too late. I insist that if the Chair can ever be estopped by any solemn and public declaration, the Chair is estopped by the thrice-repeated request to know whether or not I would withdraw the proposition, which request could not have been made unless the Chair understood the proposition as pending.

With reference to the merits of the point of order I say that the same rule which would be applied to an amendment cannot be applied to an amendment to an amendment. Your rules apply to amendments to the text of bills. Rule 120 is the only one that can be invoked in this case, and that inhibits any amendment unless it be germane to the subject-matter of the bill and tends to retrench expenses. But when an amendment has been once offered and entertained there is no rule of this House forbidding an amendment to that amendment and proposing to change, modify, enlarge, extend the operation of the amendment. If this is not so, then in all the years I have served here this House in Committee of the Whole has been guilty not only of the greatest stupidity but of wanton waste of public time, because it has been the constant practice to entertain amendments proposing to strike out the last word, or the last two words, or the last five words, which amendments in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred would, if adopted, render the original amendment entirely non-germane to the subject-matter. If we should apply the test suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] my late colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, such amendments to amendments could not be entertained. I submit that when an amendment has been received it is admissible to move to strike out any part of it or to make any addition to it, and the suggestion whether or not it would be germane if offered as an original amendment to the text of the bill cannot be considered at that stage of the proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that during this entire discussion he has endeavored to administer impartially the rules of the House so that all parties and all sides might be satisfied that perfect justice had been done. He still desires to pursue that course, and will do so.

When the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] moved this amendment the Chair was of opinion that it was not then in order, and so stated. While the Chair was determining that question by looking at the rules, discussion was going on as to whether the amendment was in order or not; and before the Chair had determined whether the amendment should be entertained at that time, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] in charge of the bill, asked to have the proposition again read, which was done, and thereupon he made the point of order upon it.

The Chair desires to state that when a proposition is moved it is not considered as pending until stated by the Chair. The Chair had not entertained this amendment, had not stated that it was before the committee, so that the point of order could not be made upon it until after it had been read the second time on the request of the gentleman from Illinois. Without intending to do injustice to any gentleman or to take advantage of the failure of any gentleman to be in time, the Chair, desiring simply to administer the rules impartially, is of opinion that the point of order was made in time.

Mr. CONGER. I submit the Chair had not stated the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW,] and the Chair has not yet. Now, if that be the ruling, then the Chair allows a great deal of business to go on without making the statement he makes now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that he did not entertain it.

Mr. CONGER. I am speaking of the other gentleman from Indiana. The Chair has not yet stated his proposition was before this committee.

Mr. SPARKS. If the other is subject to the point of order it cannot be attached to the bill.

Mr. McMAHON. Does the gentleman from Michigan make the point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana?

The CHAIRMAN. Is the Chair to understand that?

Mr. McMAHON. That is the question I wish to have answered.

Mr. CONGER. I have said that the Chair has not stated properly the point of order of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER.] I have stated that the Chair has not stated the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW.]

Mr. SPARKS. Both are subject to the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I think not, as both have been discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided that question.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say here, as this may arise again—I desire to say if on every amendment we offer we are to be held to the strict ruling of the Chairman that, having risen in his place and stated the proposition, it is then to be ruled out, then we are the victims of misplaced confidence in the Chair. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLOUNT. The recollection of the Chair is corroborated by a number of gentlemen around me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair regrets the simplicity of gentlemen who allowed themselves to be made victims by the enforcement of the rules.

Mr. CONGER. It has occurred once, but it will not occur again.

Mr. MONEY. I ask the reading of the notes of the reporter to see whether the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana was discussed as to its merits or as to the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. Has not the question been settled?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided and is now prepared to rule on the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPARKS. Let us have the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BAKER. As there seems to be a question of fact made as to whether or not I had argued the merits of the proposition, I ask that the notes of the reporter be read.

Mr. ATKINS. Has not the Chair decided the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has, and all further discussion is out of order unless the gentleman takes an appeal.

Mr. ATKINS. No appeal has been taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SPARKS. Let us have the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will now rule on the point of order. When the point of order was made on the pending section that it was not germane to the pending bill, the Chair held that it was germane because it related to the duties of the Army. But this proposition relates to citizens, persons who hold no relation to the Army whatever, and is intended to prescribe a criminal code. If the Chair were permitted to express an opinion upon it, he might think it very proper in the regulation of elections in the States by imposing penalties; but that this proposition is germane to the pending bill no gentleman will contend. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the reading of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read for information, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And no person, other than a civil officer of the United States or the State, armed with any rifle, shot-gun, revolver, or other fire-arm, or having in his hands or upon his person any dirk, bowie-knife, club, bludgeon, or other deadly weapon, shall, on the day of any general or special election held in any State at which Representatives in Congress are to be voted for, or on the days provided for the registration of voters for the election of such Representatives, approach nearer than one-half mile to any such voting place or place of registration in any State except when lawfully called out as a posse comitatus to suppress a riot; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions aforesaid shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding $5,000 and be imprisoned at hard labor not less than three months nor more than three years.

Mr. SPARKS. The Chair has ruled on this last proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has, and has ruled it out.

Mr. SPARKS. Then I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CLOSING DEBATE.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask now to propose, Mr. Speaker, that when we go into committee again this debate on amendments under the five-minute rule be limited to a certain time. I therefore move that all debate on amendments be closed to-morrow at two o'clock.

Several MEMBERS. All right.

Mr. SPARKS. And that we then proceed to vote on the pending amendments.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I have this to say to that proposition: There are many who have had no opportunity to speak during the general debate, and who desire at least an opportunity to be heard in a five-minute speech on amendments. I therefore object to fixing the time to-morrow at two o'clock.

Mr. SPARKS. I submit to the gentleman that I cannot control this. I want the House to decide it. I understand a large majority of the House desire just about the proposition I have made. It is not personal, it is not mine; I want to serve the wishes of the whole House.

Mr. CONGER. Make it three o'clock.

Mr. McMAHON. That is too late.

Mr. SPARKS. Let me say to my friend from Michigan that we will get along better by saying two o'clock. Many members have insisted upon one o'clock, and I have tried to split the difference by making it two o'clock.

Mr. WHITE. I submit that we take a recess until to-morrow at eleven o'clock. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. SPARKS. I have fixed it at two o'clock to meet the views of gentlemen like the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I hope the gentleman will insist upon fixing it at two o'clock.

Mr. SPARKS. I am going to.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House take a recess until eleven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SPARKS. I will state that I am satisfied no objection will be made by anybody to allowing members to print whatever remarks in the RECORD on this subject they may desire. That has been suggested to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please indicate whether he wishes the motion for closing debate to be fixed at two or three o'clock.

Mr. SPARKS. At two o'clock, just as I made it.

The SPEAKER. That is, debate on the pending amendment.

Mr. SPARKS. Or any amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

60. No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House, or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close the debate: Provided, That where debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed, in committee, five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which any member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate on the amendment; but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to the amendment; and neither the amendment nor an amendment to the amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof, unless by unanimous consent of the committee: Provided, further, That the House may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has taken place upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph of a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph, or at their election upon the pending amendments only.

Mr. SPARKS. I withdraw my motion, and now move that all debate on the pending amendment be closed to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. FRYE. Can we not arrive at an arrangement by unanimous consent? By unanimous consent the debate can be closed on all amendments to the pending section at two o'clock. If the gentleman from Illinois will make a motion that the House take a recess until eleven o'clock to-morrow, and that the vote on this bill be taken at two o'clock to-morrow, I think there will be unanimous consent to that proposition.

Mr. SPARKS. I will agree to that if there be unanimous consent.

Mr. COBB. I object.

The SPEAKER. To what part of the proposition does the gentleman object?

Mr. COBB. To meeting at eleven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. It is not in the power of the gentleman from Indiana, if the Chair understands his object, to prevent by a single objection the House taking a recess. The House has that within its control.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will move that the House take a recess until eleven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. McMAHON. I submit that the agreement as to closing debate should be entered into before we take a recess.

Mr. SPARKS. If we can have unanimous consent that all debate close to-morrow at two o'clock, I think we can have the recess afterward.

The SPEAKER. The majority of the House can regulate the matter of the recess. The proposition now is that all debate on the pending amendments, and the Chair understands the gentleman from Maine to say, on the bill——

Mr. FRYE. On the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. On the bill; better so, and you cover it all.

The SPEAKER. That all debate on the bill be closed at two o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. AIKEN. I object.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the gentleman's objection.

Mr. AIKEN. Will the Chair hear me one moment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. AIKEN. We have sat here one week—nearly a fortnight—hearing gentlemen hour after hour explain their views on this subject. But, Mr. Speaker, there are some of us here who feel we have not been fairly represented by the arguments that have been used on this floor, and would desire an opportunity to reply to some of the statements which have been made. For myself I do not desire more than five minutes, for my views are known at home, and the wishes of my constituents are known. Still I would like to have the opportunity of replying to one or two of the arguments which have been used. I have gone to the Chair half a dozen times and have been told I cannot get an opportunity. And now, when it is said that we will close this debate to-morrow, I feel that it is putting the gag law on me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not doubt for a moment that if the gentleman will apply to the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for five minutes he will be recognized.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not know that. I have been long enough in this House to have no confidence in any Congressman. [Great laughter.]

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that five minutes of the time in the Committee of the Whole to-morrow be given to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. CONGER. I object to singling out any gentleman for such a privilege.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not want exclusive privileges from anybody.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will again state his proposition.

Mr. SPARKS. My proposition is that by unanimous consent all debate on the amendment now pending and on the bill be closed to-morrow at two o'clock. That was the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine; and I understood unanimous consent was given for that. But the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] came in subsequently and objected. That gentleman had about agreed to withdraw his objection, and the proposition was about to be carried, when the disease broke out very badly on the other side. It is a contagion, sir, and the gentleman from Michigan took it and raised an objection. [Laughter.] But I ask we may now have unanimous consent that all debate shall close to-morrow at two o'clock; and with that understanding, I move that the House now take a recess until to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say one word. The gentleman from Illinois, a self-constituted leader in this House, whom no one desired to take that position, but to whom we have yielded on account of his good looks and general courtesy, occupies that position now to make disrespectful remarks about a member on this floor.

Mr. SPARKS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If I have done anything of the sort I withdraw it. But the gentleman must not charge me with that. I certainly have never made a remark disrespectful to the gentleman from Michigan, and if I have made one that the gentleman has so construed I withdraw it most cheerfully. I now insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks consent that all debate, when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill and amendments shall be closed at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MONEY. Does that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. MONEY. I object.

Mr. SPARKS. Then I modify my motion so that debate on the pending amendment be closed at half past twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House take a recess until eleven o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until Saturday, at eleven o'clock a. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at eleven a. m., (Saturday, April 5.)

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to proceed with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the first paragraph of the pending section as follows:

Provided, That nothing contained in this section as now amended shall be held or deemed to abridge or affect the duty or power of the President of the United States under section 5297 of the Revised Statutes, enacted under, and to enable the United States to comply with, section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, on application of the Legislature or executive, as provided for in said section.

Mr. CASWELL. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to discuss the subject under consideration divested so far as is possible of party prejudice. We are in extra session. In a session convened by the Executive because of a failure of the last Congress to provide means for the support of the Army, and the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government.

Why were not the appropriations made at the last session?

Save the failure to provide for the Army in the Forty-fifth Congress for a short period, we have not omitted so important a duty for many years. The Congress did not fail to make these important provisions because there was not sufficient revenues to warrant the appropriation. The means were ample. But by law the use of all money in the Treasury is prohibited except by express enactment.

The real cause for the omission was this: The dominant party in the House of Representatives, where all such bills must originate, desired a change in existing laws of a general nature, while the republican Senate would not agree to such a change. The measure as an independent proposition could not secure the approval of both Houses. If it could, a separate bill would have been put upon its passage and the appropriation bills left untrammeled. To force the Senate to agree to the passage of such laws the House in the last Congress attached them to the usual and necessary appropriation bills, bills which provided for the support of the Government, and insisted that the Senate should agree to the passage of the obnoxious measures or fail to provide the necessary means to carry on the various departments of the Government after June 30. The Senate, while willing to agree to all that was usual in appropriation bills, was opposed to the provisions of a general nature attached thereto, and for that reason would not concur, and the constitutional limit of the Forty-fifth Congress was reached without the passage of the ordinary appropriation bills.

Hence it became the duty of the President to convene the Congress to supply the omission. We were assembled for no other purpose, and the people do not expect us to enter upon any other legislation. Confining our action to that duty, we could without delay accomplish the objects of the session and adjourn. This, however, we are not permitted to do. Only one of the bills has thus far been acted upon. That one is loaded with a section of a general nature, a wide departure from the objects of the session. It is the settled practice of all legislative bodies, whether State or national, to embody in separate bills appropriations of money for the support of the Government. It would be a dangerous policy to attach to such bills legislation of a general character. Appropriation bills should be kept separate from all other legislation. Neither should have the aid of the other in securing passage or approval. Attached to these bills obnoxious measures, which could never secure sufficient support to become law, standing upon their own merit, could find a passage in the momentum of a bill appropriating twenty or thirty millions of dollars.

Hence the rules of the House forbid it. Precedents are against it, except in cases where the public exigency may have required it at a period too late to secure relief in a separate form, and in which both Houses were quite unanimous in their support. No bill, no independent proposition, should ever become a law unless it have by its own merit the concurrence of both Houses and the approval of the Executive in the manner known to the Constitution. It has been usual to enact appropriation bills at every session of Congress, whether legislation of a general nature could secure a passage or not. For that purpose the committee having those bills in charge may at any time take the floor and command the attention of the House. No such power is delegated to committees having in charge bills of a general nature, and that committee should not use its prerogative to hasten or secure the passage of other matters not pertaining to their duties. Thus it will be seen where the responsibility of this extra session rests.

The Government consists of three distinct but co-ordinate branches—the legislative, executive, and judicial. Great care should be taken that each branch remain independent and in no way encroach upon the other. Our fathers who framed the Constitution deemed it just as important to invest in the President the veto power as to delegate to Congress the legislative. The President is as fairly possessed of his as Congress of its power, and it is just as necessary that it be respected and sustained. Congress alone with the concurrence of two-thirds can override it. The President should be as free to exercise the veto power when in his judgment it is necessary as Congress should be in the passage of bills. Congress should never attempt to coerce the Executive, either by withholding the necessary appropriations for the support of the Government or in any other way, to approve bills which in his judgment are unwarranted by the Constitution or destructive of the peace and good order of the people.

The pending bill is not of itself revolutionary. The mere fact of its pendency in the House, the fact that an objectionable clause is attached to an appropriation bill, is not revolutionary. It is, however, a bad precedent, and one which, if its passage and approval be secured, will be fraught with mischief. The revolutionary act is to follow the defeat of the bill. That is foreshadowed by the edicts of the caucus of the party now in power in this House as well as at the other end of the Capitol.

The country has been informed and, indeed, it is promulgated upon this floor, that the Executive shall have no money to continue the administration of the Government unless these measures meet his approval, however great and well founded may be his objections. Will not such action be revolutionary? If the President in the exercise of his constitutional duty prevents the passage of a bill, and the House thereupon refuse to furnish him with further supplies, is not that revolutionary? Is it not an attempt to coerce the Executive into the approval of legislation which is against his judgment?

We are told that the law sought to be repealed is unconstitutional; that it authorizes an incroachment upon the power reserved to the States and to that extent is a violation of the rights of States. This brings us to an examination of the Federal power over insurrections in the States, and is akin to questions which led us into the late disastrous conflict, from which we shall not recover in the present generation. Domestic violence is often attended with greater evils than the invasion of foreign enemies. No war with a foreign nation could have equaled that of the late civil war. It is, then, quite as important to check and suppress domestic violence or insurrection in the States as to drive back the invader. Domestic wars are more destructive than foreign; strife among our own people and all the consequences resulting are borne by us alone.

To keep the peace, preserve order, and suppress domestic violence, is among the highest duties of government; nothing is more essential to the life and prosperity of any country. It cannot be that there exists any clause in the written or unwritten Constitution of this country, or that there is omitted that authority enabling the Government to preserve its own life and existence. While we concede that all power not vested in Congress is reserved to the States, we must hold that Congress has the authority to interfere and enforce all needful laws and regulations to enable the people to exercise the elective franchise in choosing members of Congress. It is a Federal election required by the Constitution of the United States. We fix the time and the manner of holding that election, and can we not lend to the civil authorities, if necessary to preserve the peace, the strong arm of the Government?

The Congress cannot be dispensed with; and while we require of each State the election of members, we should guarantee the possibility of an election. But how can we, if we have no power to preserve peace at the polls? Section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution provides:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

No one pretends that the statute in question contemplates the presence of United States troops at the polls except upon call of the Legislature or the executive of the States in the manner provided in the Constitution, and then only "unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls." "Unless it be necessary," the law provides, and in that case, not by the dictation of a military commander but by the instrumentality of civil authority invoking the aid of force to keep the peace. In every State in this Union where such force is likely to be needed there now exist democratic governors and Legislatures. Will they, if opposed to the use of the power, be likely to call for its use without occasion? Are democratic voters likely to be intimidated and kept from the polls by the intercession of their own civil authorities? It is but idle to suppose it. The cry of military oppression at the polls is without cause; it is for political effect, and nothing more.

In 1865 when this statute was enacted the country was overrun with the military forces. We had an army of half a million men. Armed forces were arrayed against armed rebellion. They had become aggressive, and in many instances were exercising questionable authority. Congress passed this law to restrain them. Two exceptions only were made. These were deemed essential and most vital. To satisfy an element in the border States we restrained by this statute the use of the military in all cases "unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies o ithe United States or to keep the peace at the polls." The act was a limitation upon the use of the Army as practiced before then under democratic administrations, and the statute now stands as a restriction of the powers enjoyed by almost every government in the world. The exceptions provided for in the act were so eminently proper that their validity never has been questioned in the courts or elsewhere. It was left for a democratic caucus in Congress to discover that a repeal of the clause "to keep the peace at the polls" is so important as to justify the withholding of supplies from the Executive unless such repeal can be accomplished.

There is no pretense that this power is to be used at elections in which Congress has no interest, either in State or municipal elections. It is to be restricted to elections of members of this House. In such elections we have an interest. Every Congress is filled with contested cases. Fraud, intimidation, and riots are alleged. Committees are appointed, and the manner and method of elections are investigated. Thousands of dollars at every session are appropriated for this purpose. It is of great importance to us that these elections be free and fair, and that no man shall hold a seat upon this floor by fraud or violence. Shall it be said, then, that Congress has no power to aid the civil authorities in the conduct of these elections?

Our Government cannot survive without a Congress, and we should see that members are elected. Those who wish to assemble and cast their votes should be protected in this most sacred right as well as duty. Otherwise, mobs, violence, and insurrections in the several States might prevent the election of a Congress and the functions of the Government cease. A breach of the peace contemplated by this statute is one of such magnitude as would overpower the police; one which could not be put down by local authority. It is then that the civil authorities may call for troops, and under their direction the strong arm of the Government is brought into requisition. But we are told that though troops be within reach, and though their aid be necessary to restore peace and civil authority, yet it must not be done. It is better we perish by violence, better that cities be burned, the ballot-box be overturned, civil authority dethroned, than permit a soldier to command peace.

This was the unwritten law of 1860. Under it rebellion was organized; no power then could be found in the Constitution to coerce a State or send troops into a State to suppress insurrections, and Mr. Buchanan, with his democratic Cabinet, permitted treason to organize. If we have power to create, we have to preserve. If we can determine when and where elections shall be held, we can preserve and guarantee the opportunity.

The question of encroachment upon State authority by the use of troops began as early as 1798. Anticipating war with France, Congress authorized the President to accept the services of volunteer companies in the several States. The authority of Congress to do so was then much criticised. But during the war with Great Britain, which soon followed, laws were freely enacted authorizing the President not only to accept such volunteers, but to commission their officers. And now it is conceded that Congress has the power to exercise control over the armed forces throughout the length and breadth of the country.

In the Constitution we find delegated to Congress:

> To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions.

Says Judge Story, in his Commentary on the Constitution, section 1201:

> The power of regulating the militia and of commanding its service to enforce the laws and to suppress insurrection and repel invasion is a natural incident to the duty of superintending the common defense and preserving the internal peace of the nation.

Again, in the same section:

> There is but one of two alternatives which can be resorted to in case of insurrection, invasion, or violent opposition to the laws—either to employ regular troops or to employ the militia to suppress them. In ordinary cases, indeed, the resistance to the laws may be put down by the posse comitatus or the assistance of the magistracy. But cases may occur in which such a resort would be utterly vain and even mischievous, since it might encourage the factious to more rash measures and prevent the application of a force which would at once destroy the hopes and crush the efforts of the disaffected.
> The general power of the Government to pass all laws necessary and proper to execute its declared power would doubtless authorize laws to call forth the posse comitatus and employ the common magistracy in cases where such measures would suit the emergency. But if the militia could not be called in aid, it would be absolutely indispensable to the common safety to keep up a strong regular force in the time of peace.

The Constitution clearly authorizes the use of troops in the protection of citizens "against domestic violence," when properly called for. It is difficult to draw a distinction between domestic violence and a breach of the peace. They in fact are one and the same. Their existence has the same effect upon the body-politic, especially when used at the polls either may prevent the enforcement of the laws or the holding of an election. Peace and good order are essential to governments; whenever State authority is insufficient to secure these, Federal authority may be invoked and applied. State militia are often without efficient organization or discipline; they are too feeble for the suppression of a maddened populace outnumbering them perhaps ten to one. We are not without recent proof of this. In the riots of 1877 the militia were ineffectual, but wherever United States troops were brought into requisition the effect was most salutary and instantaneous.

If, then, the Army may be used to suppress domestic violence only, may it not be used to keep the peace, especially at the polls, when the Government has a direct interest in the election. Prior to the repeal of the fugitive slave law it was a common occurrence for the marshal to take with him United States troops to preserve the peace in the execution of his writ. The court, too, while returning the slave to bondage was attended by a like force to keep the peace and preserve order. All this could be done to aid the master in securing his slave; but this must not be done, we are told, to preserve peace while an American citizen is casting his vote. It is idle to discuss this subject further. The law up to this time has not been questioned. Precedents are without limit.

It is, however, claimed that the presence of troops at the polls is dangerous to the free exercise of the elective franchise. Both those who seek the repeal of this statute and those who are for its retention are contending for free elections. Free elections are conceded to be necessary if we would obtain a fair expression of the people in the selection of members of Congress. We ask the aid of the military, if necessary, to secure this right, that the elector may be protected from mob violence, armed gangs, and desperadoes. Our opponents claim the presence of soldiers would intimidate and prevent them from voting. A moment's reflection will convince any reasonable mind that no honest man can be or ever was intimidated or restrained from the exercise of a right so apparent as that of voting at an election by the presence of officers or men in the military service of the United States. Such right is too sacred to be disputed by civil or military authority, and no man with an honest purpose could in the least degree be embarrassed by them. Those only who have not, and who visit the polls dreading the law and peace officers, care in the least degree for the military or any other force sufficient only to keep the peace. No instance has ever existed where the soldiery have ever prevented a single voter from the exercise of his right. The complaint is unfounded in fact. It is made to disarm authority and in the interest of those seeking to prevent a free use of the ballot. But certain it is, that although we have upon the statute this law, free elections are not held in all the States of this Union. In the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, Florida, and South Carolina, where complaint of the presence of the troops is most heard, the democratic party have succeeded in carrying the elections and sending men to represent them upon this floor, when there can be no doubt each of those States has a very large republican majority, and had a free and fair election been held in them the present House of Representatives would have been under the control of the republican party.

It is to be regretted that these questions of the rights of States is again to be revived. They have already cost us lives and treasure without limit. The country is again to be agitated from one end to the other. They are to be re-established and enforced at the expense of the National Government, cost what it may. The avenues of the Government are to be blockaded, not by armed forces as before, not by domestic violence, but by revolutionary measures in cutting off the means necessary for the support of the Government.

The people will again rally and deliver their verdict whether this method of securing legislation in violation of the Constitution and the spirit of our Government will be sustained, or whether our Government shall be maintained and preserved as our fathers framed it for us.

If, indeed, we are one nation, under one flag, may we not assert the authority of the nation in every State to so far keep the peace as to permit the election of members to the National Legislature?

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask that the pending amendment be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say that I shall have to vote against this amendment as being unnecessary, entirely unnecessary. The section of the bill as it stands proposes to repeal the words "or to keep the peace at the polls" as they occur in section 2002 of the Revised Statutes. That is simply in reference to using the military at elections where they are not called for by the Legislature or governor of a State. It is proposed by the pending amendment to add a proviso to this repeal that it shall not be construed to interfere with the right of the President, at the call of the States, to send troops to suppress insurrection or repel invasion. I submit that that is wholly unnecessary and useless because section 5297, which remains in full force and is not affected by the repeal, reads as follows:

SEC. 5297. In case of an insurrection in any State, against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, which may be applied for, as he deems sufficient to suppress such insurrection; or, on like application, to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he deems necessary.

This leaves in full force and effect the act of February 28, 1795, and the act of March 3, 1807. The amendment simply proposes to do that. It is useless because it proposes to repeat what is already in the statutes and is not affected by the repeal. I assume, therefore, that it is unnecessary to add to the section such a proviso, which is but a simple re-enactment of the law as it already is. It would be, in the language of Mr. Justice Blackstone, doing a vain thing.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE. I understand the gentleman says this, that notwithstanding these words may be repealed under the act of 1795 and the act of 1807, the President of the United States would have the power, upon the call of the executive or the Legislature, to bring the troops into the State for the reasons indicated in that section.

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman will allow me one moment more.

Mr. REAGAN. My answer to it is that here is the law as I have read it, and it does precisely that thing.

Mr. WHITE. I understand that; that is the law passed in obedience to the Constitution. Now, here is the posse comitatus clause which makes it illegal to take the troops into a State for any purpose except it be expressly authorized by law. Then here is the act of 1865——

Mr. REAGAN. That does not arise under that act.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman does not apprehend my point. There is the act of 1865 which makes it a criminal offense to take troops to the polls, with certain exceptions. Now, if you take away those exceptions, does not the act of 1865, being a subsequent act, qualify and pro tanto, as lawyers say, repeal the power given by the act of 1795 and the act of 1807?

Mr. REAGAN. It does not, for these reasons: the section, as it will be amended, will provide that—

No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States.

Mr. WHITE. Are not these two statutes to be construed together?

Mr. REAGAN. I understand the policy of the gentleman and his party is to mix up the law authorizing an interference at elections by the troops with the law authorizing the suppression of insurrection or the repelling of invasion by the troops. Now, the two things are totally different. This statute which we propose to amend, authorizing that very thing, would stand unrepealed by our action; and so would section 5528 stand unrepealed, and that portion of it would remain in force.

I object to the proposed amendment, not because it is wrong, but because the object sought to be attained is fully and affirmatively in the statutes now, and it is not necessary to re-enact what is now the law.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] if he will allow me, misunderstands me. There is no desire on this side of the House to make a false issue at all. What I say is that this being a subsequent statute to the statutes of 1795 and 1807, they are all to be considered pari materia. I say furthermore as a lawyer, (I only give my opinion,) that if the repeal is made of the clause "to keep the peace at the polls," in the act of 1865, then it will be unlawful for troops to be taken to the polls even if the emergency should arise contemplated by the act of 1795.

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; for the section also provides "unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States."

Mr. WHITE. That is one thing; keeping the peace at the polls is another thing.

Mr. REAGAN. To keep the peace at the polls is interfering with elections, and that is exactly what we want to prevent.

Mr. WHITE. So do we; and by repealing this clause you interfere with the exercise of that power.

Mr. REAGAN. Not at all, for the power is still reserved in section 2002 to do all that Congress contemplated by the laws of 1795 and 1807. Those laws are preserved in full force.

Mr. WHITE. But qualified by this penal statute.

Mr. REAGAN. That is intended only to affect so much of the law as authorizes the improper interference at elections by the Federal authorities.

Mr. WHITE. This says what is improper interference. This says that any person taking armed men to the polls is making an improper use of the troops.

Mr. REAGAN. Do I understand the gentleman to deny that the law, to do all that he says, will remain in full force and unrepealed?

Mr. WHITE. I say that this statute will qualify the law to that extent.

Mr. REAGAN. Qualify what?

Mr. WHITE. Qualify this: an officer who goes there upon the regular call of the governor or of the Legislature may be met by this statute, he will encounter this statute.

Mr. REAGAN. He cannot encounter it, for here are the statutes under which he is to send the troops.

Mr. WHITE. Very well, and this amending section qualifies that statute, and if he goes to the polls under this amending section, he will be subject to prosecution under the act of 1865.

Mr. REAGAN. If he goes there to interfere with the elections, he will be; but if he goes there under the acts of 1795 and 1807 and the subsequent act of 1865, to repel the armed enemies of the United States, he will not be subject to prosecution.

Mr. WHITE. I think with this amendment he could not do so.

Mr. REAGAN. The law says so.

Mr. WHITE. Very well; is not this a subsequent statute, and does not subsequent legislation repeal any former legislation inconsistent with it?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman is a lawyer, and he knows the rules of construction. He knows that a new provision of law so manifestly inconsistent with other provisions that they cannot be construed together is treated as a different law.

Mr. WHITE. Not at all.

Mr. REAGAN. They qualify two different objects, the one authorizing the repelling of armed enemies of the United States, and the other the suppression of hostilities against the authority of the State; and the last will remain in full force after the repeal of the provision authorizing interference at elections.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. My friend from Texas will allow me to make one suggestion. I think this colloquy between my friend from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Texas shows the manifest propriety of the amendment proposed by my friend from Indiana. Here is one side of the House saying that the law as proposed to be changed by our side will interfere with the constitutional power of the President. My friend on the left [Mr. REAGAN] says that it does not so interfere. Both parties are agreed that it ought not to interfere with the President's rights and powers. If this be the agreement and understanding, why not adopt the amendment so as to put the matter beyond all cavil and dispute. It is vain for my friend to say that the law will not admit of that construction, because here are one hundred and twenty-four gentlemen who say that it does. Therefore the proviso is very proper in order to explain the purpose of this legislation.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Virginia is a lawyer; he was a member of the Judiciary Committee in the last Congress. Now, I ask him as a lawyer whether he is willing to put himself on the record as holding that mere idle talk shall control the spirit and meaning of a statute. I ask him whether he will put himself on the record as saying that with this repeal, made without the proviso, the law will not be left in full force authorizing the President, upon the call of any State, to use troops to repel invasion, to suppress insurrection, or, in the language of section 2002, to repel the armed enemies of the United States. The gentleman, I venture to say, will not risk his reputation as a lawyer by affirming that because for partisan effect a false issue is sought to be forced upon us, and we are asked to do a vain and foolish thing, we should do this vain and foolish thing.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I agree with my friend from Texas that the amendment proposed by our side of the House does not interfere with the powers of the President as provided in the Constitution; but the other side of the House say that it does.

Mr. REAGAN. Of course they say so.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. And to that extent there is a conflict of opinion. Whatever my opinion as a lawyer may be I know that it is an every-day practice in legislative bodies to exclude certain constructions to which a statute about to be passed might otherwise be considered liable; it is customary to add a concluding clause, saying "this statute shall not be construed to do thus and so." There may be doubt about the construction of our enactment; and, though lawyers on our side may think the construction perfectly clear, there is no impropriety, but on the contrary it is in accordance with the every-day practice of legislative bodies, for us to add a clause declaring that this legislation shall not be construed to mean thus and so, thus putting our intention beyond cavil. I am always willing to say in so many words what I do mean rather than have any doubt about it.

Mr. REAGAN. Do I understand the gentleman from Virginia (and I beg him to answer this question to the House) as saying that the repeal of a law authorizing the interference of the military force of the United States at elections, without any call by a State, is the same subject as authorizing the President to furnish the aid of the military forces of the United States, on the call of the States, to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, or resist the armed enemies of the United States? Are they the same subject?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. They are legislation in the same line. I go further and say that this Congress has no power to pass any law to interfere with the constitutional power of the President—a power which he derives from higher authority than the legislative department of the Government. Even if we were disposed to do so, we cannot pass any law infringing upon the powers with which the President is clothed by the Constitution.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman will allow me to express astonishment that a lawyer and a member of the Judiciary Committee of the last Congress should assume that the President has the power to act in this matter under the Constitution without reference to the statutes of 1795 and 1807.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Those statutes are merely designed to carry out the provisions of the Constitution. They provide the mode and manner of doing so.

Mr. CASWELL. Before the gentleman from Texas takes his seat will he allow me to call his attention to a clause of the repealing act which I think has escaped his notice? It certainly amounts to a prohibition:

> Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years.

Now this provision amounts to a new and positive prohibition to have present at the polls any part of the Army of the United States, and thus conflicts with the statute as it would remain on the statute-book. I conceive that there would be force in the gentleman's point were it not for the penal clause I have just read, which amounts to a clear and positive prohibition.

Mr. REAGAN. I take it that there is no difficulty in the construction of this statute in connection with section 5297. I believe that the one has reference to the introduction of troops at the polls upon the mere discretion of the President or the military authorities and that the other has reference to the use of troops by the President, upon the call of any State, to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or resist the armed enemies of the United States. Believing this, I cannot but think the proposed amendment unnecessary.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information? I represent a State on the northern border. Suppose that, as happened within the last few years, we had a Fenian invasion. What is it the duty of the President of the United States to do with the troops, with that invasion of the Fenians gathered on the American side on an election day, while they are in arms and ready to cross into Canada?

Mr. REAGAN. In that case, under section 2002 the President of the United States has the right to use the armed forces of the United States, under the provisions of the law of 1795 and the law of 1807, to control and suppress such an invasion. That is one thing. But the control of troops, the sending of troops to control an election in a State without the request of the State, is another and totally different thing.

Mr. NEWBERRY. But in that case he would have to march the troops by the polls and through the polls——

Mr. REAGAN. Let him do it.

Mr. NEWBERRY. And violate the law, and every officer in command of those troops would be liable to be fined $5,000 and imprisoned.

Mr. REAGAN. The President would not move the troops there to interfere with the elections, but for the performance of a duty contemplated by the Constitution and authorized by law.

Mr. NEWBERRY. And you say by this provision if you strike out those words that that is a crime.

Mr. REAGAN. I cannot help the gentleman's reasoning. I have stated my position.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to make a satisfactory speech in the limited time that can be afforded me now. I have not sought the floor for that purpose heretofore, and should not do so now except for the desire I have to meet one single point that has been presented on the other side in this discussion. It is admitted by the whole House, certainly by every constitutional lawyer who is a member of it, that this House, in connection with the other branch of Congress, the Senate, have the undoubted constitutional power to pass just the kind of law that we are now proposing to pass; and I understand that the gentlemen of the opposition admit that we have the power to pass it according to the mode and in the manner we are proposing to pass it. But, by way of objection, it is insisted that by appending this sixth section, as what is denominated new legislation, upon an appropriation bill, the executive department of the Government is to be coerced, and that such action is revolutionary.

It has been stated on this floor, I think by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and notably and certainly by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that the President of the United States has legislative power. Now, sir, I deny that. Under the Constitution, as I understand it, "all legislative power belongs to and is confided to Congress" while "executive power only is confided to the President of the United States." The one shall make laws, the other executes laws. When Congress, therefore, by its legislative power matures and perfects a law, as to its provisions and so far as everything pertaining to the making of the law is concerned it is ended. But under the Constitution it is required to be transmitted to the President of the United States. And when he receives it he has the power to do one of three things with it: first, he can indorse it with an approval and it immediately becomes effective to be executed according to its terms without conditions, detention, or arrest; but his signature does not make it a law; secondly, he can put it aside, "pigeon-hole" it, do nothing with it, and after a detention of ten days it is a law all the same as if it had a thousand signatures of the President; and, thirdly, he can arrest legislation by objection and veto.

Now, I think I have stated clearly and fairly all the power the President of the United States has in the premises. He can arrest legislation, and in arresting it can present his objection to the Congress in the shape of a veto to the bill or law thus arrested. This power the President unquestionably has; but it is the power to arrest, and not the power to make laws. Now, sir, this done, and its laws thus arrested, Congress has the undoubted power and right to do one of two things. First, it can let the law alone and say to his Excellency, "We have made the law and transmitted it to you; you have chosen not to give it force and effect, either by your positive approval or silence, but on the contrary you have chosen to arrest it; therefore, we will let it alone." Or, secondly, we may take that law, and by a vote as fixed by the Constitution, make it just as effective as if it had received the signature and positive approval of the President.

I deny, therefore, that the President has any legislative power. He has the power to arrest; only the power to arrest. Now let us take the case before us. It is insisted that the President is attempted to be coerced by the proposed legislation and that this action is revolutionary. Now, sir, we pass a law. All appropriations of money from the Treasury must be made by law. We pass this law appropriating nearly $27,000,000. In that law we make provision that the Army, for which the appropriation is made, shall not be used "to keep the peace at the polls" in the various precincts and polling places throughout the United States. And by the expunging of those seven or eight monosyllabic words this whole question is covered. The President chooses, if you please, to arrest it. He says, "I arrest this law and return it to the Congress with my objection." What do we do? I do not know what gentlemen generally will do; but my idea in this particular case would be to say to the President, "Very well, sir; if you do not need this law, why should we want it? We certainly have the constitutional power to let it alone, and, Mr. President, as you have chosen to arrest it by your positive act of objection or veto, all right; now just let the subject drop." But then he will say, "But, gentlemen, that will not do; this law must be passed; I must have this law." "Well, then," we answer, "why did you not take it, sir, and make it effective after we had passed it and presented it to you?" "Because," he says, "it had some provision in it that was objectionable to me." "Well, sir, what do you propose to do?" "Why, I propose that you shall pass a law unobjectionable to me; in other words, you shall pass the kind of law that I want you to pass."

Sir, I state this probable colloquy fairly; and I ask gentlemen to consider it.

Where in this case is the coercion and who is the coerced party? If the President has the power to prescribe the character of legislation that we shall make, I ask if it is not coercion upon us; and if such action on his part with respect to a law (which he says he must have) is not a coercion upon Congress rather than an attempt by Congress to coerce him? If we have to approach His Excellency cap in hand and say, "Mr. President, please write out such a law as you desire, and send it to us, and we will register, record, and make effective your sovereign will," I ask if that is the free act and free consent of the Congress? And yet it is the humiliating as well as logical deduction to be drawn from the premises assumed by our republican friends on the other side. Now, sir, I am done with that subject. These are the views that I entertain in relation to it, and having no further time to elaborate it I pass to the consideration as briefly as I may of another topic.

In this whole matter I have been unable to see wherein the people's Representatives in this House, voicing the thought and the will of the sovereign people of the country, echoed by the voice of the other branch of Congress representing the sovereign States of the Union, have made any attempt or manifested any desire to coerce the President of the United States in the exercise of his constitutional prerogatives. But I do think, and here in my place declare, that in my opinion such attempts have been made to coerce him; but that they have been made by the stalwart members of the party that, having failed at the polls to elect him, by fraud and partisan trickery procured his inauguration. I will now proceed to show wherein and by what means this coercion is attempted, and will now read from the most prominent republican paper in the Northwest, the Chicago Inter-Ocean, to show it.

Mr. DUNNELL. As I understood the order of the House yesterday the debate closes at this time.

Mr. SPARKS. No, sir; it closes at half past twelve. I read from the Chicago Inter-Ocean of March 29, and I commend the article especially to gentlemen on the other side:

[Special telegram to the Inter-Ocean.]

A BRAVE STAND—THE ACTION OF THE REPUBLICAN CAUCUS.

NEW YORK, March 27.—Speaking of the republican caucus the Tribune says: "The republican party has thus taken a brave stand. The decision of its representatives in Congress will be approved by honest sentiment throughout the Union. They are inflexibly opposed to breaking down the safeguards of elections. In this patriotic course the republican members of Congress should have the moral support of every member of the republican party, in or out of office, and, above all, of every member of the republican administration. We have good reason to believe that the President is heart and soul with his party in this contest, and that nearly or quite all of his Cabinet stand with him. If any member of the Cabinet, or any person in any way authorized to speak for the Administration, or any republican office-holder arrays himself in hostile attitude, it must be distinctly understood he does so on his own responsibility, and at his own cost. He casts his lot with the democracy and will go down with a democratic defeat. The republican party is united, and there must be no compromise with the enemy."

Then, following that, in the same paper and of the same date, I find this article:

[Special telegram to the Inter-Ocean.]

THE PRESIDENT'S BACKBONE—THE RESOLUTIONS OF THE ELEVENTH WARD REPUBLICAN CLUB OF CHICAGO.

WASHINGTON, March 28.—Congressman DAVIS has received a copy of the resolutions passed by the Eleventh Ward Republican Club on the 24th of March, in which the club directs him "to convey to the President in the most emphatic terms that the day of compromise has passed, and if he yields in any degree to the demands of democracy he will be no longer recognized as a republican President." DAVIS called upon the President this morning and presented him with a copy of the resolutions. The President thanked him, but was not very much pleased at the idea that his republicanism was even susceptible of a doubt. He assured Colonel DAVIS that he was not disposed to compromise in any shape and would stand firmly with the republicans.

Now, I ask gentlemen on the other side, is that so? Is he already pledged to do your bidding?

Mr. WHITE. Is not that a good article?

Mr. SPARKS. Splendid!

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. SPARKS. Not now. Let me read on:

Davis, upon returning from the White House, sent the following dispatch to the eleventh ward club:

"Resolutions received. President waited upon as requested. No reason to believe he will disappoint the loyal people of the country. For myself, can but say that I am enlisted for the war."

Mr. WHITE. Good.

Mr. SPARKS. And this follows:

Expressions of this sort are coming to the President from republicans in all parts of the country, and they have been effective in strengthening the President's backbone.

[Laughter.]

So that it seems the President of the United States has had some sort of political spinal disease that it becomes necessary for the stalwart republican doctors of his party to cure. [Laughter.] Now, sir, I ask any fair-minded man to read these articles published in the great metropolitan journal of that party in the Northwest, and tell me if the conclusion is not inevitable that an attempted effort is there publicly and boldly made to whip in and coerce the President into the extreme measures of the extreme members of his party. Talk about coercion! There is your coercion! [Applause.]

It was feared that he did not have backbone enough; that he was a little limber in the back. Ward meetings are called, resolutions adopted, party machinery is invoked, and leading political managers are enlisted to send him communications and tell him that "there must be no compromise with the democracy;" that "he must stand firm." And they further threaten him that "if he does not on this occasion stand firm, he will be subject to the ostracism of his party," &c. There, sir, is where the coercion comes in, and not through the action of Congress attempting to pass constitutional laws in an orderly and ordinary constitutional manner.

Mind you, sir, this does not come from New Orleans; this does not come from New York; this does not come from any city where there is supposed to be any strong democratic sentiment. It comes from the hitherto supposed stronghold of the republican party, from the stalwarts of Chicago. They assert and assure him that they are aroused and united upon this question, and that their party friends in Congress are right in their opposition to the passage of this law. They in effect say to the President, We have three republican members in Congress from our great republican city, and they can indicate to you what the stalwart members of the party at Chicago want.

Now, having made this bold, broad issue, and having made it on the questions involved in the bill now pending before us, they have gone to the sovereign people of that great city upon it, and that sovereign people thus appealed to, at their municipal election on the 1st instant, have given expression to their sovereign will and recorded their verdict. And now what is that verdict?

I will read you what this same paper of the 2d instant (the day after election) says of the result; and I ask gentlemen to mark it closely. This is its whining, humiliating announcement:

Victory for the democrats and howling rebels.

[Laughter.]

They made the issue; they said to the President of the United States, "Ours is the stronghold of the party; we have no democratic Representative in the popular branch of Congress from our city; all our Representatives in that body are stalwart republicans; there are three of them, and their post-office address is Chicago." The election comes off and this bold issue is made, and after election comes the last scene, and the curtain drops with the announcement, "Victory for the democrats and howling rebels." [Laughter.]

Then just below it, in a tabulated statement in the same paper and as a final wind-up, I find these words and figures:

For Mayor—Wright, (republican,) 19,143; Harrison, (democrat,)—

Our Carter, [laughter]—

Harrison, (democrat,) 23,966; democratic majority, 4,823.

That, sir, was in Chicago. [Laughter and applause on the democratic side.]

This, stalwart republicans, I beg to remind you, was in Chicago, on your own issue. This was in your own stronghold, where you felt yourselves strong enough to stiffen the backbone of His Excellency, the President, on this question. [Laughter and applause.] But it seems, sir, from the result thus indicated that these stalwarts, in place of putting any stiffness into the backbone of the President, got all marrow and starch and stiffness taken out of their own. [Great laughter and applause on the democratic side.]

Now, gentlemen, here is our issue, and, Mr. Chairman, we go to the country upon it. The issue, stripped of all useless verbiage and tawdry fustian, is, whether or not in this country, in this free country of ours, in this grand Republic, whose source of political power is the sovereign will of the people, armed soldiers, the paid servants of that sovereign people, are to come between them and the ballot-box to control or drive them from the polls. [Applause.]

This is our issue made to the country. We have had on it the first popular response from a great republican city and it is startling in its character. Gentlemen, you have insisted upon making this issue; we cordially accept it and go to the country upon it, and we mean to stand upon it. We know that that sovereign people who stand behind us and stand behind you as well, and to whom Presidents and Cabinets and governors and all who exercise official functions must yield obedience, cannot sanction your mad folly and despotic zeal in exalting the military into a supremacy over the civil authority, and knowing that, we confidently appeal to them as sovereign arbiters between us. [Applause.]

Mr. CASWELL. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois how it was in the State of Wisconsin on the same day which gave a republican majority of twelve thousand, being an increased majority?

Mr. BRAGG. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] will allow me, I will reply to the question of my colleague.

Mr. SPARKS. I have been talking of the republican city of Chicago, that grand metropolis of my own beloved State, which of itself contains a population larger than that possessed by many of the States of the Union, and I have not got down to anything so small as the little towns in Wisconsin. I will yield, however, to my friend from Wisconsin, [General BRAGG,] who is perfectly able to tell his colleague [Mr. CASWELL] all about Wisconsin and its elections. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRAGG. I wish to respond, Mr. Chairman, to the question propounded to the gentleman from Illinois by my colleague.

Mr. CASWELL. Does the gentleman from Illinois deny that the "greenbackers" helped to carry the election in the city of Chicago?

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to reply to the inquiry of my colleague from Wisconsin. The judge of the supreme court of Wisconsin, who is announced to have been elected by from ten to twelve thousand majority, was not the nominee of the republican party, and every republican newspaper in the State discarded the idea there should be any politics in the election, and the members of the bar belonging to the democratic party from one end of the State to the other supported him. [Laughter and applause on the democratic side of the House.]

Mr. CASWELL. Will my friend allow me——

Mr. BRAGG. Now, having answered that question, I should like to propound to the gentleman another. Why is it that he and his colleagues upon the other side of the Chamber, from my State, are sustaining the right to maintain troops at the polls, when in republican Wisconsin, where the people are free and uncorrupted by the air of a republican congressional caucus, they have a statute upon the statute-book which prohibts even the militia to be called out, to be organized, or even to be reviewed for two days prior to the holding of any election, under the punishment of a fine of $500. [Great applause and laughter on the democratic side.]

Mr. CASWELL. I trust my colleague, before he resumes his seat, will let me ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired and the Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. CASWELL. I wish to ask my colleague whether it is not true that while the judge who was elected was not nominated by a party caucus, will he deny that his opponent was the choice of the democratic caucus in the Legislature of that State?

Mr. BRAGG. Ah! [Laughter.]

Mr. CASWELL. And that the issue was made squarely between the republicans and democrats. And while I am on the floor let me ask him what was the trouble in the city of Milwaukee?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I believe I am entitled to the floor, Mr. Chairman, and I insist on my right. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BRAGG. I will answer the gentleman. Did not the man whom he claims the republicans elected judge of the supreme court vote for Tilden in 1876, and denounce in unmeasured terms the fraud by which the White House was filled with the present occupant? [Great laughter and applause on the democratic side.]

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Am I not entitled to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to the floor and the Chair has recognized him, and he will proceed.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, except only their individual fireside, there is nothing on earth so precious to the American citizen as the sanctity of the ballot-box. Now, I ask in all seriousness, what have we heard in this great debate from the democratic side of the House for the practical security of the ballot-box? We have had lectures from the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] on the "licentious," "debauched," "despotic republican party," to which he himself owes his right to live to-day under the American flag. We have had other speeches lashing to fury sectional politics. We have had three speeches salted with excellent sentiments on sectional issues by gentlemen who each and all have predicted as the winning party in 1880 that party which without blushing and upon this floor before the American people and before the world proposes to usher in the great millennium of American industry and uprightness by paying the entire national bonded debt in irredeemable legal-tender greenbacks. [Laughter and applause.] We have had an interesting picture drawn by the artist from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] of the Secretary of State present here "intimidating" the republican party on this side of the House while the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] addressed the House last Saturday. I wish to say here in parenthesis to the gentleman from Kentucky that I had the honor to sit by the side of Mr. Evarts while the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was delivering his speech. [Laughter.] I will testify that the Secretary of State was in his normal condition. [Laughter and applause.] He was as thin as ever. [Laughter.] His pockets were not stuffed. He had no shot-gun near him. I will tell the gentleman from Kentucky he had no revolver; he had no knife. [Laughter.] He had no stick. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman from Kentucky may be reassured, he especially need not fear Mr. Evarts. [Laughter and applause.]

We have had from the eloquent gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] a maxim uttered to which every one of us subscribes. He believes in "a minimum of power and a maximum of liberty." So does everybody. But what does he mean by "a minimum" of power? How much power? Shall there be enough to govern? That is the question that the American people ask this gentleman, this eloquent and patriotic gentleman from Virginia, to answer. That is the question they put to all of these democratic gentlemen who ignore it persistently to generalize and split hairs about the meaning of the Constitution. How much power does it require, for example, to secure a free and honest ballot-box in the district from which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] comes? How much and what power does it take to secure an honest ballot-box in Virginia? How much power to secure a "free ballot-box" in Kentucky? How much in New York? I leave each of the gentlemen to answer the question in respect to their respective States. I hold in my hand, Mr. Chairman, something that tells the story about New York. It relates to the state of things which existed there before the laws of 1869, 1870, 1871, and 1872 were enacted. You propose to-day to deny Federal authority the power "to keep the peace at the polls," and on Monday or next week you propose to repeal twenty sections of law which were enacted with great painstaking and great study at the time, under circumstances differing from the present, but enacted in good faith. You propose to repeal them pêle mêle. You propose no substitute whatever. By your blind partisan action I, as a citizen of New York, and those I have the honor to represent, shall be in future disfranchised to a certain extent; for when you repeal laws necessary "to keep the peace at the polls" you disfranchise not only the weak and ignorant and all who have no helper in every part of this country, but in all large cities at the North. You disfranchise a large class of tax-payers who have not the courage to meet a mob of desperadoes and blacklegs at the polls.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I beg to have read certain parts of this paper which I hold in my hand, which is a letter from the last democratic candidate for the Presidency, now dead, to the present democratic candidate for the Presidency, who still lives. I make the whole letter a part of my speech, asking every member of this House, without regard to party, when they find it in the RECORD, to read it. It is ten years old, but the truth of it is perennial, a living force underlying the safety of our free institutions, which will only endure while honesty is respected and the sanctity of the ballot-box made secure.

The Clerk read as follows:

SIR: You and I are growing old. We came here young men from the country, and have lived and struggled side by side for nearly forty years. We have participated ardently in many political struggles, always on different sides. You were the pupil of Van Buren and Silas Wright; I, a disciple and follower of Henry Clay. But this I will say for you, that I am confident you have never sought to enrich yourself by politics, or at the expense of the public—that whatever of wealth you may have acquired or enjoyed was earned in your profession as a lawyer—and that your instincts and your influences, partisanship apart, have generally been felt on the side of economy in public expenditure and uprightness in the conduct of public affairs. Of my course in these respects you are welcome to say whatever you think true.

On one very important point, however, your bitterness as a partisan has impelled you to ignore and come short of your duty as a citizen and a professed upholder of Government by the people; and for this dereliction I here arraign you. I allude to the preservation of the purity of the ballot-box.

You and I grew up in the country, and are familiar with elections as there conducted. We both know that, except in a few districts where the voters are all on one side, it is morally impossible that any considerable proportion of fraudulent votes should there be polled. For those who attend a poll are nearly all well known to each other, and hardly ever is one entitled to vote who is not known to be so to men of each party. If one should offer a vote who is not so known, he is challenged and questioned of course, and his answers will convict him if a bogus voter. I do not believe that the illegal vote in the rural districts was ever 1 per cent. of the whole number polled, even when there was no registration of legal voters.

How different is the case in cities, and especially in this Babel, you very well know. Long as you have lived on Gramercy Park, and eminent in social position and fortune as are the inhabitants of that favored locality, you could not tell within twenty which of the residents in sight of your front door are and which are not entitled to vote; you could not make a list of the legal voters residing on that square which would even approach accuracy. How it must be, then, with the nomadic denizens of our "back slums" and of our great tenement houses—how utterly impossible it is that any one should know which among them are and which are not legal voters, and whether the man who offers to vote at 11 a. m. at one poll has not already voted several times at different polls, and whether he is or is not on his way to vote still oftener at other polls, you cannot help knowing if you would. I can imagine how a man may shut his eyes to many things which he deems it convenient not to know, but I speak of what you must know, however you may wish or seek to be ignorant of it.

The matter to which I call your attention is vital to the very existence of free popular government. Whenever it shall be generally understood that the results of the elections are not determined by the ballots of legal voters, but by frauds in voting or frauds in counting, then the advent of avowed, unequivocal despotism must be near at hand. Between the rule of an emperor and the rule of a clique of ballot-box stuffers, every intelligent man must prefer the former as less rapacious and more responsible. When honest citizens shall avoid the polls, asking "What is the use of voting? the result is already fixed," the days of the Republic will be numbered. Between a ruler who prohibits voting altogether and the gang who make it a sham by filling the ballot-boxes with illegal votes, or miscounting those actually cast, the sway of the former is every way preferable.

Mr. Tilden, I have been voting here for thirty-seven years, and an active politician for more than thirty of them, and I appeal to God for my sincerity and to my public record for a witness that in all those years I have earnestly sought and labored to have our elections decided by legal votes and none other. Seeing how great are the temptations and the facilities, under a right of suffrage so general as ours, to poll illegal votes, I have openly and actively favored every effort to shut them out and keep the suffrage pure and legal. That every legal voter should have a full and fair opportunity to vote once at each election; that no one should be enabled to vote more than once, and that none but legal voters should be allowed or empowered to vote at all; such has been my constant aim. I have not confined myself to barren professions, but have shown my faith by my works.

How is it with you? You hold a most responsible and influential position in the councils of a great party. You could make that party content itself with polling legal votes, if you only would. In our late constitutional convention I tried to erect some fresh barrier against election frauds; did you? The very little that I was enabled to effect in this direction, I shall try to have ratified by the people at our ensuing election. Will you?

Mr. Tilden, you cannot escape responsibility by saying, with the guilty Macbeth—

"Thou canst not say I did it; never shake Those gory locks at me!"

for you were at least a passive accomplice in the giant frauds of last November. Your name was used, without public protest on your part, in circulars sowed broadcast over the State, whereof the manifest intent was to "make assurance doubly sure" that the frauds here perpetrated should not be overborne by the honest vote of the rural district. And you, not merely by silence, but by positive assumption, have covered those frauds with the mantle of your respectability. On the principle that "the receiver is as bad as the thief," you are as deeply implicated in them to-day as though your name were Tweed, O'Brien, or Oakey Hall.

Mr. Tilden, you and I were ardent participants in the struggle of 1840, wherein Martin Van Buren was ousted from the Presidency by General Harrison. You know how thoroughly our city was absorbed in that contest, wherein every man, woman, and child took a deep and lively interest. Our elections were then held throughout three days; there was a registration freshly enacted which blacklegs had not yet learned to circumvent; the right of suffrage was as widely diffused as it now is; no one ever complained that a single legal voter was unable then to poll his vote. And, though our city has since largely increased its population, the lower wards were quite as populous then as they are to-day—several of them more so. They were full of boarding-houses crowded with clerks and mechanics. Many of these covered sites since given up to great warehouses and manufactories; their denizens have moved up-town, over to Brooklyn, or out on some of the railroads that lead out into the open country. Practically, the lower wards are being given up to commerce, and no longer shelter by night the multitudes who throng their streets by day.

Now look at the vote of four of these wards in 1840 and 1868, respectively:

Wards.	President, 1840.		Governor, 1868.
	Harrison.	Van Buren.	Griswold.	Hoffman.
Fourth ward	1,138	1,177	480	3,820
Sixth ward	806	1,223	369	5,032
Seventh ward	1,707	1,728	1,265	6,895
Fourteenth ward	1,142	1,393	726	4,526
Four wards	4,793	5,521	2,840	20,283

Van Buren's majority, 728; Hoffman's majority, 17,443.

Mr. Tilden, you know what this contrast attests. Right well do you comprehend the means whereby the vote of 1868 was thus swelled out of all proportions. There are not twelve thousand legal voters living in those wards to-day, though they gave Hoffman 17,443 majority. Had the day been of average length, it would doubtless have been swelled to at least twenty thousand. There was nothing but time needed to make it one hundred thousand, if so many had been wanted and paid for.

Now, Mr. Tilden, I call on you to put a stop to this business. You have but to walk into the sheriff's, the mayor's, and the supervisor's offices in the City Hall Park, and say there must be no more of it—say it so there shall be no doubt that you mean it—and we shall have a tolerably fair election once more. Probably a good part of the fifty thousand supplied last fall with bogus naturalization certificates will offer to register and to vote—some of them pretending not to know that they are no more citizens of the United States than the King of Dahomey is—but very few will vote repeatedly unless paid for it; and we shall not be cheated more than ten thousand if you simply tell the boss workmen that there must be no illegal voting instigated and paid for.

Will you do it? Your reputation is at stake. The cowardly craft which "Would not play false,

And yet would wrongly win," will not avail. If we republicans are swindled as we were swindled last fall, you, and such as you, will be responsible to God and man for the outrage. Prosecutors, magistrates, municipal authorities, are all in the pool; we have nothing to hope from the ministers of justice, and the villains have no fear of the terrors of the law. I appeal to you, and anxiously await the result.

Yours,

HORACE GREELEY.

NEW YORK October 20, 1869.
To SAMUEL J. TILDEN, Chairman Democratic State Committee.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at one minute before twelve o'clock a. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ATKINS: Papers relating to the war claims of W. C. McHaney, James M. McRea, Isaiah Sweat, and John W. Willett—to the Committee on War Claims, when appointed.

Parker, George R. Redford, Hennie F. Revell, Lewallen Rhodes, Nancy Seawright, Mary L. Shields, Reeder B. Sheppard, Edward Stack, John T. Stratton, Joseph Tagg, Robert Talley, Mrs. Elizabeth Toof, Mrs. Martha Trigg, Edward J. Tucker, James Tucker, Thomas H. Webb, James G. Williams, William A. Williamson, John W. Wooley, and James R. Wray—to the Committee on War Claims, when appointed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 5, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. VALENTINE. I ask unanimous consent that the privileges of the floor be extended to Hon. C. B. Matthews, speaker of the house of representatives of Nebraska, during his stay in the city for the next three days.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to proceed with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. LOWE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the sixth section of the bill under consideration with instruction to the chairman of the committee to report, on the rising of the committee, that section as a separate bill for the present action of the House.

This motion, Mr. Chairman, needs no explanation. The object to be gained is apparent to the committee and will commend itself, I think, to the good temper and good sense of the country. No member of this body is more opposed than I am in theory and practice to the use of the Army at elections. It cannot be defended in this country upon either policy or principle. We prefer the tumults of a free people to the "order" which results from military domination. But I do not understand that question to be the real issue before the committee. It is not a question whether the objectionable legislation, which permits the political use of the Army shall be repealed, but whether the repeal shall be put as a rider upon an appropriation bill, or be passed as a distinct and independent measure.

In my opinion, it is unnecessary and inexpedient, under the free forms of our Constitution, to attach any foreign or extraneous matter to a measure which is essential to the support of the Government. Such practices have not been attempted in England for more than a hundred years, and have never been resorted to in this country, except for factious and partisan purposes. There is the highest democratic authority for saying that the genius, if not the letter of the Constitution, is against it. The practice of the republican party on this subject cannot commend itself to me or to the majority of the committee. Such practices are warnings, not precedents. How can we imitate what we have always condemned? You may not "wrest the law to your authority." If in order "to do a great right you do a little wrong,"

> 'Twill be recorded for a precedent;
> And many an error, by the same example,
> Will rush into the state.

It is a sign of evil for the country when the partisanship of one side finds its sanction in the partisanship of the other, when the bourbonism of the South seeks excuse in the radicalism of the North. It recalls that period in the history of a dead republic when Cæsar had a party and Pompey a party but Rome had none!

I am well aware, Mr. Chairman, that at this time this motion will probably not prevail. I know the power of the caucus. I appreciate the force of party discipline. But I would invoke, if possible, on our part, a more national and patriotic disposition. In view of the bitter and unnecessary debate which for many days has agitated both sides of this House, I had hoped, Mr. Chairman, even against hope, that crimination and recrimination might end here, and that the country might be spared a further infliction. In the wide range of this discussion every phase of sentimental politics, every subject of past and present party difference, every old grudge of the sections, and every new grievance of the races, have been flung into the muddy currents of this debate. I am sure the better sense of the country is not satisfied with it, with the evidence it affords of the character and capacity of our leadership. The Army is on a distant frontier. Peace prevails throughout the country. The war is over everywhere except in Congress. (Laughter and applause.)

But, Mr. Chairman, if the pending motion shall happily prevail the country will be relieved from an extension of this dispute into the next election, and the public business which called us here, and which presently demands our attention, can be conducted to a speedy and satisfactory conclusion. If a bare majority of this committee shall prefer the business interests of the community to the demands of party, the necessary appropriation bills can no doubt be passed at once, and the political legislation, which assumes such undue magnitude in this debate, can be safely proposed on its own merits in separate and independent bills. I say this much, Mr. Chairman, with great deference to the yet unexpressed judgment of the House. I do not believe, as was intimated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in opening this debate, that there is any danger to be apprehended from factious or revolutionary proceedings by the majority in this body. I do not believe there is any alternative purpose to "coerce the Executive or to stop the Government." If the President, in the exercise of his constitutional power, shall veto this bill or any section thereof, I believe the majority in this House, in the absence of the constitutional two-thirds, will acquiesce in the result and recognize, as the democratic party has always recognized, the prerogative of an independent and co-ordinate branch of the Government. The lines dividing the departments are as necessary and sacred as the limitations of the Government itself. In fact they amount to the same thing, and I infer there is no disposition to break them down.

But, Mr. Chairman, while there is no danger of starving the Government there is danger of starving the people. In the failure of financial relief at this session, we may reasonably apprehend the greatest distress to the business and labor interests of the country. In my opinion that matter should engage the first attention of this House. The question of finance and currency, debt and taxes, rises in practical importance far above the political issues which have monopolized our time from the beginning of this session. Those who favor financial relief have tried, and tried in vain, to engage for a single moment the attention of the House. If the leaders of the two great parties here shall continue to agitate sentimental politics and persist in ignoring this question, I hope and believe that the people throughout the country, without regard to party, will hold them to a joint accountability for it. The representatives of the syndicate and the stock exchange, and all in either party, who shall act with them, must assume the responsibility for the failure of remedial legislation at this session, and for the consequent distress which now prevails, and which will continue to prevail throughout the country.

Mr. Chairman, before I take my seat, I desire to refer briefly to what the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] said on this subject in his remarks on yesterday. Without provocation and, I beg to say, without pertinence, he turned aside from the question before the committee and decorated the greenback party with the chaplet of his censure. He declared they were the "rag-tag and bobtail" of the country, the "scurf and scum of the great cities," "inflationists," and "repudiators," unworthy of political association with the respectability of the democratic, much less of the republican party. Mr. Chairman, he searched the Scriptures to compare us to the men who followed David to the cave of Adullam. He sneeringly dubbed us Adullamites. The gentleman, Mr. Chairman, was, perhaps, unfortunate in that allusion. The good book tells us, if I remember it correctly, that when David departed to that famous cave his brethren and the faithful members of his household joined him, and every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented and oppressed, gathered themselves unto David; and he divided them into tens and into hundreds, and he led them to victory, for the Lord was with David. And I tell the gentleman it will be so again. If the ruinous policy of his party is to continue, our modern political Adullam will be crowded with such recruits between now and 1880, and the Lord will raise up another David to lead an oppressed and outraged people to victory. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there never was a great original idea in politics or morals that found its first lodgment among the wealthy and so-called respectable classes of society. Its first friends and its last friends have always been from among the people—the common people. When the despised Nazarene brought a new and higher code of ethics into the world, it was not the chief priests, the scribes, and pharisees that received it; it was not the syndicate and the stock exchange; it was not the money-changers whom He "scourged out of the temple," but it was the "common people that received it gladly." Mr. Chairman, this is peculiarly the country of the common people, and this Government is, and must remain, the Government of the common people. No plutocracy of the privileged classes will ever be permitted to rule or to ruin it. [Applause.]

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that if the riders on this and the other bills are embodied in separate measures, every greenbacker in the House will vote for them; but if the present motion to strike out, fails in the committee, I shall ask a separate vote on it in the House.

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, and when five minutes had expired, Mr. KELLEY obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. LOWE, who then concluded his remarks as given above.]

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Chairman, before this discussion closes I feel under some obligation to answer myself an inquiry I put to the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] when he was addressing this committee the other day. In common, I think with every man on this side of the House who has expressed his opinion, I believe that the provision of law which we are about to repeal is unconstitutional; that is to say, that it is unconstitutional for the United States to "keep the peace" anywhere in the States, either at the polls or elsewhere; and if it were constitutional I believe in common with gentlemen on this side of the House that it would be highly inexpedient to exercise that power. Hence, so far as the pending provision of this bill is concerned, I could with good conscience vote for it either on or off an appropriation bill, knowing right well that whether it be passed as a separate measure or as a part of the pending appropriation bill is a matter entirely within the pleasure and discretion of this House, which, by the Constitution, has the right to make its own rules of procedure. As the minor is included within the major, if we can make rules we certainly can construe them; and through a long line of precedents we have construed the rules precisely as we construe them in this particular case. Upon the form, therefore, as well as upon the substance, this is a most righteous bill which we are about to enact.

The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] in rising to address the committee, announced that he proposed to treat the subject as a lawyer. He introduced his remarks by saying that he intended to confine himself to the legal view of the case. Hence the inquiry which I put to him was very proper—whether he could refer to any decision of the courts in this country which justified the United States in "keeping the peace." His answer to me was that he knew of no such decision; but, proceeding with his argument, he endeavored to deduce the right of "keeping the peace" from the well-acknowledged right to sustain the marshal in the execution of his process. Yet, Mr. Chairman, from the foundation of the Government to the present day the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States abound in decisions to the effect that the Government of the United States has no criminal jurisdiction within a State; that the United States cannot "keep the peace" within a State. The statutes of the United States may be violated, and the Government of the United States may punish the citizen who violates them; but it is expressly laid down in the decisions of the courts that this Government has no criminal jurisdiction within the States and cannot "keep the peace." The very latest decision on this point, and one which perhaps the gentleman held in his hand when he made his speech—the opinion delivered by Chief-Justice Waite in the case of The United States vs. Cruikshank—declares expressly that the life and liberty of the citizen are under the ægis of the State government.

Mr. ROBESON. The gentleman will allow me to ask him whether that decision of the Supreme Court goes further than to affirm that the State government is the protector of those rights which belonged to citizens as men before the Constitution was made—what are called their inalienable rights—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and does that decision go to the extent of saying that the peace of the United States shall not be protected by the power of the United States?

Mr. McLANE. The opinion of Chief-Justice Waite in the case of Cruikshank, which I hold in my hand, says expressly that there may be two sovereign jurisdictions at the same time; that the citizen may violate the law of the United States and the law of the State, and be punished by both—there being one offense but two punishments; but that under no circumstances can the United States take notice of murder committed in a State or in any way——

Mr. ROBESON. I ask the gentleman whether there ever was an indictment in a United States court that did not conclude with these words: "Against the peace of the United States, the Government and dignity of the same?" This having been the form and substance of every indictment in a United States court in the country during a hundred years, can it be said that the peace of the United States is not violated when its laws are violated and its functions interfered with?

Mr. TALBOT obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. McLANE.

Mr. McLANE. The issue is very narrow and very simple. Of course a statute of the United States may be violated, and it may be a criminal offense to violate it; and the indictment found under the statute may conclude, as the gentleman from New Jersey says, with the language "against the peace of the United States." The law expressly requires that an offense under a statute shall be set out in the terms of the statute; if it is not, the indictment will be quashed. But that has nothing to do with the common law sense of the phrase "breaking the peace;" and as I said the other day, the gentleman has too much respect for himself as a lawyer to dissent explicitly from the interpretation which I have placed upon the terms of the law in regard to using the troops "to keep the peace at the polls." The gentleman knows very well that when the statute was passed there was no law of the United States on the statute-book regulating suffrage; he knows very well that there is no power to pass such a law; hence when that law used the phrase "to keep the peace" it could only mean the peace of the States. There was no statute of the United States on the subject to be violated; there never can be such a statute, because this same decision says that the United States can pass no law regulating suffrage. It lays down broader ground, and says that the only power of the United States on this subject is when color is brought in question; that it is only in order to give the colored man the same rights as the white man that the United States may legislate. But until they have legislated, they can do nothing, and they have not yet legislated; the legislation we have put upon the statute-book has been declared unconstitutional and null and void, and there is not now in existence upon the statute-book any such law of the United States, and it is not a possible thing to have a breach of the United States peace at the polls.

Now, I will give the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] my time, if he can contest that proposition. That is the question. That is the issue. Now I would like to hear the gentleman from New Jersey. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBESON. How much time will you give me?

Mr. McLANE. You will have as much time as I had when I commenced.

Mr. ROBESON. By permission of the gentleman from Maryland I beg to say that he has, unintentionally I doubt not, misrepresented the whole scope and force of that decision. The decision was on what is known as the Grant Parish case—a case in which there was no question of an election, either State or national—on a riot which arose I think at a public meeting in April, 1873. The decision of the court was to the effect that as there was no function of the United States then being performed, no duty nor right for the United States to guarantee, that the legislation which undertook to go so far as to regulate the State peace when the United States was not there with her duties and jurisdiction went too far, and that the indictment was so broad that it could not stand on the fifteenth amendment. That was the only real point in the decision and all that the court decided. And what is said in the syllabus of the case, and what is said in the opinion itself, is simply that an indictment for conspiracy to prevent those persons meeting there and transacting the business which they had before them was an offense against the State laws, because they were not there interfering with any United States function. That is the point.

The Supreme Court has never decided and the Supreme Court will never decide that where the United States has a duty to perform under the Constitution and the laws she has not the power to perform it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed for debate on the pending amendment, that offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW,] has expired.

Mr. McLANE. I ask the consent of the committee to read ten lines.

Mr. COOK. Let him read it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is not in order unless the time is extended.

Mr. SPARKS. I will state to the gentleman from Maryland that the time fixed to act on this amendment has arrived; but after that is disposed of, the gentleman can again get the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by order of the House for debate on the pending amendment has expired. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the first paragraph of the pending section as follows:

Provided, That nothing contained in this section as now amended shall be held or deemed to abridge or affect the duty or power of the President of the United States under section 5297 of the Revised Statutes, enacted under and to enable the United States to comply with section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, on application of the Legislature or executive, as provided for in said section.

The question being put, there were ayes 95, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I give notice that I will ask for a vote in the House.

Mr. GILLETTE. I offer what I send to the desk as an additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. No appropriations made by this bill or by any other bill, and no deficiency in the Treasury occasioned thereby, shall be deemed by the Secretary of the Treasury ground for an increase of the interest-bearing debt of the United States, and any further increase of the said debt shall be unlawful.

Mr. CLYMER. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. CLYMER. That it is not germane to the subject-matter before the committee.

Mr. GILLETTE. I desire to be heard upon that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may address the Chair upon the point of order.

Mr. GILLETTE. I hold in my hand a letter written by the Secretary of the Treasury a few weeks since to the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, which I quote so far as it refers to my subject:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 26, 1879.

SIR: Permit me again to call your attention to the importance of some definite provision for the increased expenditure caused by the act approved January 25, 1879, for the payment of arrears of pensions.

It is manifest that the current revenue is totally inadequate to meet the large unexpected demand which, it is believed, will reach within the present and the next fiscal year at least $36,000,000. The estimated surplus revenue for the next fiscal year submitted in my annual report, $28,165,087.32, will be more than exhausted, and with the reduced revenue caused by the passage of the tobacco bill there will, contrary to my expectations at the beginning of the session, be a deficit of $18,000,000, which I trust Congress will not adjourn without making some definite provision for, or authorizing it to be temporarily covered by some form of loan.

The other alternative of taking the fund expressly provided for by the resumption act for the execution of its provisions would necessarily compel the exercise of the authority conferred by that act to sell bonds to maintain the resumption fund.

* * * * * * * *

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman Committee on Finance, United States Senate.

In this letter the Secretary states that in case there is a deficiency caused by the various appropriation bills not specially provided for he will consider himself "compelled to exercise the authority conferred to sell bonds" to meet the deficiency. I am aware he is speaking of only one of the appropriation bills, but that makes no difference. Whatever bills tend to make that deficiency tend to give him the excuse for issuing more bonds to make up that deficit, and this bill, appropriating more money than the one then under consideration, is more responsible for that deficiency than the bill to which the Secretary called the attention of the Finance Committee of the Senate.

The Secretary of the Treasury has felt himself authorized to increase the bonded debt of this country at his own pleasure. I have the first debt statement that he made, and also one made a month since, and I find that during his administration he has added to the bonded interest-bearing debt $285,000,000. Some of this is no doubt temporary; but it cannot be denied that he has permanently increased it to an alarming extent. It is claimed in the mean time, and has been claimed by his party all over the country and by his statements, that this debt is constantly being reduced, principal and interest. I deny here and now that the interest-bearing debt of the country has been reduced since the war, either principal or interest. I do not mean numerically, but I mean actually; and I challenge contradiction to the statement that it would require to-day more land, more labor, more of the fruits of the farm, of the anvil, and the loom to pay the debt of the United States, either principal or interest, than would have been necessary to pay it at the close of the war.

I further find in a paper just received from the Treasury Department a statement of the assets of the Treasury, and among those assets I find money to the amount of $514,779,501.03. A fraction of this, I am aware, is only held for a short time, but I give the items:

Gold coin and bullion	$133,265,559 43
Standard silver dollars	19,505,767 00
Silver coin and bullion	16,115,893 28
Gold certificates	400,220 00
Silver certificates	1,976,320 00
United States notes	72,650,231 65
United States notes, (special fund for redemption of fractional currency	8,519,741 00
National-bank notes	10,140,409 76
National-bank gold notes	92,815 00
Fractional currency	128,120 58
Deposits held by national-bank depositaries	249,586,805 22
Nickels and minor coins	1,451,618 11
New York and San Francisco exchange	946,000 00
Total	514,779,501 03

This startling amount is now under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. In the face of this fact, he coolly notifies Congress that unless they make some direct provision to meet the deficiency which this and other appropriation bills will cause, rather than take from that mountain of useless money to meet that deficiency he will issue more interest-bearing bonds to curse this and succeeding generations. I challenge the world for another such picture. With the industries of the country paralyzed; with factories and machine-shops selling at one-sixth their cost; with our streets full of tramps who cannot obtain labor because their old employers are bankrupts; with farms selling for taxes which their owners are unable to pay; with twenty-five thousand miles of railroads placed in receivers' hands in the last three years; with a money famine everywhere, the Secretary of the Treasury, wielding more power than a king, having grasped in his insatiate hands the major part of all the money in the country, coolly notifies Congress that if there is a deficiency, rather than put out a few millions of his hoards for which the people are famishing, he will sell more bonds.

I appeal to all the members of this House to ask you if you are willing that this autocratic Secretary, in a time of profound peace, shall add one dollar to that debt which has already by its unjust manipulations, become a stench in the nostrils of the people, and done more to build up an aristocracy of wealth on the one side, and a nation of paupers on the other than any other cause?

I appeal to the majority of this House and most respectfully remind you that you owe your majority to the fact that in nearly all parts of the country you boldly denounced the present schemes of the Treasury, and advocated not only stopping the further increase of the bonded debt, but paying it off. I now ask you like men to back with deeds your words.

During the remarks of Mr. GILLETTE,

Mr. MITCHELL said: I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand the question before the committee is a point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] yet the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] is talking about the greenback question. Now I ask the Chair whether that is in order; and, if so, whether there will be an opportunity given to some other member to reply?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] that he should confine his remarks to the point of order, and the Chair was waiting until the gentleman had made some remarks upon that point of order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I make the point that he is not addressing himself to the question before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLETTE. I ask permission to print the remainder of my remarks.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] is that the amendment proposed is not germane to the pending section. Without deciding that point, as it is not necessary for the Chair to do so, the Chair will hold that the amendment is not in order for the reason that it proposes an additional section to the bill. Now all this bill has been passed upon by the committee except section 6; that is the only part of the bill now before the committee for its consideration. Had this amendment been moved at the end of the bill as an additional section, as it purports to be, the Chair would then have entertained it and at the same time would have entertained the point of order upon it.

Mr. GILLETTE. I give notice that I will offer this amendment in the House if I get the opportunity.

Mr. MCLANE. I move to strike out the last word of the section.

Mr. CONGER. Is not debate closed on this section by order of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the order passed by the House yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SPARKS moved that when the House next resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and resumes the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, all debate upon the pending amendment should close at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.; which said motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ATKINS. Is that order now in force?

The CHAIRMAN. That order has been exhausted by the expiration of the time to which it was limited. The committee will notice that the reading of the order is that "all debate upon the pending amendment should close," &c.; that is the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW.] When the hour of half past twelve o'clock arrived, the Chair stated to the committee that all debate upon that amendment was closed by order of the House, and the committee then proceeded to vote upon the amendment and disposed of it. The Chair entertained other propositions to amend, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] now moves to strike out the last word of the section.

Mr. MCLANE. The decision of Chief-Justice Waite, to which I referred, is far more general in its character than was stated. That case presents an indictment containing sixteen counts, divided into two series. It is, therefore, a criminal indictment under an act of Congress, and that part of the decision which I shall read to the committee is not the general observations of the court, but the actual decision upon the counts. So far as the general observations of Chief-Justice Waite are concerned, they give a very full answer.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman is not speaking to his amendment at all. He moves to strike out the word "years," and I ask that he be required to speak to his amendment.

Mr. MCLANE. You are entirely out of the habit and practice of the House.

Mr. PRICE. There are gentlemen here who desire to speak upon the merits of the section, if they can get the opportunity. We have had about as much of that kind of constitutional discussion as we want to listen to. The gentleman moves to strike out the word "years," and now let him speak to his amendment or quit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that this course has been pursued for many years.

Mr. PRICE. But that does not make it right; the rules of the House do not allow it.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman must make an additional code of rules.

Mr. MCLANE. The general observations of the court give a very full answer to the inquiry addressed to me on yesterday by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD;] the inquiry of what became of an offense committed, say at a post-office. Chief-Justice Waite tells him that there will be two offenses, an offense against the State of a breach of the peace and an offense against the United States of a breach of United States statute, and the man can be tried for both offenses. I will give the answer of Chief-Justice Waite to that question instead of one of my own. I call the attention of the gentleman from New Jersey who thinks this case has been misstated by me to the opinion of the court upon the third and eleventh counts of this indictment. I read the language of Chief-Justice Waite:

It is nothing less than alleging a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder citizens of the United States being within the territory of the State of Louisiana. Rights of life and personal liberty are natural rights of man. "To secure these rights," says the Declaration of Independence, "governments are instituted among men." The very highest duty of the States when they entered into this Union under the Constitution, was to protect all citizens within their boundaries in the enjoyment of these "inalienable rights with which they were endowed by their Creator." Sovereignty for this purpose rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself.

Now, the committee will bear me witness that I have never made any question with the gentleman from New Jersey about the right to use the Army in sustaining a marshal when executing a process of a United States court; and I have never made any issue with him as to the right of the Federal Government to give protection to its officers in the performance of their constitutional duties. I told him expressly that I conceded both those points; and I asked him whether, in addition to those two powers, the United States could "keep the peace." He said in reply that he knew of no decision to the contrary.

Mr. MCLANE. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out section 6 of this bill, referring to sections 2002 and 5528 of the Revised Statutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain amendments to perfect the text of the section; and when they have been voted on it will be in order to vote on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, which will be considered as pending.

Mr. LOWE. The gentleman from Michigan has been anticipated in part. I have already made a motion which is pending, and I presume will be taken up when the motion previously pending has been passed upon by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LOWE] to submit an amendment.

Mr. LOWE. I submitted a motion and sent it in writing to the Clerk.

Tho CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the sixth section of the bill with instructions to the chairman of the committee to report, on the rising of the committee, that section as a separate bill for the present action of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot entertain this motion.

Mr. CONGER. I recollect that amendment; but I supposed the Chair could not entertain the latter part of it.

Mr. KELLEY. Perhaps the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw the latter part.

The CHAIRMAN. The latter part of the amendment is not in order as an amendment to this bill. The Committee of the Whole cannot report to the House any bill unless it has been referred to the committee.

Mr. LOWE. Will the Chair entertain the first part of the motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain the motion to strike out the section. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out section 6. The Chair has already stated that pending this motion other amendments designed to perfect the text of the section will be in order.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I was not aware that a motion to strike out section 6 was pending; and it was not pending in the shape in which I offered it. I propose now to make this proposition to our friends on the other side of the House: that they adopt this amendment; that we strike out this section of the bill referring to the two sections of the statutes, and that the committee on rising recommend to the House, so far as we may do, the passage of a separate bill repealing entirely these two sections. Without consultation with all gentlemen on this side of the House, yet after conversation with several of them, I feel authorized to say that upon the committee rising and recommending to the House the immediate introduction of a separate bill repealing these two sections of the Revised Statutes, such a bill, so far as our side is concerned, can be passed immediately without debate and without delay, leaving the Army appropriation bill, without this rider, and without anything objectionable upon it. Thus the Army appropriation bill and a bill repealing these two sections of the Revised Statutes may both be passed to-day and sent to the Senate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this law be so objectionable that it must be amended at the risk of stopping the supplies for the Army, at the risk as is charged on one side of the House of producing revolution in fact in our Government, it seems to me the better way, if we can agree upon it, would be that the House of Representatives should pass a bill repealing the whole of this so-called objectionable legislation; and it is with that view I have offered here to the House the proposition to strike out section 6 of this bill, accompanied by the proposition we tendered to our friends on the other side of the House that when that is done the committee rise and the bill be reported immediately repealing these two sections, and acted upon in the House, and then that the Army appropriation bill be passed.

I do not propose to discuss at this time at all the merits of any of the propositions before the committee, for I have not the time; but in good faith and in the interest of harmony, in the interest of peace and in the interest of the country, in the interest of a short session of Congress, we make this proposition to strike this section out of the Army bill and thus remove the objection to its passage, and we tender to the other side the assurance we will assist them in repealing these objectionable laws entirely and striking them from the statute-book of the country.

Mr. MCMAHON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know how far the gentleman who has just taken his seat is authorized to speak for his side. I am certainly not authorized to speak for mine. But I wish it distinctly understood that in 1865 and since then the party which he represents claimed the most unlimited power with the troops. The law as it now stands not only denies that unlimited power, but puts the seal of crime upon the officer of the United States who violates it. He now proposes to repeal all the law preventing the improper use of troops. We want to keep the law there and make it more perfect. We found that the law alone and the Constitution are not sufficient to keep the republican party from using the Army on any occasion it saw fit. We want the law to hold them down. I for one repudiate the gentleman's proposition.

But I rose, Mr. Chairman, to have read an extract from the letter and instructions of a prominent Attorney-General of the United States, Hon. William M. Evarts, written on the 20th of August, 1868, to Alexander Magruder, United States marshal northern district of Florida, at Saint Augustine, Florida. I will ask permission to have the whole letter printed as part of my remarks, as there is not time to read it all through now. I request the Clerk to read now what is marked to the end of the letter.

Mr. CONGER. Whatever is read can go into the remarks now, and the other part can be withheld for some other gentleman's speech. I do not want to anticipate a prepared reply next week.

Mr. MCMAHON. It is only fair to his side that I propose the whole letter be printed. If he does not want it, very well.

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] was allowed this morning to read a part of a letter and to print the whole of it. It is only fair to both sides.

Mr. CONGER. I withdraw my objection. The letter has been already printed.

The Clerk read as follows:

ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
August 20, 1868.

SIR: Your letter of the 12th instant reached me yesterday, and has received an attentive consideration. Colonel Sprague's information to you must have been based upon his own construction of General Meade's order lately issued, and not upon any special instructions from the President to Colonel Sprague through General Meade or otherwise, as no such special instructions have been issued by the President. You add: "Under some circumstances I should be glad to have the aid of the military, and, if practicable, would be pleased to have instructions given to the military to aid me when necessary. I ask this as Colonel Sprague informs me under his instructions he cannot do so."

This desire and request for the aid of the military under certain circumstances I understand to refer to the occasional necessity which may arise that the marshal should have the means of obtaining the aid and assistance of a more considerable force than his regular deputies supply for execution of legal process in his district.

The twenty-seventh section of the judiciary act of 1789 establishes the office of marshal, and names among his duties and powers the following: "And to execute throughout the district all lawful precepts directed to him and issued under the authority of the United States, and he shall have power to command all necessary assistance in the execution of his duty, and to appoint, as there may be occasion, one or more deputies." (1, par. 87.)

You will observe from this that the only measure of the assistance which you have power to command is its necessity for the execution of your duty, and upon your discreet judgment, under your official responsibility, the law reposes the determination of what force each particular necessity requires. This power of the marshal is equivalent to that of a sheriff, and with either embraces, as a resort in necessity, the whole power of the precinct (country or district) over which the officer's authority extends. In defining this power Attorney-General Cushing—and, as I understand the subject, correctly—says it "comprises every person in the district or country above the age of fifteen years, whether civilians or not, and including the military of all denominations—militia, soldiers, marines—all of whom are alike bound to obey the commands of a sheriff or marshal."

While, however, the law gives you this "power to command all necessary assistance," and the military within your district are not exempt from obligation to obey, in common with all the citizens, your summons, in case of necessity, you will be particular to observe that this high and responsible authority is given to the marshal only in aid of his duty "to execute throughout the district all lawful precepts directed to him and issued under the authority of the United States," and only in case of necessity for this extraordinary aid. The military persons obeying this summons of the marshal will act in subordination and obedience to the civil officer, the marshal, in whose aid in the execution of process they are called, and only to the effect of securing its execution.

The special duty and authority in the execution of process issued to you must not be confounded with the duty and authority of suppressing disorder and preserving the peace, which, under our Government, belongs to the civil authorities of the States, and not to the civil authorities of the United States. Nor are this special duty and authority of the marshal in executing process issued to him to be confounded with the authority and duty of the President of the United States in the specific cases of the Constitution and under the statutes to protect the States against domestic violence, or with his authority and duty under special statutes to employ military force in subduing combinations in resistance to the laws of the United States; for neither of these duties or authorities is shared by the subordinate officers of the Government, except when and as the same may be specifically communicated to them by the President.

I have thus called your attention to the general considerations bearing upon the subject to which your letter refers for the purpose of securing a due observance of the limits of your duty and authority in connection therewith. Nothing can be less in accordance with the nature of our Government or the disposition of our people than a frequent or ready resort to military aid in the execution of the duties confided to civil officers. Courage, vigor, and intrepidity are appropriate qualities for the civil service which the marshals of the United States are expected to perform, and a re-enforcement of their power by extraordinary means is permitted by the law only in extraordinary emergencies.

If it shall be thought that any occasion at any time exists for instructions to the military authorities of the United States within any of the States in connection with the execution of process of the courts of the United States, these instructions will be in accordance with the exigency then appearing.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. M. EVARTS,
Attorney-General.

ALEXANDER MAGRUDER, Esq.,
United States Marshal Northern District of Florida, Saint Augustine, Florida.

Mr. MCMAHON. I am glad to know Mr. Evarts is in the Cabinet of the President, and no doubt will adhere to the propositions laid down in that letter.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Since the inception of this debate, Mr. Chairman, I have sat here and listened attentively to every argument which has been presented, and I trust to my own edification. At the very outset, sir, when I heard the remark coming from the honorable and distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] denouncing the man who attempted to raise sectional issues as a platform upon which he hoped to win in 1880, I felt possibly that in the Forty-sixth Congress we might have some wholesome legislation for the people. But, sir, when that distinguished gentleman rises as the leader of his party and denounces the majority on this side of the House, coming from the South, as revolutionary in their designs, I confess that I can see no candor in the man or in his proposition.

Sir, following that leadership, this debate has taken a wide scope, and members on this floor have exhausted their ingenuity in hunting up all the sectional legislation of the past and flinging it at this side of the House with an avowed purpose of arousing sectional strife, and every thrust they have made has been directly at those of us who come from the South and constitute the democratic majority in this Hall. Sir, they have gone back to the days of nullification in my own State, and from there on we have had Anthony Burns with a democratic rope, I suppose, around his neck; we have had the bonfires and torchlight processions of Norfolk commemorating his capture; and we have had a most graphic description of what occurred in Kansas during the squatter-sovereignty difficulties. But the gentleman who gave us that recitation failed to present one bright chapter in the history of Kansas; we heard nothing from him of Beecher's rifle sermons. And, sir, while he was excoriating southern men for their sentiments and their acts when Kansas was on the frontier of our civilization, he forgot to tell us that, after being enlightened by republican rule for twenty years, within the last ten days the citizens of his own State have hung a negro, burned him at the stake, and danced in bacchanalian revelry around the funeral pyre.

Sir, in addition to that we have had the "nigger catcher"——

Mr. HASKELL rose.

Mr. AIKEN. If you please, do not bother me, [laughter,] I have not the time. We have had the "nigger catcher," and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] will excuse me, for it is the title he gave himself, coming here and dictating to us, and abusing us for the past. He has said to us, "You gentlemen are relying on treacherous friends; you gentlemen must know that in the Northern States all the patriotism, all the intelligence, all the capital belongs to the republican party." I say to that gentleman, if he were half as wise as he thinks he is, and knew anything about the Southern States, he would know that all the intelligence, all the property, all the virtue, all the worth belongs to the democratic party there. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, in addition to all this I have sat here and heard from gentlemen of eminent ability and great legal learning, men of national reputation, long constitutional arguments on this question. And yet, sir, I only had to see the locality from which the voice came, whether it was this side or that side of the Hall, and I knew what that speaker's convictions were. Therefore, sir, I have come to the inevitable conclusion that there is not so much constitutional construction required about this question after all. It is a plain practical question, the merits of which I have not yet heard argued upon this floor.

Sir, I hold that the existing statute cannot upon its face, either in letter or spirit, practically be carried into effect. Every possible effort to do so must be partial and partisan. It cannot be otherwise. Why, Mr. Chairman, we have but one day of national elections; and I ask here what State executive, what individual anywhere on this great continent of ours, has a right to prejudge the people of any polling place and say that they intend to have riot on a day of election; and if they do not prejudge them and send the troops there before the day of election, then it will be too late, and they cannot be sent there at all. I say further, the existing statute is a partisan measure, passed by a partisan Congress, enforced by partisan executives, and now supported by partisans for the purpose of upholding partisan power in this Republic, and on that account should be stricken from our statute-book. Is there any man here who has ever seen the principles involved in this law executed?

Bear with me, Mr. Chairman, a few moments longer while I give you my own experience. In 1868 at the presidential election, for the first time after the war, I was permitted to vote. I went to the polls designing to vote. The house in which the polling took place was a private residence in my own village, about fifty feet from the street. The gate, which opened from the street, was thrown wide open early in the morning, and there paced a sentinel with loaded rifle. When I entered the yard I met another sentinel walking backward and forth from the gate to the window, inside of which was the ballot-box, with a loaded rifle on his shoulder. I went to the poll, and the managers from courtesy to me, and friendship, for I knew them well, asked me to come inside the room. I went in; and secreted between the ballot-box and the window sat a United States officer in full uniform. I remained but a moment, and retired. The managers asked me, "Don't you intend to vote?" I said: "No; no freeman will ever cast a ballot under duress; and for that reason I refuse to vote." There was no intimidation about it.

One moment more, if you please; I beg the committee to allow me to make one further illustration. [Cries of "Go on!" from the republican side.] At that polling place there were 600 votes cast, not one of them a democratic vote. Since that time every legitimate voter within the precinct has been registered and counted, and there are not over 650 of them. The difference between the democratic party and the republican party in that voting precinct is not 35 votes. But on that day of election there were 600 republican votes cast, and not a half dozen democratic votes; yet gentlemen tell us that the democratic party stuffs the ballot-boxes. Why, sir, the republican party down South has been wearing the champion belt for that sort of thing ever since the war.

One thing more. In 1872 I went to another polling place in the same county. There I found a squad of soldiers, one lying down smoking his pipe, and three or four others pitching quoits. Their guns were stacked within fifty yards of the ballot-box. There were three hundred and fifty odd votes cast that day, and not one of them was a republican vote. Why? Simply because on that occasion the republicans heard that the soldiers were democrats. [Laughter.] And they on that occasion exercised the privilege of not voting under duress, as I had done four years before. [Great laughter.] I say that this is a partisan measure, and the sooner we wipe it out the better.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I have heard this debate with intense interest and with the profoundest concern for the national weal. The principle involved in the amendment under consideration underlies the whole structure of our Federal system and goes to the root of civil liberty. Upon it the two great opposing parties now confront the nation upon the floor of this Chamber and they are doomed to stand in conflict until the Constitution is permitted to resume its sway. Party license allied with party greed and corruption have wrenched this Government from its appointed orbit, and the democratic party in this the Forty-sixth Congress has entered upon its mission to restore the just equilibrium of the laws and the Constitution in the government of the country. The political history of the last eighteen years is replete with the innovations which have been made upon our fundamental charter. And made by whom? By that party which has dominated over the councils of the nation since 1861.

A party domination which might have held its sway over these States for an indefinite period if the counsels of wisdom and the admonitions of justice had been heeded has by its reckless and stupid obedience to party clamor and the law of Mammon and of power forfeited its right to direct any longer the destinies of the American people. Step by step they have encroached, barrier after barrier they have broken down, until the Constitution remains but a rope of sand in their way. It was the renowned leader of the present opposition, Thaddeus Stevens, who, in the Thirty-ninth Congress, startled the nation with the declaration that his party had encamped itself outside of the Constitution. It was the same party that in 1867 stripped their own chosen Executive by succession of his constitutional prerogative of veto, curtailed him in the exercise of his rightful power, and, urged onward by its intoxicated passion, dragged him before the bar of the high court of impeachment. It was this same party that by a single stroke of legislation reversed the natural order of things in one-third of this continent, and by a fatal blind policy reduced to desolation and degradation and bankruptcy and beggary nine sovereign States of this Union. And after visiting these indescribable calamities upon a people who were forced to look on with impotent anguish and wordless ire while darkness more profound threatened to eclipse their civilization, and while returning justice was about regaining the ascending scale, they quartered their troops wherever they dared, constituted in States that were once free the corporal of the guard chairman of the board of managers of election, and menaced with bayonets the returning boards of certain States that the votes might be registered as the pretor demanded.

The suppression of the free and untrammeled voice of the people in their national elections in certain States for years past has no parallel save when the pretorian guards of Rome dictated the choice of a Roman Emperor. And to cap the climax of absolutisms, after the ascertained will of the American people had been expressed by a popular majority of the whole people of three hundred thousand in response to the edict of the head center of that party, the votes of those States were stolen, and to consummate this dark crime of infamy and robbery and perjury this very Capitol was for a time turned into a camp, and the guns of its commander were ranged upon this House to terrify into submission the Representatives of the people. And in the light of all these events which are but of yesterday we are to be twitted by the renowned champion of the opposition with the charge of organizing revolution. Revolution, indeed! He and his party have dragged this nation to the perilous edge, and from the gulf which yawns the democracy intends and will rescue the fabric of our institutions and our civilization. If the South did try, in the exciting terms of the member from Ohio, to shoot the Union to death for four years, history will record it to the shame of his party that they have for fourteen years been corrupting the Union to death. And the gentleman need not fear; the nation will not be starved to death. In the blind madness of their fury they would coerce the President to this dread alternative; but they should not, they cannot succeed. We have been thus early convoked here by the President to furnish supplies to run the Government, just as we were prepared to do in the last Congress until impeded and opposed by the Senate. The Representatives of the people, who are the sovereigns of this country and hold the purse, do not intend to be coerced. It is our province and our prerogative, it is our duty, to see before we give the taxes of the people that all grievances are redressed.

The spirit of liberty that now moves abroad I believe animates our President. He has been brave enough to challenge the frowns and the denunciation of his party in lesser exigencies, and where he has nothing left now to serve but his God and his country he will be equal to the emergency. He will not allow the gentleman from Ohio to put that Waterloo chip under his heel, nor will he carry it upon his shoulder. The repose and peace and happiness of the millions who inhabit our great country are of more consequence than the party pride and reluctance to abdicate power which is the distinguishing feature in the gentleman's conduct. He invokes the spirit of revolution and discord from the depths, but the spirit will not answer. There may be a greater revolution portending than that which the other side in the plenitude of its vision conjures up—the revolution of the toiling millions asking for labor and hungering for bread. But the constant wail of the necessities of a depressed and impoverished people, ascending as they are daily to this Capitol, cannot endanger the integrity and permanency of our Republic. The foundations of this Capitol may totter and the edifice crumble into ruins, but the Republic will still advance and still live. The Republic, which has been beautifully and classically apostrophized as the personified child of a proletarian family, born and bathed in the sweat of labor and nursed in the anguishes which misery inflicts upon society; which was revealed in the dreams of Rousseau, which became a marvelous artist of speech; was heard in the majesty of Bossuet, in the howlings of Babel; melting in the tender poesy of Lamartine, awaking with the manly apostrophes of Victor Hugo, and falling in with the tender sensitiveness of Bernardino de St. Pierre. It seemed to possess the notes of all styles that it might repeat better the echo of all griefs. It was the genius of social criticism as Kant was the genius of scientific criticism. It entered into the Pantheon of contemporaneous history, where were gathered up all the old ideas, with the same honor with which the ancient Christians entered the Latin Pantheon, where were collected all the idols, and placing them into his vast crucible and passing them under his mighty examination, he smashes them; and after the storm has passed the only affirmations that furrow his brow are the Federal Republic, one and indivisible, and the capability of man for self-government.

The distinguished gentleman from Maine has been pleased to hurl a shaft at the State of South Carolina, which I have the honor in part to represent, but it has missed its aim and has fallen harmless at the feet of her delegation. South Carolina did not in 1832 aim to capture the Capitol, nor was she stamped out of existence by Andrew Jackson. She took the attitude of vindicating her interpretation of the American Constitution, and by her attitude in that solemn hour Harry Clay struck the union-jack at Washington and brought about a modification and compromise of the tariff. I am admonished that under the rule regulating the debate I must draw to a close. Thank God that from the ashes of despotism we see flashing again the fires of liberty.

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HASKELL obtained the floor.

Mr. FORT. I hope the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] will allow the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. O'CONNOR] to continue his remarks.

Mr. HASKELL. I will yield if I can have the floor afterward.

Mr. WHITE. It is valuable information for the country.

Mr. HASKELL. If the same courtesy can be extended to me——

Mr. COX. I would give the gentleman my time if I had any.

There being no objection, Mr. O'CONNOR resumed and concluded his remarks as above.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] has seen fit to allude to the fact that in the State of Kansas a negro was recently hanged and his body afterward burned—of course without due form of law. I admit the fact. That man was killed by a mob in my district of that State. But why did not the gentleman go on and tell the whole story of the outrage, and tell why that miscreant was thus treated by a mob. It was for that unnamable of crimes, an outrage that shocks all humanity everywhere, perpetrated repeatedly upon the body of a ten-year-old girl, leaving the poor child almost dead in the fields; and the friends of the parents of the girl, many of them hard-working miners, outraged beyond measure and terribly indignant, took the law into their own hands and punished him. I leave that matter for your judgment and that of the country, without one word of defense for any unlawful act.

The gentleman wonders, too, why, in my review of one of the early elections in Kansas, I did not speak of "Beecher's rifles," and did not tell of the organization on our side for the protection of our homes. There never was a "Beecher's rifle" sent to Kansas until you had marched armed men into that Territory and subverted and overrode our election laws, and forced upon us thereby a bogus territorial government; not until you had passed those two infamous statutes, one of them forbidding any man to speak or to write against the institution of slavery upon pain of punishment as for a felony. You marched an armed body of men into my town before ever a "Beecher's bible" was sent to Kansas; and a drunken democratic ex-Vice-President of the United States pointed a cannon leveled against one of the hotels of my town. I stood by the breech of that cannon myself and witnessed the destruction of that building and others in my city, and saw the sack of private residences beside; while I stood there, when the black smoke was curling out of the windows of that hotel, I saw a blood-red flag run up the flag-staff, bearing on its crimson folds a single white star. What was that? It was the colors of a company of South Carolina militia sent to my Territory to destroy the freedom of elections there. Then, thank God, Beecher did send his "bibles;" then the North did send her truest and bravest men to our relief. You had flung down the gauntlet, as you have flung it down here, as you have flung it down to the negro of the South, daring him to assert his rights. In Kansas you were not dealing with a set of poor, down-trodden plantation hands; you were dealing with the best blood and bone and sinew of the United States. We took up your gauntlet and we won that battle.

You upon the other side charge that the republican party has countenanced all sorts of "rings;" been guilty of all sorts of crimes, and of willful misrule during the eighteen years of its ascendency in this country. You criticise us for lack of statesmanship in every detail of government. You charge us with wrongs in financial management. You accuse us of the disarrangement of capital and labor. You heap upon us all sorts of accusations. You charge us with imperialism, with Cæsarism. Yet almost every speaker on the other side of the House, during this debate, has quoted to us the laws, the precepts, and the institutions of a monarchy as governing us in our deliberations and furnishing us with proper precedents for the enactment of laws. Now let me ask you, without any covert sneer, or partisan feeling or hate, why is it that you quote from the institutions of England to show the wrong of the republican party?

You went out of this Union, a great many of you; you believed that republican rule was outrageous, and you established a government of your own. You had States; you had Legislatures; you had constitutions; you had laws; you had a congress of the Confederate States. Why—and this is a pertinent question—why has no man in criticising the work of the republican party quoted the wiser acts of the confederate congress? Why have you not shown us a "better way?" Why have you not pointed us to the legislation of Southern States as being better than ours? Why have you not referred us to confederate systems of finance? Why have you not referred us to confederate adjustments of labor and capital? Why have you not shown us confederate methods of auditing accounts and administering public affairs better than you say we have done? No such reference has ever been made. I conclude, therefore, that in the four years of your attempt to establish a government you succeeded no better than we. Instead of taking precedents from your own American history; instead of referring to your own enactments as suggesting remedies for the wrongs you charge upon us in legislation, you are forced to fly for your statesmanship, for your methods of administration and practice, not to your confederate government, but to the monarchy of Great Britain. Where is the imperialism? Where is the Cæsarism? We point downward along the eighteen years of republican supremacy, and we defy you to place your hand upon a chapter of legislative proceedings, of statesmanship, of governmental administration in any nation that, taking the eighteen years as they run, will show a wiser, a better, a more loyal and efficient administration of affairs.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] were speaking, memory, exercising its functions in my mind, brought up the remote past. I remember making from this desk in this Hall the first speech on the subject of admitting Kansas, twenty-two years ago. Have we progressed none since that time? "Beecher's bibles," "Sharp's rifles," and "John Brown of Ossawatomie" danced through the debates of that day in all the mazes of political confusion. Have we learned nothing since then? Are the same old sectional questions still to be agitated? We should have made progress both as to ethics and the practices of parliamentary bodies.

First, as to the principle. I believe, and I urged in the democratic council preliminary to the introduction of this bill, that the repealing bills should be introduced here independently of the appropriation bill, pure and simple, as the better practice, more in consonance with the progress of political science, which demands bills should not be multifarious, should not be complicated. I knew both sides had more or less practiced wrongfully, but no two wrongs, no two set of practices, can make a right. Gentlemen will not have the opportunity just now to vote for these bills pure and simple. I wish they could have had that right, but I bowed in the councils of my party to the superior wisdom, if not experience, of others.

We have made no progress in political science, it seems. Why is it we are now debating a question settled in England and in almost all other nations hundreds of years ago—the question between force and freedom, right and wrong? And still gentlemen on the other side insist on having force at the polls. Why, election means choice—free choice—no compulsion. Have we, sir, made no progress in the last two hundred years?

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] sneers at our going back to monarchies for our instruction. Why, the principal leading case, as I remember—you will find it printed in Smith's Leading Cases; I cannot now recollect the exact name of the case, but my friend from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] likely will—in that leading case Judge Holt decided there was a common-law right of action for any man who was debarred wrongfully of his right to vote. That case has never been overruled by any respectable tribunal. It is the common-law right in England and America.

Before this debate opened, Mr. Chairman, I hinted there was a reservoir from which all might draw with satisfaction in this debate. I referred to the speech of Ex-Senator Powell, now deceased, in a very short remark, to wit, that it contained all worth knowing about the relation of the Army toward free government and free elections. That was the only remark I made. After the adjournment my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] asked me to look up that debate, and to look up the votes on it, or, at least, the record on it. I did so, and I laid it upon his table in the Ways and Means Committee room. I did him that courtesy. But what was my surprise when home the other day, (if I may be allowed to use an almost unparliamentary expression,) what was my surprise to see how he had perverted that record, and perverted the very speech of Governor Powell. Oh, yes! shake not thy gory head at me. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Thou canst not say I did it.

Mr. COX. The gentleman's remark is not heard here because he is sitting at his desk, and of course it does not go into the RECORD. [Laughter.]

Now, that has been sufficiently debated. Gentlemen know how it has been debated, for I have read the debate in my absence. There is nothing more to be said on that subject. I happen to be familiar with that speech and that subject because Governor Powell did me the honor then to ask me to assist in looking up some of the proceedings and authorities on that subject, and he read his speech to me in his room before he delivered it in the Senate. I have read that speech since, and unless the gentleman from Ohio has perverted it he is willing to vote, I take it, for these repealing clauses relating to elections pure and simple.

I thought I heard the gentleman from Michigan make a proposition to this side of the House. Did I understand him to say if this appropriation bill were passed without these repealing clauses he would vote for the repealing clauses in bills independently, just as we have them now in this bill?

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman understood me to say I would vote for repealing those two sections.

Mr. COX. Ah! [Laughter.] That is not the point at all.

Mr. CONGER. If that be yes I say yes.

Mr. PRICE. That is what we offer.

Mr. COX. That will extend the power of the Army over the elections leaving that law remain.

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, no.

Mr. COX. I will look after that after the House has adjourned and the vote has been taken. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman from Ohio shall have his opportunity.

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Ohio rises. He shall have his opportunity. If this bill passes this House with this "rider" upon it and it goes to the President and the veto which has been so truculently threatened comes down upon us, then let the Senate send us this repealing bill, pure and simple, and we will test the gentlemen on the other side of the House. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CONGER. Bring them on.

Mr. PRICE. We are ready for them.

Mr. COX. I am glad of it, but we will pass this bill first. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "civil" in line 4 of section 6, and also in the twelfth line of the same section.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] when he addressed the House on Thursday last, claimed that but one issue was presented in this legislation, namely, "whether the ballot-box shall be turned over to the tender mercies of the Army," and democratic members generally have made that claim in discussing this bill. Now, sir, I say that there is no such issue presented by this legislation, and gentlemen are not candid when they so claim. It is not the military arm of the Government that you fear in the matter of elections of members of Congress, but, on the contrary, it is the civil arm of the Government that you seek to strike down by the proposed legislation, and I will demonstrate it here and now by the amendment which I have offered and by your vote to be taken upon the same. Section 6 of the bill as you propose to pass it is as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 2002 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States."

Now, my amendment is to strike out the word "civil," in line 4 of the section, thereby leaving intact all that you claim to desire touching the military and naval power as to their non-use in connection with elections, and at the same time not interfering with the use of the civil arm of the Government to prevent intimidation and riot at the polls where Federal elections are being held. And I state here that I for one, and I believe republicans generally, will be willing to agree to the passage of a bill such as this would be with the word "civil" stricken out.

Now, sir, the other side claim that we are seeking to stir up sectional feeling and revive the war issues. I deny it. We hoped, the republican party hoped, and the country hoped that the issues settled by the war never would be revived or presented for settlement again, and it is only as the doctrines which led to the war are reasserted and sought to be woven into legislation by the democratic party that they are revived by patriotic resistance from the republican party.

All recollect how the war arose. It was affirmed upon the one hand that the United States had the power to protect and perpetuate itself. On the other hand it was held that it existed only by the voluntary consent of the States, which could be withdrawn at any time by secession. The issue was made up and the trial was by battle. Its trial was protracted and bloody. The Government triumphed, and it was established that it had power to protect itself, thanks to the principles and leadership of the republican party.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] boasted the other day "that after eighteen years the democratic party had again come into its heritage," and gave notice that the legislation of the last eighteen years was to be swept from the statute-book. Now, sir, I should be glad to know where the so-called heritage the gentleman speaks of would have been found if it had not been for the republican party and its legislation. But, sir, after all the bitter contest of the last eighteen years, the first thing the democratic party proposes to do is to write upon the statute-book the practical declaration that the United States has not the power to perpetuate itself, by taking from the United States any and all power it has to use its civil arm to prevent fraud and intimidation at elections where its members of Congress are to be chosen.

Section 4, article 1, of the Constitution expressly gives Congress the power to control the time, place, and manner of holding elections for members of Congress. Story, in his comments upon the Constitution, speaking of this section, says that its propriety rests upon this plain proposition, "that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation."

The crying frauds in Federal elections in New York and elsewhere, as well as the force and intimidation in many parts of the country, made legislation by Congress absolutely necessary, under which a free and fair Federal election could be held. The necessities of the democratic party demand that this legislation shall be repealed, so that in 1880 her bulldozers and ballot-box stuffers and repeaters may override the will of the majority without the fear of being interrupted by the civil arm of the United States when an election is to be held; and forthwith you proceed, under the pretense of restraining the military arm of the Government, which is not and cannot be used under existing law as you claim, to paralyze the civil arm of the United States. You shall not do it by my vote or consent.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not examined the bill with reference to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON;] but it occurs to me that to strike out the word "civil" would nevertheless leave the power with the marshals and the supervisors to use the military at the polls. I say I have not examined it with special reference to that point, but it occurs to me that the objection I have named would be against his amendment.

Now, I want to say in the few moments that I have allotted to me that our republican friends make the assertion that they are opposed to this repeal in the interest of an honest ballot; that they are opposed to this repeal in the interest of free, full, and fair elections. That is the way it is being put in the papers and upon the floor of this House. I have, Mr. Chairman, this to say: that the practices of the republican party, the history of the republican party for the last sixteen years shows that pretense a false pretense, a delusion. Over a quarter of a million dollars were spent at the last election out of the public Treasury in employing and paying republican marshals at the polls to work for the republican nominees. In the city of Philadelphia seven hundred republican marshals, as is shown by the testimony which I hold in my hand, were paid $5 a day each for two days; over $7,000 paid them out of the public Treasury; and every one of those marshals worked at the polls from morning to night, distributing republican tickets and securing votes for the republican candidates. In addition to those seven hundred marshals there were twelve hundred republican policemen, every one working in the interest of a free republican election.

Mr. WHITE. Does the gentleman say that there was not a fair election in Philadelphia? If he does, we will meet him upon that point.

Mr. FINLEY. I have before me the sworn testimony of witnesses as to the character of these men who worked in the interest of free elections. Let me read some of the testimony. I read from the testimony taken before a Senate committee. Charles F. Miller swears that he has been nine or ten years a detective, and about four years the murder detective of Philadelphia, employed by the city in the district attorney's office. He was interrogated as to the character of some of these marshals. What does he say in this connection:

Question. Do you know Philip Madden?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Where does he live?
A. On Bainbridge street, I think, above Seventh, in the fourth ward.
Q. In what division?
A. I cannot tell; I think it is the fourth.
Q. What is the character of Philip Madden?
A. I think he is one of the worst men in Philadelphia.
Q. In what respect?
A. He is a dangerous man; he is violent and dangerous.

Q. How long has he been out of prison?
A. I think probably eight months or a year. He was convicted of highway robbery, I think.
Q. Do you know of this man Madden having shot anybody?
A. I did not see him shoot anybody. I heard he shot a boy at one time.
Q. Was he in prison, to your knowledge, more than this one time?
A. He was in prison twice.

That is one of the marshals placed at the polls by our republican friends in the interest of a free ballot.

Q. Do you know Francis McNamee, of the eighth ward?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his character?
A. I arrested him for being concerned in five robberies about seven years ago, and convicted him for having stolen goods in his possession. He was sentenced, I think, to eighteen months. I am not certain about the length of the sentence.
Q. Do you know in what precinct he lives?
A. No, sir; he lives in the eighth ward, somewhere about Locust street.

He was one of the republican marshals at the polls.

Q. Do you know Joseph Hilferty?
A. No, sir.
Q. Do you know Daniel Redding, of the first ward?
A. Yes, sir; very well. I guess everybody here knows him.
Q. What is the general reputation of Daniel Redding?
A. He is considered to be a very bad, dangerous man. He has been tried for murder.
Q. How long since he was tried for murder?
A. In 1869.
Q. Is his reputation still good or bad?
A. Bad.

He was another republican marshal at the polls in the interest of honest elections.

Q. Do you know a Mr. Pitts?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Of what ward?
A. The seventh ward. He keeps a place on Lombard street, above eighth, on the south side.
Q. What is his business?
A. He keeps a gambling place, and things of that kind.
Q. Is he a colored man?
A. He is a colored man.
Q. He keeps a gambling-house; is it a drinking-house?
A. Yes, sir. He has been arrested once or twice, and was tried before.

He was one of your marshals placed at the polls to preserve the purity of the ballot-box.

Mr. WHITE. I would inquire how the time is running in this debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia. I will yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WHITE. I raise the point that the gentleman cannot do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] addresses the Chair. Does he move an amendment?

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia. I move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I raise the point whether it is competent under the rules for a gentleman to yield his time to another. I have no objection, if it can be settled that that is so. I should have been very glad to have had five minutes longer myself; but I did not think it competent under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is following the universal custom of debate.

Mr. BROWNE. Is it competent for a gentleman to surrender to another his time who proposes to speak on the same side, and after the first gentleman has spoken his five minutes? Can that be done until after every other gentleman who desires to speak has had an opportunity to address the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The custom has been in accordance with the course which the Chair proposes now to pursue.

Mr. BROWNE. I am aware of that, and I am aware of another fact, that it has been the custom to allow a few men to do all the talking for the committee. Now there are a few gentlemen—no, not a few, but a great many—who would like to have the rule, if there be one, enforced so as to give us something like a fair show and a free fight in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will give gentlemen all the rights to which they are entitled.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think that has been the practice heretofore by consent, when no objection was made. Certainly once since I have been a member of this House objection was made, and it was held that it was not in order for any member to yield his time to another who had spoken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] will proceed.

Mr. FINLEY. I wish to say that I have before me the sworn testimony of a large number of witnesses giving the character of these seven hundred marshals who were placed at the polls in Philadelphia on election day. The chief marshal testifies that every one of them was a republican.

Mr. O'NEILL. If the gentleman will permit me to say that these are all democratic witnesses. The committee will go to Philadelphia within a few days, and then witnesses will be brought before it who will swear to the truth.

Mr. FINLEY. I wish to read a little further from this testimony:

Question. Do you know George Cornelius?
Answer. Yes, sir; he is constable of the fifth ward.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE. My point of order is that the testimony in this matter has not been heard through, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] is presenting but one side of the case; the other side has not been heard.

Mr. FINLEY. I have the right to quote from any testimony that I see fit as part of my remarks, as the gentleman well knows. I hope gentlemen will take it cool.

Mr. O'NEILL. If the gentleman will read all the testimony to the committee, he will find that no democrat was kept from voting at the polls by any one of these men.

Mr. WHITE. I do not want any false idea to go to the country, and I insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has made no point of order.

Mr. WHITE. My point of order is that the gentleman from Ohio is reading here only one side of the case; that the testimony is not concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a point of order.

Mr. FINLEY. I hope that gentlemen will not be so tender upon this subject.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope the gentleman will be permitted to go on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes so, too.

Mr. FINLEY. Now let me read:

Question. Do you know George Cornelius?
Answer. Yes, sir; he is constable of the fifth ward.
Q. Is he upon this list as a deputy marshal?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. The name of Springfield is on this list?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Michael Slavin, of the fifth ward?
A. Very well.
Q. What is his reputation?
A. He is a notorious repeater, a thief.
Q. Has that been his reputation for some time?
A. It has, so far as I know him, for eight or nine years. I have seen him lead gangs of repeaters to vote, many a time; that is his profession, "repeater."
Q. Do you know William Glenn, of the nineteenth ward?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his business?
A. He is superintendent of Norris Square.
Q. Under what authority?
A. Under the city.
Q. Does his name appear on this list of marshals?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Charles Boeler, [or Brinkler?]
A. He is the constable in the sixteenth ward.

Mr. Chairman, I will cite one more case, that of James Coligan, who was a United States marshal there:

Q. Who was the United States marshal there?
A. James Coligan, an ex-police-officer.
Q. What was his condition during the day?
A. Most of the afternoon he was so drunk that he could hardly walk.
Q. Was there any interference by him during the day with voters, and, if so, what was it?
A. He was challenging everybody that came there, driving them away from the polls.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to say that a number of these witnesses have been arrested for perjury.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] to express the desire that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] should be allowed to go on.

Mr. FINLEY. The witness further states.

Question. What did he say and do to them?
Answer. He said that he was United States marshal, and had more authority around there than the judge inside or the police or anybody else. I was calling the policeman's attention to the fact that they had no business within thirty feet of the polls; and I asked him if they could read; that there was a notice signed by the judges, Ludlow and Fell. They said, "Oh, to hell with that," and Coligan came up. I told them that frequently during the day.
When I told this police officer that in the afternoon, Colligan said, "Oh, you have got too damn much to say; I will take you in."

Thereupon this republican deputy marshal arrested this man for calling his attention to a law which required that the police of the city of Philadelphia should not go within thirty feet of the polls. He swears that five or six of the republican police of that city, together with this drunken deputy marshal, were blocking the polls, keeping voters from the polls, and because he called the attention of a police officer to this violation of the law, he was taken by that deputy marshal to prison and kept there for four hours. Yet these are the gentlemen that were appointed by the republican party in Philadelphia in the interest of free ballots and an honest election! When the democrats say you shall no longer use money out of the public Treasury to hire republican marshals to electioneer for and carry elections for the republican party, you tell us we are interfering with a free ballot.

Mr. McCOID. Mr. Chairman, the country is watching the proceedings of the two parties in Congress with great interest for two purposes: First, because, as stated by my friend of the greenback party, it is interested in other matters of legislation; and I have no doubt that for the time wasted upon anything else the parties responsible will be held to account. But this session has been precipitated upon the country for a political purpose. I perfectly agree with the gentleman from South Carolina who stated to-day that this is a political measure. In introducing into this House appropriation bills to carry on the Government, the party in the majority here has foisted into these bills political or partisan measures.

What is the political proposition embraced in this bill? They propose to amend two sections of the Revised Statutes so that the Government of the United States shall have no power "to keep the peace at the polls." Under these sections as amended the only power left to the Government will be to resist the armed enemies of the United States. Now I ask gentlemen upon the other side, Who are armed enemies of the United States? How many men on the other side who were in the confederate service will acknowledge by the uplifted hand that they were armed enemies of the United States in rebellion? How many? [A pause.] Not a hand do I see raised. [Laughter and applause.]

Gentlemen on the other side, do you say that in 1861 when you attempted to go out of the Union by secession and when you were in arms openly against the Government you were armed enemies of the United States in rebellion? Not a man on the other side will admit it. There is not a man who will own that he was a rebel against the Government. Then if we amend this section as proposed and you go out again, you will not then be "armed enemies," will you? Why, sir, men claim on this floor that they went out of this Union through patriotic motives, that they were patriots, not armed enemies, in attempting to secede. What, then, do you mean by leaving this section in the form you propose? This side of the House proposes to repeal the whole section. Gentlemen on the other side say, "Oh no; we want it left as a law that the Government shall not use troops except to resist armed enemies of the United States." But they say they were not armed enemies. Then who ever were armed enemies of this Government?

The country is sensitive as to whether or not the democratic party is a patriotic party, and I confess, Mr. Chairman, that during the few days that I have listened to the debates on the other side my suspicions and fears on that point have been increased. During all this debate I have not heard a single speaker upon the other side deny the proposition too broadly made by a gentleman on this side that this Government can be destroyed. They hasten to agree to the declaration that this Government can be destroyed without the firing of a gun. They have been affirming on this floor their primal allegiance to their States, and one distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] in his letter accepting the nomination for the office of Congressman, paraded to the country his primal allegiance to his own State. There has been an avowal made upon this floor of a willingness to rebel again. Gentlemen say boldly, "I thought I was right; and under the same circumstances I would do so again."

Threats are made upon this floor to tear out from the statute-book every war measure passed within eighteen years. In other words, they propose to go back and tear out of the statute-books of the nation every war measure enacted since 1861. A leader of that party [Mr. BLACKBURN] has said they do not intend to stop till they complete that work.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPARKS obtained the floor.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. WHITE. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. COX. I ask the privilege of printing with my speech extracts from Lord Holt's opinion in the case of Ashby vs. White, which affirms the common-law right of any man to have his remedy against a judge of elections if he is wrongfully refused the right to vote.

Mr. BAKER. I object.

Mr. COX. I only wish to print the syllabus of the case.

Mr. BAKER. The case can be found in every lawyer's library.

Mr. SPARKS. I now move that the committee rise——

Mr. KEIFER. I make the suggestion that the same courtesy be extended to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCOID] which has been extended to other gentlemen, that he be allowed an additional five minutes.

Mr. WHITE. I propose to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCOID.]

Mr. MCCOID. Mr. Chairman, have we heard on the other side upon this floor a single denial of the right of secession? I say that upon the other side there has not been during this debate a single sentence contradicting that theory. The country is waiting for evidence of the loyalty of the democratic party to this Union, and the country fears more to-day treason in the form of law and under the specious cry of the "Constitution" than it does treason in arms and upon the tented field. And to-day this measure, introduced as it is, is nothing more than the first step of a revolution. Mark you its similarity to the last one. In 1861 the Government sent a ship laden with supplies to one of its forts for a portion of its army. These gentlemen put a cannon on shore and tacked to that bill of supplies for the Army the secession ordinance and said, "You shall not supply your army unless you take this with it." To-day they do the same thing. They say unless you give to the hundred and forty-four members on the other side, a bare majority of this House, the elective despotism of this Government they will not let you supply your army. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from Jefferson's criticisms upon the colonial government of Virginia, showing what will be the effect of placing in a hundred and forty-four men of this House the despotism of dictating to this whole Government its policy and laws by withholding supplies.

The Clerk read as follows:

All the powers of government, legislative, executive, and judiciary, result to the legislative body. The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands, and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one. Let those who doubt it turn their eyes on the republic of Venice. As little will it avail us that they are chosen by ourselves. An elective despotism was not the government we fought for, but one which should not only be founded on free principles, but in which the power of government should be so divided and balanced among several bodies of magistracy as that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others. For this reason that convention which passed the ordinance of government laid its foundation on this basis, that the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments should be separate and distinct, so that no person should exercise the powers of more than one of them at the same time.—Jefferson's Notes on Virginia.

Mr. MCCOID. Now, Mr. Chairman, this side of the House has agreed to repeal these sections. These gentlemen insist upon their being a part of the laws of the nation. Therefore the bill is simply this: Be it enacted, that the United States shall not use any force in any State of the Union to keep the peace and enforce her laws. Not having read their title clear enough in 1861, although they claimed the same, they want to make it sure.

I wish to review for one moment a chapter or two of the history which brings us up to these laws. This is a whole picture, one complete and connected scene back to 1861. In the background I see the smoke of the rebellion rolling away. I see upon one side of it Libby Prison and on the other Andersonville, and over it the stars and bars. A little later than that I see the last act of the rebellion. Something of that same spirit comes upon this floor, and flagrantly in violation of parliamentary law insults the President of the United States. I see in the last act of the rebellion the White House draped in mourning. The next picture after that is the picture of ku klux, a picture of murder, of outrages, of men driven from their homes, fugitives flying from the South, dark figures crouching in the shadows, like hunted hares, running away, almost the only hands raised during the war in the South for the Government, while all around there was not an eye to pity this Government nor an arm stretched forth to save it. Black men, then true to their country, were driven from their homes in the years which followed the war, and deprived of their rights.

A gentleman asked the other day a member on this side how about the State of North Carolina? I would ask that gentleman to look into the fourteen volumes in the Library of Congress—on the affairs in the insurrectionary States—fourteen volumes of outrages which are like the history of hell and the proceedings of the damned! Fourteen volumes of political outrages the most fiendish in the records of the country! I will call his attention to North Carolina especially, although I do not wish to inaugurate anything like speaking disparagingly of single States. I refer him to the cases of Henry Carpenter, Anderson Dickens, Francis Gilmore, Essie Harris, W. R. Howell, Mrs. Jinks, J. M. Justice, and a dozen more that I have hastily picked out, and the character of these outrages were whippings, hangings, killing, families abused, and men torn from their beds. The record is that these outrages were only committed upon republicans. These all occurred in North Carolina, and I will agree that was the best State of all.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that this is the second picture only, coming immediately after the rebellion. Men were deprived of their rights. The proceedings are recorded in these fourteen volumes. Men were deprived of their liberties in the South. Here I have the report of a committee of Congress showing that it was necessary the power of the National Government should be extended in order to give these men their rights. It was extended under the general power of Government and under these laws upon the statute-book to-day, by democratic votes, that power was restrained, and wrongfully restrained. That is the history of their enactment. Since that time there is another picture. These dark men and loyal republicans of the South have been driven from the polls, intimidated, bulldozed, outraged, threatened at night, armed men in disguise going over the country calling them out and saying, "Do not go to the polls."

Until to-day practically, then, there is no ballot-box, no free and pure elections in the South. In many congressional districts gentlemen on this floor received the unanimous vote of counties, no vote being cast against them. The gentleman from South Carolina thinks they staid away and refused to vote like him, because they could not have the conscience to do it in the presence of a soldier of the country. Not at all; they dare not. Men on this floor represent but three thousand voters at their election. Some gentlemen have five unanimous counties, I believe, in their district. Ah, tell not intelligent America that you have free and fair elections! And now in the forefront of this painting, the fourth scene, we have our characters in full relief. It is a scene in Congress, under the Dome of the Capitol of a Government instituted among men for the preservation of life, liberty, and property, under the flag, and here men who within the ordinary statute of limitations were in arms in the first scene are now demanding as an alternative to a second revolution that the arm of law be shortened, its eye blinded, its ear deafened, its strength palsied, and the citizen, the polls, the election of its own officers, the component parts of its very will—its legislative will—all be abandoned to unrestrained passions, the unbridled prejudices, the frauds, tumults, and menaces of localities—those prime functions of free government there to be denied, deformed, abridged, and abused, making the whole machinery a farce. It is right to guard the use of these, our armies, and their use to preserve the peace.

But the first civil right we all have in coming into society and surrendering our natural rights is protection and peace. A government that is one has power to preserve interior harmony. Were there ever powers as jealously guarded as these? First, it must be a necessity before any armed men can be taken to the place of election at all, (section 5528,) and if one is taken in any other case it is a crime for which a fine and imprisonment may be imposed. Where there is the least attempt to interfere with the election it is a crime, with a penalty of hard labor in the penitentiary. If but a finger is lifted to obstruct a qualified voter from a free exercise of his rights by such armed men, his punishment is severe and sure, (section 5529,) and the least influence upon the officers of the polls by such armed men is a like offense, (section 5531,) and a conviction works a perpetual disfranchisement and disqualification from holding office. I challenge the opposition to suggest an amendment to sections 5528, 5529, 5530, 5531, and 5532 which will add security against the misuse of any military or legally called body of men to protect a free election. Upon examining these sections any fair mind will be convinced that it is not the misuse or interference of troops at polls that is objected to.

Gentlemen have again and again been defied to show an instance of interference or intimidation by troops, and only reply in general assertions. I defy them again, and wait for an answer. It does not come. There is none. Now turn to the other side. Has there been, is there now, and will there be a necessity for the reserve power of the Union soldiers to sustain the arm of the peace officers, State and national. Are elections free, peaceable, fair? Do the weak, the helpless, the timid, the humble, the poor, and the defenseless vote? Have we that first essential of a republican form of government, a free ballot, where each man, whatever his lot or state or race, votes once and once only, and where his ballot is with others honestly cast and counted? I have heard some very reckless statements, but I believe I have yet to hear a single man say that in all parts of this nation such an election is had. The weakness of the case is well indicated by the method attempted to pass it. Every good measure can afford to stand alone in a free country. At least it would bear a fair trial.

But resort is had to what is universally agreed to be bad practice; even the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] says, "only to be resorted to in extreme cases."

Some one has tabulated all the cases where extraneous matter has been introduced into a supply bill, but that was not without consent or not without some other reason better than can be offered in this case. They are not precedents for the deliberate attempt to stop the Government by a bare majority unless an unwilling Executive submits. It is no more a precedent than voluntary payment on the highway is a precedent for highway robbery.

This attempt is more than bad; it is unfriendly to the Government. The tacking political measures upon the supply has always been condemned. I ask to read the following from Hatzel, page 196, second edition, printed in 1796:

> Even where the propositions are separately not liable to objection in either House, the heaping together in one law such a variety of unconnected and discordant subjects is unparliamentary, and tends only to mislead and confound those who have occasion to consult the statute-book upon any particular point. But to do this in cases where it is known that one of the component parts of the bill will be disagreeable to the Crown or to the Lords, and that if it was sent up alone it would not be agreed to—from this cause, and with a view to secure the royal assent or the concurrence of the Lords, to tack it to a bill of supply which the exigencies of the state make necessary, is a proceeding highly dangerous and unconstitutional.

This tacking process has not always been used in the cause of liberty. In 1704 the tories used it to force the passage of the bill "for preventing occasional conformity," on the ground that "schism was a spiritual sin." It was to prevent Protestantism or liberty of conscience. (See Hatsel, 198, volume 3.)

A speech made in 1678 by Lord Chancellor Finch is worthy of this day, though scarcely of that. He says "it takes away the king's negative voice in a manner and forces him to take all or none." I can sympathize with the House of Commons in 1688 in hewing out from the king's despotic throne the constitutional liberty we enjoy; but to use that weapon to destroy powers granted by our Constitution is the way to anarchy. This practice has been condemned by the ablest minds of the democratic party. Thomas H. Benton even condemned the union of two general bills, neither for supply. In the case of the California-Texas compromise bill of 1850 he said:

> I am opposed to mixing subjects which have no affinities. * * * I object to it upon principle—that principle of fair legislation which requires every measure to stand or fall upon its own merits, unaided by stronger measures, unimpeded by weaker ones. I object to it because California herself has objected to it. Her constitution contains this provision:
> "Every law enacted by the Legislature shall contain but one object, and that shall be expressed in the title."
> This is the opinion of California about mixing different subjects together in the process of legislation, and a wise opinion it is; and a wise provision it is to be put in her constitution, and worthy to be put into all constitutions, and very fit and proper to be acted upon by all legislative bodies, whether written down in their constitutions or not. California has doubtless heard of that legislative operation in the old States called "log-rolling," a term which needs no definition in this assembly, and took care, by a fundamental enactment, by a law of constitutional dignity and permanent obligation, to keep it out of her own borders.

Threats are not good arguments with me, even when I may be going a little wrong, much less when I am going precisely right. It is right to consider the admission of California as a separate measure. It is right to do so upon parliamentary principles. It is right to do so upon the principle of fair legislation. * * * We have a right under the Constitution, upon parliamentary law, and upon sixty years' practice, to give her a separate consideration; and are we to be deterred from it by a threat—by a threat of creating an opposition which may keep the State out of the Union if we persist in doing what we have a clear right to do? Are we to capitulate to that threat? Sir, let Washington answer that question. This is what he says of it:

> "All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities are destructive to the fundamental principle (obedience to the established government) and of fatal tendencies. * * * The threat is indeed a serious one. * * * I cannot surrender. * * * It is among the first of such attempts, and we should resist at the beginning. All history tells us that confederacies are ruined by anarchy among the members rather than by tyranny in the head."

I commend this democratic authority of such high rank to the combination on the other side. Mr. Benton never dreamed of the iniquity of this bill—the threat, not to keep out a State, but to destroy the whole Government, to ruin the whole.

And even the great Kentucky Commoner would not justify it. In reply to Benton, on the same bill, he said:

> The union of these three measures in one bill has been objected to, and has been already very much discussed in the Senate. Out of respect to the Senator from Missouri and to the Senate, I feel myself called upon to give some answer to the argument which he addressed to the Senate some days ago to show that it was improper to connect them together.
> Now, sir, either the Senator from Missouri or myself totally misunderstands what is meant by Hatsel in the use of the word "tacking." We have no such thing as tacking in the English sense of the term. Jefferson has no chapter in his Manual on this subject of tacking. * * * The practice of tacking in England is confined to money bills. Knowing that a money bill is obliged to be passed without any alteration or amendment in the Lords, the Commons in England frequently, when they have a public object or measure to carry out, tack that measure to a money bill and send it to the House of Lords. They know that the overruling necessity of the aristocracy and of the Crown is such that they must for the sake of the money granted to them agree to that clause, favorable perhaps to liberty or to something else that is tacked onto it.
> You find in the third volume of Hatsel that he has a chapter on the subject of bills tacked to bills of supply. I repeat, sir, that we have no such thing as that tacking process in this country.

The practice is condemned by the sovereign people in almost every State in this Union in their organic act. In Alabama, California, Florida, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maryland, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New York, Ohio, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia it is provided in the constitutions that "no bill shall embrace more than one subject." Missouri's constitution says "no bill except general appropriation bills, which may embrace the various subjects and accounts for and on account of which moneys are appropriated, or the issuing of bonds therefor, shall contain more than one subject." New Jersey says, "to avoid improper influences which may result from intermixing in one and the same act such things as have no proper relation to each other, every law shall embrace but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." Delaware says "nor shall any matter or clause whatever not immediately relating to and necessary for raising revenue be in any manner blended with or annexed to a bill for raising revenue." Maine, Kentucky, and Louisiana say, in the language of the United States Constitution, "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the house of representatives; but the senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills," provided that they shall not introduce any new matter which does not relate to raising revenue. So that the American people are arrayed against it both in letter and spirit.

One word as to Rule 120: an amendment must be germane; germane to the Army or germane to appropriations. I say beyond a question it is to be germane to appropriations—germane to raising revenue; the item of accounts, Army, Navy, civil service, or what not, is but an accident, they are not the subject-matter. The blindest would see at once the amendment was not germane to the appropriation bill; therefore the Chair ruled it was germane to the account for which the money was to be paid, the Army.

Next, it must retrench; that is, the change in existing law must reduce salary or other expenditure already fixed. Here again the wayfarer may read the rule, if that construction is correct, plainly enough to see it does not retrench; but the Chair construes differently, and goes out into the shoreless sea of speculation—of how, may be, by some means, this might some time keep troops from moving where the moving would cost more than the expense of riot, tumult, fraud in election, contested seats, investigating committees, &c.; therefore it m-i-g-h-t retrench. Therefore, being within the scope of the accidents of the items of the bill and within the range of imaginary possibilities of retrenchment, it is in order.

I am in favor of that rule being made, if possible, plainer in its denying all amendments except for the subjects of appropriations and to reduce existing amounts.

I am in favor of a constitutional amendment prohibiting any general legislation upon supply bills. And, unlike my greenback friend, I shall vote in accordance with these principles for which I speak, and against every and all bills now and forever which tack such extraneous matter to bills of supply.

One word more. I am acting and I hope others are also acting with the fearful consequences of the logical results of this forced issue full in view. On the one hand it presents the disintegration of national government: the erection in the House of Representatives of a political partisan despotism, which at will may be used to accomplish any result determined upon in a caucus; the majority in caucus will rule it; the caucus of a party will rule it; to it the men of better judgment, like the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] bow, as he now does, in the House; the majority in the House rules it, and the imperious necessity of supply rules the unwilling Senate or the unwilling President—and this is to be America. On the other hand it presents the deliberate obstruction to the constitutional existence of the Government. This, some have said, is one method of national death in a constitutional republic. Never, sir. This Government is perpetual.

I hope no unfriendly survivor of the rebellion fancies that in so easy a transfer from the field to the forms of law this Republic can be made to fall to ruins without the firing of a gun. The dream is as false as the phantom of a peaceable secession. This nation in its Executive possesses the power to compel the internal harmonious exercise of its functions of life. He must preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution, and see that the laws are faithfully executed. There is no provision made, there is no possibility left unguarded, by which it can be violently or peaceably destroyed. It can never become, in the jealous preservation of the distribution of its constitutional powers, destructive of its ends. Therefore, standing with unshaken truth to these principles, as we will, the right of revolution itself can never exist. The alternative of this most unpatriotic demand upon us logically is a resort to the war power of this nation, as in 1861.

You say, suppose States refuse to elect Representatives or Senators? Suppose the Senate or the House by a determined purpose adjourn at noon each day? Suppose either resolves to proceed no further in support of the Government? What remedy? Why, gentlemen, in the same catalogue of voluntary powers, suppose the States secede from all connection with the Union, as the gentleman from Mississippi says—"peaceably secedes?" What remedy? I will tell you what remedy—WAR!

The gentlemen forget that all well-organized bodies have involuntary powers.

Behind the constitutional exercise of voluntary powers there sleeps the war power of this nation, ever ready to preserve its constitutional existence, to enforce its laws, to defend its undying transmittal to the latest generation.

Suppose the House resolves to pass no further bills until its despotic demands are met and the supplies of national life are cut off; then the last hope of a free people is in the Executive. He must enforce the laws, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution, and sacredly keep his registered oath in heaven. God grant the necessity may not so soon be whelmed upon this people; but if it must come by a call of the Chief Magistrate, money and men will pour forth like water to defeat a second revolution. Dream not, men of the South, that you, in renewing the attack upon another supposed vulnerable point of this nation, are walking in the way of peace. Let no voice from any quarter mislead you. Judge not the people of America so unwisely. I tell you, behind every weak joint in the constitutional armor of the American Union is masked and ambushed the batteries of war and the serried ranks of millions of men, and over it all is the sleepless eye of the jealous affections of the people. There is no party at that point. There, as the great Douglas said, each man must be either a patriot or a traitor. And we are near to that dividing line to-day. God grant that in the lowering future we may not have again to cross it.

I would fain believe you, but try us. I hope the loyal functions once characteristic of the democratic party will assert themselves. I hope that the wise counsels of such able men as the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will yet prevail, that reason and judgment will yet be restored, and that the love of country will gain the ascendency over partisan impatience, and all will bow to constitution instead of caucus.

Mr. SPARKS. I rise, sir, for the purpose of moving the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. BAKER. On so important a proposition as this I think debate should not be closed.

Mr. SPARKS. I think it should.

Mr. BAKER. There are questions of law involved here which should be considered for a moment.

Mr. SPARKS. I have made my motion.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SPARKS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume consideration of the Army appropriation bill; and, pending that, I move that all debate on the pending section and the amendments thereto be closed in two minutes.

Mr. CONGER. Let us understand the proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state it.

Mr. BAKER. Let ten minutes longer be allowed for debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the Army appropriation bill; and, pending that, he moves that when the House shall again go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider the bill, all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto be closed in two minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. We had better include the whole bill.

Mr. BAKER. That cannot be done, I understand, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPARKS. My motion is that the debate be closed on the section and the amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. Technically, the gentleman from Indiana has the right to object to closing debate on the bill; but practically, this being the only remaining portion of the bill, the motion reaches the whole purpose which the gentleman from Illinois has in view.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is, if we treat all the other sections as having been read and passed.

The SPEAKER. They have been read and passed.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that the intention now is to close all debate on amendments; but that amendments may still be offered to section 6. The motion is to close all debate?

The SPEAKER. On the section.

Mr. GARFIELD. All debate.

Mr. CONGER. It is understood, however, that it will be in order to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER. The rule does not exclude amendments.

Mr. SPARKS. Amendments may still be offered without debate.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to that if amendments are admitted.

The motion of Mr. SPARKS, to close debate, was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto is limited to two minutes.

Mr. SPARKS. I yield those two minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. WAIT.]

Mr. WAIT. I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] for the courtesy which he has extended to me at this time. I know how very impatient the committee must naturally have become under the protracted and wearying debate of the last few days. It is patent, however, to all that in the few minutes given to me I could not indulge, were I even so inclined, in any parade of words or a speech spun out by glittering generalities.

I believe that the minority in the House, as a body, would not be seriously opposed to the amendment now under consideration, had not measures revolutionary in their character been resorted to to accomplish what could be done in a much better way. Had the proposition to change the act of February, 1865, permitting the use of troops at the polls to preserve the peace, been presented as an independent measure, it would most likely have commanded the support of a majority of both branches of Congress; but when such an amendment is appended to an appropriation bill, it is in fact a violation of the rules of the House, for it is legislation not germane to the bill, not in the line of retrenchment, revolutionary in its character, and dangerous in its tendencies. In this opinion I am sustained by some of the ablest statesmen that have ever been honored with seats in either House of Congress.

But this aspect of the question has been so ably presented by many gentlemen who have preceded me that I do not propose to discuss it.

I wish to call attention, in the fewest words possible, to the principal reason given by our friends on the other side of the House why they are so urgent to effect a repeal of the Federal election laws, and by this particular amendment to prevent the use of United States troops to secure peace at the polls and protect electors in the full exercise of their legitimate rights. The ground of complaint to such use of troops, as I understand it, is that in many of the Southern States voters who were members of the democratic party have been by the presence of the troops embarrassed in the enjoyment of their rights as freemen; that if the troops did not directly interfere with this class of voters and prevent their exercising their rights, they indirectly by their presence intimidated many of them in different localities and led them through fear of personal violence to remain away from the polls. I will now call attention to facts that certainly shed light upon, and in my opinion completely refute, this claim.

In the investigation of the facts in the case of Tillman against Smalls, before the Committee on Elections of the last Congress, in which as a member of that committee I took an active part, the evidence adduced before the committee went to establish in the most conclusive manner an entirely opposite array of facts from those assumed to be correct by many of the gentlemen who have addressed the committee in support of the amendment.

On the hearing before the committee to determine which of the two gentlemen, Mr. Tillman or Mr. Smalls, was entitled to a seat in this House from the fifth congressional district of South Carolina, it was clearly proven by undisputed official returns that in those counties where the greatest number of United States troops, officers, and privates were stationed, the greater vote was given for the democratic nominees and the lesser for the candidates of the republican party. In Edgefield County, where there were two hundred and twenty-one officers and enlisted men, Mr. Smalls, the republican candidate, received 2,092 votes, and Mr. Tillman, his democratic opponent, received 2,972. In Barnwell County, where were stationed near the polls one hundred and seventy-four enlisted men and officers, 2,113 votes were cast for Mr. Smalls and 2,175 for Mr. Tillman. In the county of Colleton, eighty-nine officers and enlisted men only were stationed on the day of election, divided among the several places where votes were received. Yet here Mr. Smalls rolled up 1,531 votes and Mr. Tillman received but 498. In Beaufort town, which is the only place where votes are cast in Beaufort County, but twenty-three men and officers were present, yet Mr. Smalls obtained 561 votes and Mr. Tillman but 114.

The table that I hold in my hand, and which I wish to be incorporated in my remarks, gives in detail the facts to which I have called the attention of the committee, and proves conclusively that the republican candidate for Congress derived no advantage whatever from the presence of the troops:

It must be obvious, then, to every unprejudiced mind, from the facts developed by the investigations of the Committee of Elections, in the case to which I have referred, that the presence of Federal troops in that congressional district of South Carolina did not intimidate, overawe, or repel from the polls any democratic electors, or in any manner embarrass them in the fullest and most independent exercise of all the rights enjoyed by American citizens.

The sole object which the act of 1865 was intended to accomplish was to preserve peace and good order at the polls and protect every man, black or white, rich or poor, in the unembarrassed and the fullest enjoyment of all the privileges that the Constitution of the United States bestows upon him.

So far as I have been able to follow the discussion in the committee on the pending amendment there has not been presented by any gentleman who has mingled in the debate one spark of evidence tending to show that any body of men or any single individual has been in any manner interrupted or annoyed in the exercise of the elective franchise by the presence of troops. Has any man, I ask the committee, possessing the legal right to vote, been robbed of that right by the military power of the General Government?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on the pending section is now closed. The question will first be on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "civil" in lines 4 and 12 of section 6.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 115, noes 135.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. SPARKS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 122, noes 137.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BOWMAN. I move to amend by inserting after line 8 that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Or unless they shall be summoned and called to his aid as a posse comitatus of his district by the marshal or other officer of the United States empowered to summon a posse comitatus as provided in section 2024 of the Revised Statutes.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to amend by adding to the section that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any person or persons who shall, by violence, force, threats, or menaces, disturb any public assemblage of voters convened for the purpose of listening to speeches, or for any other lawful purpose, in any campaign pending for the election of Representatives in Congress, or who shall, by threats or menaces, endeavor to procure a division of time in speaking at any such meeting or assemblage, shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 and imprisoned at hard labor not less than three months nor more than three years.

Mr. CARLISLE. I rise to a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. Do not make a point of order.

Mr. CARLISLE. We have a great body of laws now to protect the citizen.

Mr. BAKER. I would like to hear the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] will state his point of order.

Mr. CARLISLE. My point of order is this: the proposed amendment is not germane to the pending bill. It is a bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.

Mr. WILBER. And what else?

Mr. CARLISLE. The proposed amendment is a provision to impose penalties upon a citizen of the United States for interfering with what are supposed to be, and what I admit are, the rights of other citizens with reference to elections. I perhaps would not make this point of order were it not for the fact that our statute-books now contain the fullest and most elaborate provisions that could be devised by our friends on the other side, during the time they had control of the Congress of the United States, for the protection of the citizens in their rights guaranteed to or secured to him by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. Can you not improve on it?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to be heard upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman, if there be no objection.

Mr. COFFROTH. I object.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to reply to the remarks made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] upon the point of order. I think I have a right to do so, and that no gentleman can object to my doing so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BAKER. It is not true, as I will undertake to show, that our statute-books are full of laws for the protection of the rights of voters, in the event that this Army bill shall pass with this section 6 included in it.

It is true, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] that this bill professes to be and is an Army appropriation bill. But it is more than that; it is a bill that proposes, in addition to making appropriations for the support of the Army, to provide that no civil officer of the United States shall call out the good men of his bailiwick for the purpose of protecting the citizen engaged in the exercise of his lawful right to vote on election day.

I desire the especial attention of the Chair a single moment, while I undertake to show that if this section 6 were to pass in its present shape there will not be a single shadow of power left under the law of the land by virtue of which any marshal of the United States armed with any process from any Federal court will be able to call a single able-bodied citizen of his bailiwick to assist him in executing his writ or suppressing any violence, either on the day of election or at any other time. Do I understand that that is what gentleman are aiming at? I think I heard the observation that they propose that the officers of the law with Federal processes in their hands, issued by the Federal court, shall not have the power, when met by armed resistance, to call the posse comitatus to aid them in executing them. I thank gentlemen for their candid, their honest admission. I doubt not it comes from the bottom of the heart of the gentleman who made it.

Mr. ELLIS. No such admission was made.

Mr. BAKER. Now to the point of order. I said that this section 6 does not touch the Army at all. It is simply a pretense when it is alleged that it interferes with or influences or changes the power of the President or of the marshal one single jot or tittle from what it is to-day. Section 15 of the act of June 18, 1878, provides:

That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by an act of Congress.

Now, I undertake to say that there is no express authority conferred anywhere to use any portion of the Army for that purpose. Therefore the pretense that it is necessary to pass this section in order to keep the Army either from the polls or from being used as part of the posse comitatus is not correct in fact. It cannot now be used for either of those purposes.

But the civil power can now use the good citizens of the bailiwick for the purpose of enforcing the laws. And when you pass this section it will have no force or effect except as to civil officers. It will strip the civil officer of the power he now has to call in the posse comitatus of citizens, not of soldiers, to enable him to execute the process placed in his hands.

I insist, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that this section has nothing to do, as the law stands to-day, with the Army being used as a posse or being otherwise used at the polls or anywhere else. It simply affects the right of the body of the people to be called out as a posse comitatus by the marshal to execute process and to maintain peace at the polls. That being so, this section being as I have undertaken to show confined in its operation and effect to the duty of the citizen of the United States in obeying the marshal when called upon as a part of the posse comitatus, my amendment is germane to the section, because it affects the duties and obligations of the same body of people, to wit, the citizens.

Mr. COX. This matter can be stated in one word. The proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] is to establish a code of penal statutes affecting civilians—citizens; and therefore it has no business upon an Army bill.

Mr. REED. The section affects civilians.

Mr. COX. No, sir; the bill is a restraint upon military officers.

Mr. REED and Mr. BAKER. And civil officers.

Mr. COX. The provision is that civil officers shall not use the Army. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Everybody can see that the gentlemen are not logical, or there would not be so much clamor. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. As the gentleman from Indiana has stated, by the statute as it now stands the Army is already excluded from being called to the aid of any civil officer. It is here in this law further provided that he shall not call out troops or "armed men"—any armed men other than the Army; the good people of the bailiwick, with sufficient arms to make a stand in favor of law and order against the bludgeon or the knife. This law in effect declares that the civil processes of the law and the law officer, standing in the interest of peace and good order, shall not have behind him the good citizens of the country to whom by the Constitution is secured the right, which cannot be denied them, of bearing arms in protection of their rights and the peace and good order of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide the question of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE.] This proposed amendment relates entirely to citizens or unofficial persons, and if enacted would prescribe certain penalties for disturbing political meetings and interfering with persons in the exercise of the elective franchise. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not germane to a bill making provision for the support of the Army.

In reference to the other point raised that no protection is left to the voter in case the military power as proposed in this section is taken away, the Chair requests the Clerk to read sections 5506, 5507, and 5520 of the Revised Statutes, which will still remain in force on that subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5506. Every person who, by any unlawful means, hinders, delays, prevents, or obstructs, or combines and confederates with others to hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct, any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote, or from voting at any election in any State, Territory, district, county, city, parish, township, school-district, municipality, or other territorial subdivision, shall be fined not less than $500, or be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than one year, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 5507. Every person who prevents, hinders, controls, or intimidates another from exercising, or in exercising the right of suffrage, to whom that right is guaranteed by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, by means of bribery or threats of depriving such person of employment or occupation, or of ejecting such person from a rented house, lands, or other property, or by threats of refusing to renew leases or contracts for labor, or by threats of violence to himself or family, shall be punished as provided in the preceding section.

SEC. 5520. If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire to prevent by force, intimidation, or threat, any citizen who is lawfully entitled to vote, from giving his support or advocacy, in a legal manner, toward or in favor of the election of any lawfully qualified person as an elector for President or Vice-President, or as a member of the Congress of the United States; or to injure any citizen in person or property on account of such support or advocacy; each of such persons shall be punished by a fine of not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. FRYE. The Chair having had read these sections defining penalties, I now ask him to inform the committee how the law can be enforced, provided no United States marshal or deputy marshal or other civil officer can call armed men to his assistance at the polls?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a proper parliamentary question. The Chair would be pleased to answer the argument of the gentleman upon the floor.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that the Chair is willing to answer, if his friends on the other side will permit him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not ask permission to answer now.

Mr. BENNETT. I offer the following amendment:

Amend section 6 by adding at the end of line 8 the following:

Provided, That it shall be the duty of the officers in command of military posts or detachments within any of the Territories, when called upon by the civil authorities of such Territories, to aid, with a sufficient military force, in the capture of persons charged with the commission of crime, either against the laws of the United States or the Territory.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BREWER. I move to amend by adding at the end of the section the following:

But this act shall in no way limit the right or power of the civil officers of the Government to keep the peace at the polls at such time as is prescribed by law for the election of Representatives in Congress.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, it was declared not agreed to.

Mr. BREWER. This amendment is of such importance that I ask for a vote by tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BREWER and Mr. SPARKS were appointed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman from Michigan to modify his amendment by inserting after "Representatives" the words "and Delegates."

Mr. BREWER. I will do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to modify his amendment.

Mr. SPARKS. Then I make a point of order upon it.

Mr. BREWER. I withdraw the modification.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 117, noes 136.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out of section 6 all after the words "Revised Statutes," in the second line, and insert "and section 5528 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby, repealed;" so that section 6, when amended, will read as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 2002 of the Revised Statutes and section 5528 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CONGER. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER and Mr. SPARKS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 109, noes 136.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. LAPHAM. I move the following amendment.

At the end of line 18, section 6, add the following:

And any such officer or other person who shall appear, armed with a deadly weapon of any description, at any such place where a general or special election for the choice of a Representative or Representatives in Congress shall be held, except for the purposes aforesaid, shall, on conviction, be liable to the punishment hereinbefore provided.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 130.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CASWELL. I move an amendment to strike out from line 11 to line 18 inclusive. That will leave the old penalty still in force——

Mr. SPARKS. I object to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CARLISLE. Let the words be read which the gentleman proposes to strike out.

Mr. CASWELL. Yes; I ask they be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the words proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 84, noes 125.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. The section is now perfected, and I move to strike it out.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the pending motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand tellers on that motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPARKS and Mr. LOWE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 122, noes 135.

So the motion to strike out was disagreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I now move the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. SPARKS. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to allow me to have a vote on my amendment.

Mr. SPARKS. I cannot do so.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The amendments of the committee were concurred in.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was engrossed and read the third time; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FRYE demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 148, nays 122, not voting 16; as follows:

YEAS—148.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. COX. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MILLER. If he were here, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. BUCKNER. My colleague, Mr. WELLS, is paired with Mr. BUTTERWORTH, of Ohio. If present, my colleague would vote "ay" and Mr. BUTTERWORTH "no."

Mr. KING. My colleague, Mr. ACKLEN, is paired with Mr. HUBBELL, of Michigan. If present, Mr. ACKLEN would vote "ay" and I suppose Mr. HUBBELL would vote "no."

Mr. BAYNE. I am paired with Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. BINGHAM. My colleague, Mr. HARMER, is paired with Mr. BEALE, of Virginia. If present, Mr. HARMER would vote "no" and Mr. BEALE would vote "ay."

Mr. FORD. My colleague, Mr. BLAND, is paired with Mr. RUSSELL, of North Carolina.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. SPARKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TUESDAY.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope that motion will not prevail.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 159, noes 83.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. EWING and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nays 109, not voting 22; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. CLYMER was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAYES. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. HAYES. I will hear it.

Mr. KEIFER. I think there will be no objection to it. I send it to the Clerk's desk.

STATIONERY FOR MEMBERS, ETC.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House issue to members and officers of the House such necessary stationery as may be required; and he shall have authority to use any unexpended moneys belonging to the stationery fund to supply necessary articles which are not now on hand; that issued to members to be charged against them and accounted for when appropriation is hereafter made.

Mr. SPARKS. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. BUTTERWORTH, until Wednesday next;

To Mr. DICK, indefinitely, on account of sickness;

To Mr. WELLS, for one week;

To Mr. O'CONNOR, until the 14th instant;

To Mr. CANNON, of Utah, for five days; and

To Mr. HUBBELL, for ten days, on account of sickness.

Mr. HAYES. I now renew the motion that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of citizens of Ohio, for the passage of the Reagan interstate-commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 7, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the Senate was asked.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay the bill before the Senate.

The bill was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 31st of March, 1879, information in relation to the manner in which cars and bonded warehouses containing appraised and unappraised goods are secured to prevent frauds on the revenue; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and, on motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the acting Chief of Engineers upon a provision in the sundry civil bill approved March 3, 1879, discontinuing the geographical surveys west of the one hundredth meridian under the War Department after June 30, 1879, as well as other surveys under the direction of the Interior Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. COCKRELL presented concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri, in reference to the copyright of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and in favor of such legislation as will vest the same in the Secretary of State; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, presented the petition of David H. Myers, late private Company A, Second Regiment New Jersey Cavalry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, presented the petition of Robert Erwin, a citizen of Savannah, Georgia, praying compensation for property taken from him by the military authorities of the United States during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a petition accompanied by various papers, one of which is a bill which passed the Senate at the last session, for the relief of Ann M. Paulding, widow of Hiram Paulding, late senior rear-admiral of the United States Navy. I move its reference to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the petition of John Beeson, who seems to be a citizen of Oregon, who speaks in his petition of services which he has rendered the Government, and for which he asks compensation. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN presented a memorial of Miller Brothers and others, manufacturers of cigars in Dayton, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of any act by Congress making a change in the present method of stamping cigars by attaching a so-called coupon stamp; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Solomon S. Robinson, late captain and brevet major, Sixteenth United States Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of H. A. McCarthy, of Saint Mary's, Kansas, praying compensation for services rendered the Government as scout during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of C. C. Phillips, of Iowa, praying for additional compensation for services rendered the Government during the late war as assistant surgeon of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of W. S. Handley, late a private in Company H, First Iowa Cavalry, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of William N. R. Beale, of Missouri, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LOGAN. I present the memorial of William B. Walker and upward of 200 others, members of the Board of Trade of Chicago, Illinois, in favor of the passage of a law authorizing all railroad companies to construct and maintain telegraph lines for the use of the public as well as themselves, on the ground, as they allege, that the expense connected with telegraphing under the present system is so great as to be a serious burden to the business and commerce of the country. I understand that the proposition to which this memorial refers is already in an appropriation bill, and I move its reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE presented the petition of Absalom Kirby, passed assistant engineer United States Navy, praying to be allowed the pay of his present grade in the Navy from the 11th of October, 1866, to the time he was restored to the active list; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Cora A. Slocomb and others, citizens of Louisiana, praying for a return of moneys alleged to have been illegally taken from them by the United States authorities; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

BENJAMIN P. RUNKLE.

Mr. McDONALD. On the 10th day of January, 1878, the Senate referred to the Committee on the Judiciary a resolution relating to the restoration of Benjamin P. Runkle to the Army. On the 3d of March, 1879, a majority report was made from the Judiciary Committee by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and myself desire to submit the views of the minority to the Senate in dissenting from that report, which I now present, and move that the views of the minority be laid on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS. By request I ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, and I ask that it lie on the table; I shall move its reference hereafter.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 349) for the relief of the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 350) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Erwin;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 351) to extend the time for filing claims for horses and equipments lost by officers and enlisted men in the service of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 352) for the relief of Frank D. Yates; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 353) to enable the State of Colorado to reclaim certain waste lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 354) for the relief of Jacob and Elizabeth Sener; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALLISON. At the request of a member of the House, Mr. DEERING, of Iowa, I ask leave to introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on Pensions.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 355) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Upright; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLISON. Accompanying the bill I present a letter from the Secretary of War, under date of February 11, 1879, addressed to Mr. DEERING, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SLATER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 356) to transfer the control and management of Indian affairs from the Interior to the War Department; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 357) to provide for coinage at the branch mint at Denver, Colorado; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 358) granting a pension to Nelson Roosevelt; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 359) to repeal the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad grant; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 360) repealing the charter of the National Capitol Insurance Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PENDLETON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 361) to restore W. M. Beede, jr., to his former rank in the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 362) granting a pension to Martha A. Williamson; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to introduce a bill without previous notice, granting an increase of pension to James C. McCarty, of Jackson County, Missouri, and to accompany the bill with a petition numerously signed by leading, influential citizens of that county, asking for this increase, as Mr. McCarty was a soldier in the war of 1812, is now eighty-four years old, served four distinct terms, and was honorably discharged each time.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 363) granting an increase of pension to James C. McCarty; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 364) for the relief of Samuel A. Lowe; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Hardie Hogan Helper; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on the file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THURMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 366) for the relief of David W. Stockstill; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) authorizing the printing of a portrait of the late Joseph Henry to accompany the memorial volume heretofore ordered; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. PLUMB submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ACCOUNTS OF JOHN I. DAVENPORT.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a statement of all sums of money which have, in 1870 and in each year since, been paid out of the Treasury to John I. Davenport, either as chief supervisor of elections, clerk of the United States circuit court, United States court commissioner, or in any other official capacity, or for any service or disbursement whatever; distinguishing between payments as chief supervisor, clerk of the circuit court, or United States commissioner, and for other services or disbursement; and to transmit to the Senate transcripts of any and all bills, accounts, or claims on which such sums were paid to the said Davenport, and all official correspondence respecting such accounts, claims, auditing, and payment.

Mr. CONKLING. That seems to be a good resolution as far as it goes, but I should like it to lie over so that it may be made a little more capacious, perhaps.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be directed to furnish to the Senate a schedule of the water rents now charged and collected in said District; what changes may be made therein in order that they may bear equitably upon all classes of water takers; and what increase, if any, is required in said rates to provide for the just and proper expenses of the water department; together with the amount now collected, and what amount will be realized from such increased rates. Also, what arrearages are due for water rents or water-mains, and what steps, if any, have been taken for their collection.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD FREIGHT DISCRIMINATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish to the Senate any and all reports made to him by the Quartermaster-General of the United States Army about the month of October in the year 1878, and prior and subsequent to that date, of any discrimination made by the Union Pacific Railroad Company in favor of private shippers as against the United States, and all correspondence relating thereto.

LEGISLATION ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no further business for the morning hour, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of its unfinished business.

Mr. HEREFORD. At the last sitting of the Senate I gave notice that to-day I should move to take from the table the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] for the purpose of submitting some remarks upon it, but inasmuch as the question involved in the unfinished business is one of high privilege, I do not desire to antagonize that, but shall ask to take up the resolution to which I have referred and be heard upon it as soon as the pending matter is disposed of.

SENATOR FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate will proceed with its unfinished business, being the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, "that Hon. Charles H. Bell is not entitled to a seat as a Senator by virtue of the appointment by the executive of New Hampshire;" and the pending question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to strike out from the resolution the word "not" before the word "entitled."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the failure on the part of the Legislature of New Hampshire to elect a successor to Mr. Wadleigh, whose term of service expired on the 3d of March, 1879, was followed by an executive appointment of Hon. Mr. Bell, who now claims a seat on the floor of the Senate in virtue of that appointment. The question presented is whether, under the third section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, Mr. Bell is entitled to a seat on this floor. The Constitution declares, in the section to which I refer, that—

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years.

* * * * * * *

Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year; of the second class, at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class, at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

It seems to have been manifestly the intention and purpose of the framers of the Constitution in adopting this section of the first article not only to confer upon the Legislature of a State the right, but to make it a duty, upon the expiration of a Senator's term, to choose for him a successor, and further to provide that after one shall be thus chosen, if by resignation, by the accident of death or otherwise, there should be a vacancy in the term for which a choice had thus been made, to confer upon the executive, if the vacancy occured during a recess of the Legislature, the right to make a temporary appointment until the next meeting of the Legislature. But we may derive some light, and be instructed somewhat by looking into the history of this clause of the Constitution, and with that view I invite for a moment the attention of Senators to the Madison Papers, to the debates that occurred in the convention, and the motions and resolutions which were adopted, whereby this clause became a part and parcel of the Constitution.

It will be remembered that in the convention propositions were submitted in the form of resolutions by Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, and in the form of a constitution by Mr. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina. After days had been spent in the discussion of the propositions involved in the two plans which had thus been presented, it will be remembered that certain agreements were made, certain resolutions were adopted, certain conclusions were reached, and a committee of detail, as it was called, was appointed in order to throw into shape the resolutions and conclusions of the convention. That committee made a report to the convention, and I ask leave to read this article of the constitution as it was reported by that committee. The clause as reported by the committee reads as follows:

ARTICLE V.

SECTION 1. The Senate of the United States shall be chosen by the Legislatures of the several States. Each Legislature shall choose two members. Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the Legislature. Each member shall have one vote.

SEC. 2. The Senators shall be chosen for six years; but immediately after the first election they shall be divided into three classes, as nearly as may be, numbered 1, 2, and 3. The seats of members of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year; of the second class, at the expiration of the fourth year; of the third class, at the expiration of the sixth year; so that a third part of the members may be chosen every second year.

Now, let us go back for one moment and consider what was reported in this article. We find,

First. That the Senate of the United States should consist of two Senators from each State.

Second. That these Senators should be chosen by the Legislatures of the different States.

Third. That immediately after the first election they should be divided into three classes, so that a third part of the members would be chosen every second year.

Fourth. That vacancies should be (or may be) supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the Legislature.

If language is capable of expressing an idea with any sort of precision this means that two Senators should be chosen by the Legislature of each State, to hold office for the term of six years; that one-third part of the whole number of Senators should be chosen every second year, and if vacancies should occur (or happen) in the seats thus filled by the Legislature they should be supplied until the next meeting of the Legislature, which, as the constituent of the senatorial body, should make a choice.

The propositions thus reported were brought before the convention on the 9th of August, 1787, for discussion, when

Mr. WILSON objected to vacancies in the Senate being supplied by the executives of the States. It was unnecessary, as the Legislature will meet so frequently.

* * * * * * *

Mr. RANDOLPH thought it necessary, in order to prevent inconvenient chasms in the Senate.

* * * * * * *

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Senators may resign or not accept.

I ask attention to this expression and to the action of the convention following immediately thereon:

Senators may resign or not accept. This provision is therefore absolutely necessary.

The provision was retained, but immediately after on the page following of the record of the debate—

Mr. MADISON, in order to prevent doubts whether resignation could be made by Senators, or whether they could refuse to accept, moved to strike out the words after "vacancies," and insert the words "happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the Legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the Legislature.

So that that clause of the Constitution shall read:

Vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied—by the Legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the Legislature.

It is very clear that doubts were entertained whether under the section as repealed by the committee, the exercise of the power to choose a Senator for six years did not exhaust the power of the Legislature if the Senator should live through the term. He might refuse to accept the office; he might wish to resign; he might be promoted to another office; he might be expelled. The doubt was whether in either of these events a successor could be elected by the Legislature or appointed by the executive. Hence the words employed, "vacancies happening by refusals to accept, resignation, or otherwise, may be supplied by the Legislature of the State in which such vacancy shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the Legislature."

I have shown that original vacancies, that is, vacancies caused by the expiration of the term, could not have been filled by the executive, according to the plain and manifest intent of this article, as reported by the committee on detail. We see above that it was not the intention of the mover of this amendment nor of the convention in adopting the amendment to confer this power, but to provide for accidental, unexpected vacancies that could not be foreseen and would or might "happen," as by refusal to accept, by resignation, or otherwise—that is, might occur by other accidental or fortuitous circumstances.

The section as amended meant this and nothing more.

The Legislature was authorized to elect for a term of six years.

But vacancies might happen. How happen? By resignation, by refusal to accept, or otherwise by accidental and unforeseen contingencies or events.

In such case the Legislature, if sitting, should fill the remainder of the term; or, if it was not in session, the executive should appoint until the next meeting of the Legislature.

The language employed by Gouverneur Morris, who seconded the amendment offered by Mr. Madison, strengthens the conclusion I have reached. He said:

This is absolutely necessary; otherwise, as members chosen into the Senate are disqualified from being appointed to any office by section 9 of this article, it will be in the power of the Legislature—

Not by refusing to appoint, for it was assumed that that duty would be discharged—

it will be in the power of a Legislature, by appointing a man against his consent—

One who will not accept, or one who may choose to resign—to deprive the United States of his services.—

Unless the amendment shall be adopted.

Now, Mr. President, the clause thus amended on the motion of Mr. Madison went to another committee. It was not thereafter discussed or debated. This was regarded as settling the purpose and intent of the framers of the Constitution in regard to vacancies in the office of a Senator. A committee was appointed in September, 1787, to revise the style and arrangement of the articles which had been agreed on by the convention. What articles? The articles agreed upon, and among others the one which we have just now been discussing, and which expressed the sense of the convention and the intent and purpose of the convention in regard to the question of vacancies.

That committee, mark you, was not charged with the duty, nor was it authorized to change in the slightest respect the sense of the articles which had been referred to it. It was a committee simply upon style, a committee to arrange and to place in proper order the various resolutions which had been debated and adopted by the convention. Therefore, when the committee made its final report to the convention of the form and frame of the Constitution containing section 3, article 1, as it now appears in the Constitution, it is evident that it would have been a gross violation of the trust and confidence which had been reposed in it by the convention to have changed in the slightest degree the sense of the resolution which had been adopted. It was the duty of this committee to arrange the order and method in which the various powers of this Government then proposed should be developed. It was the duty of the committee simply to give expression in proper language and proper words to the ideas which had dominated in that body and to the resolutions which the body had agreed on. Therefore I say, Mr. President, when we read this section 3 of article 1 of the Constitution, we must read it in the sense and give to it identically the same meaning that we would give to the article as shaped by the convention before it was sent to the committee.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that the reading of the history of this clause of the Constitution settles, and settles definitely and conclusively, the question. But it has a history that is beyond that. In the year 1801, when Mr. Tracy, of Connecticut, under circumstances very similar to those that are presented in this case, was appointed by the governor of the State of Connecticut as his own successor to begin a term which had then just expired, the question was made in the Senate of the United States whether the governor was clothed by the Constitution with the authority to make the appointment. It was very considerably debated, and by a party vote of 13 to 10 he was admitted to a seat. On the very next day another similar case was presented to the Senate and decided in the same way. At a time anterior to that, when Mr. Cocke, of Tennessee, presented his credentials, having been appointed by the governor of Tennessee to begin a term, he was admitted without discussion and without debate. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] supposes that at that time a construction was placed upon the Constitution by persons many of whom had been instrumental in framing it and who were then sitting as members of the Senate. I have taken the pains to examine, and I find that in 1797 not one of those who participated in the framing of the Constitution was a Senator in the Congress of the United States.

The precedent in Tracy's case was followed in 1803, again in 1809, in 1813, and in 1817. But in 1825 the question was again presented to the Senate. It was probably brought to the attention of Senators by reason of very earnest and heated discussions which had taken place in 1822 in regard to the meaning of the word "happen," occurring in that section of the Constitution that gives to the President the power temporarily to fill all vacancies that may happen in a recess of the Senate.

The constitutional term of Mr. Lanman, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, had expired. He was appointed to be his own successor by the executive of that State, and the power to make the appointment was claimed upon the ground that the term had expired during a recess of the State Legislature.

When Mr. Lanman offered to take a seat in the Senate objection was made, and thus was presented the question whether the executive of a State had under the Constitution the power to appoint a Senator at the beginning of a senatorial term, when the Legislature during its sittings had failed to fill the term.

The Senator from Massachusetts referred the other day to an article that appeared on the 8th of March, 1825, in the National Intelligencer, in which it was stated that the question that had been presented to the Senate in Lanman's case was whether the governor, in anticipation of a vacancy to follow from the expiration of a term of office, had the constitutional right to make an appointment. This article seems to have fallen under the eye of Mr. Gordon, who was compiling a book about that time, and he transferred it into a note, and stated that to have been the question considered and determined by the Senate. Judge Story adopts from Gordon the same statement, but it all rests at last upon the authority of this article in a newspaper of the day, appearing, as my recollection is, for I examined it a few days ago, in the local columns, and probably written by a local editor of that paper. But in Niles's Register of the Debates of Congress it does appear that the question presented was a very different one. I proceed to read now from the Register of March 12, 1825:

> The following members, also, re-elected for six years from this day, took the oath of office, namely: Mr. Lloyd, of Maryland; Mr. Macon, of North Carolina; Mr. Guillard, of South Carolina; Mr. J. S. Johnston, of Louisiana; and Mr. Barton, of Missouri.
> Some conversation took place on the case of Mr. Lanman, reappointed by the governor in the recess of the Legislature, the question being—
> Not as stated by the article in the Intelligencer, but—> the question being, whether a failure by the Legislature to make a choice of a Senator constitutes the contingency in which a governor may appoint a Senator, the language of the Constitution being, "if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise," &c.

That was the precise point that was presented for discussion and consideration at that time; that was the point which, as I understand, the Senate undertook to settle.

> The subject was laid over till to-morrow.

It came up again the next day and it again was the subject of some discussion. It went over, I believe, until a future day, and finally the Senate by a solemn decision reversed its action in Tracy's case made in times of great political and partisan excitement in 1801, and deliberately determined that under such circumstances as are presented here to-day or as were presented then the governor of a State has not a constitutional right to make an appointment.

I say that from that day to this, from the year 1825, a period of more than fifty years, you may look through the Journals of this body, you may look through the records of the debates of this body, you may look to the action of State governors and State Legislatures, and you will find that this decision has never been questioned until this hour. It has been accepted by our public men of all parties, at all times, and under all circumstances as the established law of this body. In 1837 the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, of which Mr. Grundy was chairman, making a report on Sevier's case, expressly stated this to have been the question determined in Lanman's case, and the committee then recognizing the correctness of the principle which lay at the foundation of the decision excepted out of it Mr. Sevier, because of the circumstances attending his introduction into the Senate in 1836 and because of the fact that the time when his seat would become vacant could not have been foreseen by the Legislature of Arkansas. Hence it was held that he was entitled to the seat, a decision that in my humble judgment was wrong, and yet it does not reverse the action of the Senate in Lanman's case in 1825, but expressly recognized its binding validity.

I may mention, in passing, that in the Senate in 1837, at the time Sevier's case was determined, and when this report was made by Mr. Grundy, a lawyer of great ability as well as a public man of great character, Mr. Benton was still in the Senate, so was Mr. King, of Alabama, and so was another who had been here in 1825. It is evident from the vote of the Senate at that time, Mr. Benton voting to sustain the report of the committee, that his recollection of the question presented in 1825 was in accordance with that stated by Mr. Grundy.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BAILEY. One moment. Mr. Eaton, who made the report in 1825, was at that time in public life here in the city of Washington. I believe that Andrew Jackson was a member of the Senate in 1825 when this question was presented, and voted upon it in 1825. Andrew Jackson was then about retiring from the Presidency. The city of Washington and the public offices of that day were filled with the men who had been in public life and had been in the Senate in 1825; so that if the statement made by Mr. Grundy had been incorrect in the slightest particular, certainly the attention of some of those distinguished gentlemen would have been called to it, and the statement would have been corrected.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. With the permission of the Senator from Tennessee, I desire to call his attention to the head-note to the Lanman case as given in Bartlett's Contested Election Cases, page 871. The head-note is this:

> It is not competent for the executive of a State in the recess of a Legislature to appoint a Senator to fill a vacancy which shall happen but has not happened at the time of the appointment.

Now, the point is that the point decided in the Lanman case was that the executive had no authority to fill a vacancy which had not happened at the time the appointment was made, but in anticipation of a vacancy which might or might not happen thereafter.

Mr. BAILEY. I will ask the Senator whether Mr. Bartlett, the compiler—for he was simply a compiler—states any fact or any circumstance or refers to any debate, to any word that was spoken, to sustain him in the syllabus that he makes of the decision in that case?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will ask the Senator from Tennessee if Mr. Grundy in the report made by him in the Sevier case refers to any fact, any debate, any authority, which justifies him in making the statement which he did make?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it seems to me, with all respect to the Senator from Wisconsin, that that is no answer at all. The report made by Mr. Grundy was made in the year 1837. I referred a moment ago to the fact that in the Senate of 1837 were several gentlemen of distinguished reputation who had been Senators in the year 1825. I referred to the fact that Mr. Grundy had been connected with public affairs before the year 1825, and I referred to the further fact that the Register of Debates of Congress shows this to have been the question and the only question that was discussed or determined in Lanman's case in 1825; and the only authority in opposition is the compilation of Mr. Bartlett who professes to know nothing about it and gathers his information alone from the Journals of the Senate, which are open alike to all others and which give no information whatever in regard to this matter.

But I was proceeding to say that in 1854 Mr. Phelps, of Vermont, the predecessor of an honorable Senator who fills a seat in the Senate at this day from that State with so much ability and with such great value to the country, was an applicant for a seat. The facts in his case were not contested, and it is not necessary that I should give the points of distinction; but this whole subject of the power of the executive of a State to fill vacancies that might occur by expiration of a term came before the Senate for discussion. Now, I ask the attention of the Senator from Vermont for a moment to some things that were said on that occasion not only by Mr. Phelps, but also by his colleague, Mr. Foot. The question was debated by Mr. Butler of South Carolina, Mr. Badger of North Carolina, Mr. Geyer of Missouri, Mr. Bayard of Delaware, Mr. Foot and Mr. Phelps of Vermont, by Mr. Toucey of Connecticut, and by one or two other Senators. I have taken the pains to examine the debates of that day, and I say here that every Senator without exception who spoke upon this point at all, or made any allusion or reference to it at all, not only recognized the authority of the Lanman case, but expressed the opinion that the decision in that case was correct. Mr. Phelps himself, the claimant of the seat, made this distinct admission.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If the Senator will allow me, the minority of the committee do not question the correctness of the decision in the Lanman case, but we say that the decision in the Lanman case is not what it was stated to be by Mr. Grundy in his report on the Sevier case.

Mr. BAILEY. I will show you, Mr. President, and I will show the Senate that the gentlemen who discussed this question in 1854, Mr. Phelps the claimant, his colleague Mr. Foot, Mr. Badger, Mr. Butler the chairman of the Judiciary Committee at that date, other Senators known to fame and to the whole country, discussed that question, and without exception they recognized the ruling in Lanman's case to have been a ruling upon the very question that is now presented to the Senate, and not one of them stated, and I make the affirmation that it has never been stated upon the floor of the Senate from the year 1825 down to this day that the ruling in Lanman's case was other than I have stated, and it remained for the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections now to undertake to make a distinction between Lanman's case and this and to hold that the decision in Lanman's case was not upon the point that is now presented, I propose, however, to refer for a moment to what was said upon that occasion and I will begin by referring to what Mr. Phelps himself. the claimant, said. Mr. Phelps said:

The question was not how long Mr. Lanman could hold his seat; the question was not what terminated the office; but it was whether the office was—

I ask the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin; here is Mr. Phelp's statement, a claimant of a seat at the time, a predecessor of the Senator from Vermont—but it was whether the office was originally legally conferred? And the Senate decided in that case that it was not within the constitutional power of the governor to fill the seat by appointment for a full term.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator I think ought to state that a session of the Legislature of Vermont had been held intermediate the occurring of the vacancy and the attempt to fill it, and all the authorities hold that where there is a session of the Legislature intermediate the occurring of the vacancy and the time that the executive attempts to fill it, that prevents the filling of the vacancy by the executive. The reason, of course, is because the Constitution expressly provides that it shall be so. So that the facts in the Phelps case are not at all analagous to the facts of the case now under consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. I have undertaken to show what the Senators and statesmen of that day said about the question in Lanman's case, what was the opinion and judgment of the claimant of the seat then in question. He said:

It is sufficient to say here that the question was not how long Mr. Lanman could hold his seat; the question was not what terminated the office; but it was whether the office was originally legally conferred. And the Senate decided in that case that it was not within the constitutional power of the governor—

To do what? To make an appointment in advance of the expiration of the term? No; but—to fill the seat by appointment for a full term.

Again, he said on another day:

Now, sir, what is the language of the Constitution?

He is discussing here not what was decided in Lanman's case, but he is discussing the Constitution itself, and the construction to be given to it.

After providing for the election of Senators by the Legislature of a State, and their classification, it goes on to make provision for vacancies which may "happen," in the language of the Constitution. This term "happen" has been understood to mean an accidental vacancy, a vacancy not anticipated, and not to be anticipated. In making provision for such a vacancy the power is conferred upon the executive to make appointments with respect to such vacancies as may happen in the recess of the Legislature of the State.

I read this to show what the opinion of Mr. Phelps was upon this question. I might detain the Senate by reading the opinions of other Senators at that date; but I will content myself with referring to the opinion of another predecessor of the Senator from Vermont, namely, Hon. Mr. Foot, who had a seat upon the floor. At that day Mr. Foot said:

It will be observed, that by the first clause of this section, the sole and exclusive authority to elect Senators, in the first instance, or, in other words, to make an original election, is conferred upon the Legislature. No authority is conferred upon the executive, in any contingency, to make the original appointment of Senator.

And it was stated by Mr. Badger and also by Mr. Bayard that it was conceded at that day, conceded by every Senator who had a seat on the floor of the Senate, that the construction of the Constitution contended for by the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to-day was the proper and correct construction. I say, then, that so far as this question has a history, there can be no doubt upon it.

Before I depart from this point, however, let me refer to the fact that a friend has handed me Mr. Benton's Thirty Years in the United States Senate, in which he thus treats Lanman's case:

Mr. Lanman had served a regular term as Senator from Connecticut. His term of service expired on the 3d of March of this year, and the General Assembly of the State having failed to make an election of Senator in his place, he received a temporary appointment from the governor. On presenting himself to take the oath of office, on the 4th day of March, being the first day of the special senatorial session convoked by the retiring President (Mr. Monroe) according to usage for the inauguration of his successor, his appointment was objected to as not having been made in a case in which a governor of a State could fill a vacancy by making a temporary appointment. Mr. Tazewell was the principal speaker against the validity of the appointment, arguing against it both on the words of the Constitution and the reason for the provision. The words of the Constitution are: "If vacancies happen (in the Senate) by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments, until the next meeting of the Legislature." "Happen" was held by Mr. Tazewell to be the governing word in this provision, and it always implied a contingency, and an unexpected one.

And in this his argument is singularly in accord with the remarks of Mr. Madison when he offered the amendment to the resolution that had been originally adopted in the convention to frame the Constitution:

It could not apply to a foreseen event, bound to occur at a fixed period. Here the vacancy was foreseen; there was no contingency in it. It was regular and certain. It was the right of the Legislature to fill it, and if they failed, no matter from what cause, there was no right in the governor to supply their omission.

A committee was appointed on motion of Mr. Eaton to look for precedents, &c. They reported the cases of William Cooke, of Tennessee, and others, to which reference has been made; and Mr. Benton gives the vote on the Lanman case:

The Senators voting in favor of the motion were: Messrs. Bell, Bouligny, Chase, Clayton, DeWolf, Edwards, Harrison, (General,) Hendricks, Johnston of Louisiana, Kane, Knight, Lloyd of Massachusetts, McIlvaine, Mills, Noble, Rowan, Seymour, Thomas—18. Those voting against it were: Messrs. Barton, Benton, Berrien, Branch, Chandler, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Gaillard, Hayne, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Jackson, (General,) King of Alabama, Lloyd of Maryland, Marks, Macon, Ruggles, Smith of Maryland, Tazewell, Van Buren, Vandyke, Williams of Mississippi—23.

I have not undertaken to do more than give, as briefly as I could, the history of the clause of the Constitution that must control the action of the Senate, and refer to precedents and the opinions of public men in order to show what has been settled and acknowledged for fifty years to be the true meaning of the Constitution. The language is plain; its meaning is obvious; so obvious that efforts at analysis or criticism only tend to make obscure what to a mind simply seeking for truth seems very plain.

Mr. ROLLINS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter upon the discussion of the constitutional questions that are involved in this case, but to leave that work to the many able constitutional lawyers upon the floor of the Senate, who will undoubtedly say all that is necessary to be said upon that branch of the question. I do desire, however, to state as briefly as possible all the facts in the cases of unfilled seats or vacancies at the beginning of senatorial terms by reason of non-election, in the cases cited by the majority of the committee apparently as precedents which ought to govern the action of the Senate in this case. The circumstances of these cases have been gathered from an examination of the legislative journals of the several States, and from other sources equally reliable, and the facts as so found show that these so-called precedents have no analogy to or bearing upon the case now before the Senate. I will take the cases up in the order in which they are presented by the committee.

Maine: The vacancy occurred March 4, 1853. The Legislature, which met in January previous, after repeated efforts, adjourned without electing a Senator, and the vacancy was not filled until the next regular session of the Legislature of that State.

Connecticut: The vacancy occurred March 4, 1851. At the May session of the Legislature, 1850, after several ballotings, without effecting a choice, the election was indefinitely postponed. At the May session of 1851, after twenty-two ballotings, the subject of the election of United States Senator was again indefinitely postponed, and the vacancy was not filled until the next regular session of the Legislature in 1852.

Pennsylvania: The vacancy occurred March 4, 1855. The Legislature of that State, at its session beginning January, 1855, made repeated attempts to elect a Senator, but failed to do so, and adjourned May 8 without effecting a choice. At the next regular session of the Legislature, January 14, 1856, William Bigler was elected.

Maryland: The vacancy occurred March 4, 1843. The Legislature assembled December 26, 1842, and remained in session until March 10, 1843, when it adjourned without electing a Senator to fill the vacancy. The House of Delegates on several occasions passed a resolution fixing a day for the election of a Senator, but the Senate refused to concur therein, and the vacancy was not filled until the next regular session of the Legislature.

North Carolina: The vacancy occurred March 4, 1853. The Legislature assembled in November, 1852, and having made repeated efforts adjourned without electing a Senator to fill the vacancy. As the sessions of the Legislature of that State were then biennial it did not meet again until November, 1854, when Daniel S. Reid was elected.

Indiana: The vacancy occurred March 4, 1855. The Legislature of that State met January 4, 1855, and there were repeated attempts made in the lower house for both houses to go into joint convention for the purpose of electing a United States Senator; but the senate refused. The practice having been to elect in joint convention, the Legislature of the State failed to elect a Senator until February, 1857, when Mr. Fitch was elected, and admitted to his seat in 1858.

Missouri: The vacancy occurred March 4, 1855. The Legislature met in January previous; within two or three days commenced balloting for United States Senator, and continued to do so, in convention, forty-one times; and adjourned March 5, 1855, without effecting an election. The Legislature met again December 29, 1856, and on January 13, 1857, elected Mr. Trusten Polk Senator.

California: The vacancy occurred March 4, 1855. The Legislature assembled January 1, 1855, and had numerous ballotings for United States Senator; but adjourned May 7, 1855, without having made any choice. The Legislature assembled again on January 7, 1856, and repeated attempts were made to elect a United States Senator; but it again adjourned April 21, without having done so. The Legislature assembled again January 5, 1857, and on the 13th of the same month elected William M. Gwin.

Oregon: The vacancy occurred March 4, 1859. At the extra session of the Legislature, held May 16, 1859, the question of the election of United States Senator was considered, but the Legislature adjourned June 4, 1859, without filling the vacancy. At the regular session, held September 10, 1860, repeated attempts were made to elect; but on October 18, 1860, a motion was made to indefinitely postpone the bill providing for the election of United States Senator, which motion prevailed.

NOTE.—It was decided in the United States Senate on February 14, 1859, by lot, that the term of Delazon Smith, one of the Senators from Oregon, would expire on the 3d day of March, 1859.

The bill for the admission of Oregon was approved February 14, 1859.

The majority of the committee might have added to the list the case of New Hampshire, which was unrepresented from August 4, 1854, to July 30, 1855. In this case the Legislature which met in June, 1854, attempted to fill the vacancy by an election, but after numerous attempts adjourned without making an election. After the adjournment a democratic governor made an appointment to fill the existing vacancy, but the Senate, standing upon the authority of the decision in the case of Kensey Johns, held that the Legislature, having met and failed to elect, the executive had no power to act.

Now I come to the Lanman case. In Connecticut the vacancy occurred March 4, 1825. This is the Lanman case, which is cited as a precedent. The constitution of the State of Connecticut, adopted in 1818, was in force in 1824 and 1825, and required the General Assembly of that State to meet on the first Wednesday in May in each year. The General Assembly at its regular session in May, 1824, (whose duty it was to elect a Senator,) failed to fill the vacancy which would occur by reason of the expiration of the term of Mr. Lanman in March following, and adjourned without having made such election. This Legislature, having thus deliberately omitted to provide against a vacancy which they knew must occur, practically declared that the State should go unrepresented in the Senate of the United States until the next session of the Legislature.

The rejection of Mr. Lanman is in strict accordance with several decisions of the Senate, which have established the doctrine that where a Legislature, competent to elect, meets and fails to make such election, the executive has thereafter no power of appointment.

The majority say that "the decision in the Lanman case has been for more than fifty years regarded as a correct exposition of the Constitution, and that during this long lapse of years its authority has not been questioned." But what was that decision as understood by the public and cited by the legal profession? It is shown that the National Intelligencer of the next day, Mr. Gordon, two years later, and Judge Story and other legal authorities cite this case as deciding that the appointment could not be constitutionally made until after the vacancy had actually occurred, or that a vacancy must have literally "happened," or come to pass, before an appointment could be made to fill it.

This was the only construction of that decision known to the public; and if that has been regarded as correct, and guided the action of the executives and Legislatures of the States, it could not be supposed to be an authority against the present case, but in its favor, as that decision was followed in this case and the appointment of Mr. Bell was not made until the vacancy had happened or actually come to pass; and no session of the Legislature having been held prior to the occurrence of the vacancy, except that of June, 1878, which the senate had deliberately decided could not elect under the law of 1866.

Whatever nice distinctions may be found between the Lanman and Sevier cases, there can be no doubt of the fact that in the latter case the vacancy occurred by the expiration of the term, and the executive appointment was made in anticipation of such vacancy, and yet he was admitted to his seat. In this view it is directly in conflict with the Lanman case, and the Senate will remember that it followed the Lanman case. It was in 1837. But if that decision was upon the ground that there had been no session of the Legislature which could have elected, then it is a decision in support of Mr. Bell's claim.

The result of an investigation of this whole subject from 1789 down to the present time may be summed up in a very few words. During all this time there can be found no case of an executive appointment to fill a vacancy occurring by reason of the expiration of a term, where a Legislature competent to fill such vacancy had not been in session prior thereto, where such appointee was refused admission. Out of six cases of such appointments made after the vacancy had actually occurred, the present is the first in which an objection has been made to the admission of the appointee. If Mr. Bell is now refused admission, it must be by setting aside all these precedents, overruling the former action of the Senate in similar cases, and taking an entirely new constitutional departure.

Mr. President, as we understand the Lanman case, Mr. Bell's application here does not conflict with it at all. It may be summed up in a very few words. In that case a Legislature competent to elect had met and failed to elect a Senator. In this case no Legislature met prior to this appointment that was competent to elect. The Senate of the United States has so decided. In the case of Mr. Lanman the appointment was made in anticipation of the vacancy; in this case the appointment was not made until after the vacancy happens, so that it makes no difference whatever, for the present purpose, how you construe the Lanman case. If you say that it turned on the question of the appointment of the governor prior to the happening of the vacancy, then it is not a precedent to govern in this case. If you say it turned upon the other point, (and that, I am inclined to think, is the true state of the case,) if it turned on the point made by the Senator from Tennessee that a Legislature competent to fill the vacancy having once been in session, and that Legislature having failed to perform its clear, bounden duty, the power of the governor was exhausted, and the Senate of the United States did right in rejecting Mr. Lanman, still that is not this case. No Legislature of New Hampshire has ever been in session nor could any Legislature have been convened prior to the vacancy that could elect a Senator to fill the vacancy if the decision of the Senate of the United States upon that question last June is the correct decision.

A single suggestion further, Mr. President, as to one other point. There may be some who believe that the Legislature of New Hampshire, which held its session in June, 1878, should have elected a Senator to succeed Senator Wadleigh, whose term was then about to expire. There was some conflict of opinion about this among the lawyers, and the matter was referred to a committee of the senate, and upon their report the senate (the final tribunal for the decision of such questions) denied the right of that Legislature to elect. This construction of the law, made by the only tribunal authorized to act thereon, was accepted as binding. The Legislature could not be expected to elect in the face of that decision; and if that decision was wrong and a vacancy happened thereby, the State ought not to suffer.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I entered upon the investigation of the question involved in this case with a sincere desire to vote for the admission of Mr. Bell. There is no party significance whatever in the issue, and nothing which should influence a Senator except a simple desire to arrive at a correct conclusion; and in view of the circumstances surrounding the case I did desire, if I could satisfy my conscience on the constitutional question, to vote for the admission. I entered upon the investigation inclined to believe that way, according to the suggestion made in the report of the minority of the committee that there ought to be a broad and liberal construction given to this clause of the Constitution so as to effectuate the purpose of having a full representation in the Senate. I felt that that was the great consideration which should influence the Senate in determining the question. But after giving the case full and fair consideration, after an investigation of its history and the legal import of the words involved, I have been unable to come to but one conclusion; and that is that we cannot admit Mr. Bell for the simple reason that the appointment madeby the governor is void under the Constitution. If I had a doubt upon the question after this investigation, I would cheerfully give the benefit of the doubt in favor of the admission of the appointee.

The case occurred in several periods of our early history, as the Senate has already been informed, but the question arising in the case was not discussed; it was not made. The first important discussion which we have any record of occurred in 1813 and 1814, and on a very memorable occasion, not in the Senate on the question of the admission of a Senator, but it occurred upon the kindred words in the Constitution conferring upon the Federal Executive power to fill all vacancies in the offices of the United States occurring during the recess of the Senate. The occasion on which it occurred was this: During the war of 1812 the Emperor of Russia offered his kind offices to mediate a peace between the Kingdom of Great Britain and the Republic of the United States. President Madison, in the recess of the Senate, appointed three distinguished gentlemen commissioners for that purpose. When the Senate assembled in 1813 his authority to do that was denied. The language of the clause conferring upon the President the power to fill vacancies is peculiar, and as the first discussion arose on that language I call the attention of the Senate to it. The language is this:

The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

Senator Gore, who seems to have been a distinguished lawyer of that day, introduced a series of resolutions, only the first of which I will read, though they would all be interesting. He introduced these resolutions on the 29th of July, 1813:

The President of the United States having by the Constitution power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, no such vacancy can happen in any office not before full.

And he followed it up with very elaborate resolutions condemning the act of Mr. Madison in appointing three commissioners to negotiate a treaty of peace and commerce with Russia and Great Britain as unauthorized by the Constitution. These resolutions were deemed so important that the Senate in executive session ordered that they should be discussed in open session, and some very elaborate speeches were made, the whole question being the power of the President to fill an original vacancy, and founded upon the meaning of the word "happen" in the clause of the Constitution which gave him power to fill up all vacancies that should happen during the recess of the Senate. That discussion continued for nearly one year, and very elaborate speeches, as I say, were made by various able Senators, in which speeches a good deal of feeling was shown. The discussion is very important and very instructive. Mr. Gore, the author of the resolutions, concluded the discussion of the resolutions himself in open session, making a very elaborate argument, on the 12th day of April, 1814. The resolutions were introduced in July, 1813, were transferred to the open Calendar, and debated continually and frequently until April, 1814, when they were disposed of by making them the special order for the next December, and they were never again taken up. Therefore the resolutions introduced by Mr. Gore were neither adopted nor rejected; but that elaborate discussion had upon the meaning of the word "happen" is the first discussion I have been able to find in the history of this transaction.

The Senator from Tennessee has referred to the next important discussion that occurred, which was in 1822.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Before the Senator from Georgia passes from the consideration of the first discussion which he finds, will he allow me to call his attention to this point? If I understand the reading of the resolutions offered on the occasion to which he has alluded, it was that there was no vacancy because the office had not been filled. Is there not this distinction between that case and this: the office of Senator from the State of New Hampshire was filled prior to the 3d day of March last?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will come to that. I am now giving the history of the question. The Senator from Wisconsin will please excuse me for the present, I will come to that point presently. I am showing how the discussion on this question of the power of the President and the power of the governors of the States to fill a vacancy under the word "happen" occurred.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senator from Georgia whether the commissioners so nominated did not proceed to act and were not in continual service till they negotiated the treaty of Ghent?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Two of them did serve; Mr. Gallatin was rejected. It is a historical fact that strong feeling was engendered between the Senate and Mr. Madison by the introduction of the resolutions of Mr. Gore. Mr. Gore stated he had no desire to interrupt the mission or defeat the gentlemen appointed, but he desired to make the point of power with the President, to prevent its exercise as a precedent, that the Senate should contest it as a principle, and the discussion of Mr. Gore's resolution did not take place until after the gentlemen alluded to were confirmed and the mission was completed, because Mr. Madison when the Senate met sent in the names by regular nomination. Two of them were confirmed and Mr. Gallatin was not at that time.

The next discussion of any consequence that arose was in 1822; I believe it was alluded to by the Senator from Tennessee. In that discussion the Senate did come to a conclusion, but that discussion again arose upon the power of the President to fill up a vacancy occurring in the recess of the Senate. Let me state the conclusion at which the Senate then arrived. I am not going into the particulars but only propose to give the points as they arose. The report of the committee was:

In the second section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States it is provided, that "the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session." If the offices to which Colonels Towson and Gadsden are nominated were original vacancies created by the act of the 2d March, 1821, the committee contend that they were not filled agreeable to the provisions of the Constitution. The words "all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate," evidently mean vacancies occurring from death, resignation, promotion, or removal; the word happen must have reference to some casualty not provided for by law.

There is no controversy about that. That is the report of an able committee. Let me read part of it again:

The words "all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate" evidently mean vacancies occurring from death, resignation, promotion, or removal; the word happen must have reference to some casualty not provided for by law.

And that report was adopted and the nominees of Mr. Monroe were rejected. This discussion, I say, occurred in 1822. The Senate will now see how it was that the issue came to be made in Mr. Lanman's case. These discussions upon the meaning of the word "happen," occurring in 1813 and 1814, and occurring again in 1822, had called the attention of the great minds of that day to the point, for the qualifying words are stronger in the senatorial clause than in the executive clause in relation to vacancies. As my friend from Tennessee suggests, it occurred several times in that way. It occurred on appointments to missions in several cases, and in appropriating money power was given to the President to fill vacancies by express authority of law after the Senate had adjourned, and discussion arose in various cases in that way.

By these two great occasions to which I have alluded, in which the Senate struggled for nearly a year with the question during Mr. Madison's administration without deciding it, and on which was submitted an elaborate report in Mr. Monroe's administration when they did decide it, the attention of Senators was brought to the question, and therefore when Mr. Lanman presented his credentials in 1825 the point was raised that that vacancy, like those alluded to in the presidential clause, was a vacancy which did not happen, and therefore the governor of the State had no authority to fill it, and the Senate, following the precedent of 1822, decided that the governor of a State had no authority under that provision of the Constitution to make an appointment at the beginning of a term; and from that day to this that question has been considered as settled. I reaffirm with emphasis what the Senator from Tennessee said, from that day to this that question has been accepted as settled; governors have acted upon it in various instances; the statesmen of all parties have acted upon it, and it has not been reopened, except by this case, when the governor of New Hampshire has again reopened it by sending Mr. Bell here with a commission to take a seat in the Senate.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator yield to me for a question? Was not the Sevier case in 1837, following 1825; and is it not the fact that in that case the appointment was made for the beginning of a term? Let me ask further what evidence has the Senator found to show that the decision in the Lanman case turned upon the point he has now suggested?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I find this evidence: It has been repeated to the Senate by the Senator from Tennessee; it was the issue made on the case at the time. Nobody ever said otherwise except the National Intelligencer and a gentleman by the name of Gordon, whose digest was adopted by Judge Story. But it was repeated by Mr. Grundy in his report in 1837, and it was repeated in the debate of 1854, in the case of Phelps. Now I wish to say this——

Mr. ROLLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Do not interrupt me, for it will be unnecessary if you will listen to me. The Senator asks did not the question recur in 1837, in Mr. Sevier's case? I say it did not. It is true Mr. Sevier was admitted. Why? The committee and the Senate of 1837 recognized the principle of the Lanman case. They did not reopen it; they reaffirmed it distinctly, said it was a correct decision. And what did they say was the correct decision? The correct decision was that the governor had no authority to appoint a Senator to fill a vacancy at the beginning of a term, because that was not one that happened by casualty. I know a contrary impression is made by the quotation from Story, but that is evidently wrong, as the whole record shows; but the Senate admitted Mr. Sevier notwithstanding, I think upon an insufficient reason. But why did they admit Mr. Sevier? Because they said the vacancy to which Mr. Sevier was appointed occurred by lot, and therefore it might be said that it happened; it could not have been foreseen. With all due deference to the great men of that day I do not think it was a forcible distinction; but they admitted the principle of the Lanman case that the word "happen" could not be applied to a vacancy that could be foreseen. They said such a vacancy could not be said to happen; but they said the Sevier case was excepted from that, because his term was decided by lot, and the result of a lottery could not be foreseen by the Legislature of Arkansas, and therefore they admitted him. So far, then, from that case being a repeal or overruling of the decision in Lanman's case, it was a reaffirmance of it.

The gentleman representing the governor of New Hampshire so ably on this floor and the minority of the committee have put this case upon the ground of the decisions made previously to 1825. All lawyers know that the decision in the Lanman case, which was well considered and which was debated, overruled all those previous cases which were not considered, and they became as nothing, and the decision overruling them must stand as the law until it shall be overruled. The case of Lanman has never been overruled. It was reaffirmed in 1837, was recognized and reaffirmed in 1854, and it has been acted on, as the report of the committee shows, in a great number of cases by the governors of various States.

But, Mr. President, I wish to say another thing. This decision that I refer to in 1822 has been adopted by the law writers as settling the meaning of the word "happen." I will read from Mr. Justice Story upon this subject. He has been read from in relation to the Lanman case. I will read from him on this particular point. Section 1559 of Story on the Constitution says:

The language of the clause is, that the President shall have power to fill up vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate. In 1813, President Madison appointed and commissioned ministers to negotiate the treaty of peace of Ghent, during the recess of the Senate; and a question was made, whether he had a constitutional authority so to do, there being no vacancy of any existing office, but this being the creation of a new office. The Senate, at their next session, are said to have entered a protest against such an exercise of power by the Executive.

I have shown the resolutions that were introduced and debated but not adopted. It cannot, therefore, be properly said that a protest was entered by the Senate.

On a subsequent occasion, (April 20, 1822,) the Senate seem distinctly to have held that the President could not create the office of minister, and make appointments to such an office during the recess, without the consent of the Senate.

Now, why?

By "vacancies" they understood to be meant vacancies occurring from death, resignation, promotion, or removal. The word "happen" had relation to some casualty not provided for by law.

That is the point to which I call attention, and Sergeant on constitutional law in his work reaffirms the same thing, and says that that decision has been accepted since as correct, that "the word happen had relation to some casualty not provided for by law," such as death, resignation, &c.

Now, Mr. President, a few words upon the clause in relation to the power of governors to fill vacancies in the Senate. I call the attention of the Senate to the language of the clause again:

And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

The first thing I wish to call the attention of the Senate to is that this language is different from that used in any other similar case in the Constitution. There are three cases where vacancies are authorized to be filled eo nomine. The first is in the House of Representatives. The language there is:

When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

I have read that in relation to the Executive already; it is

The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate.

The vacancies referred to in each clause are vacancies that may happen. The word "happen" is common to all the clauses. But in the clause in relation to filling vacancies in the Senate there are additional words. The vacancies are not only to "happen," but they must "happen by resignation, or otherwise." Now, to authorize the power to be exercised by the governor three things must occur: First, a vacancy must "happen;" second, it must "happen by resignation, or otherwise;" third, it must happen "during the recess of the Legislature." If this vacancy in the seat from New Hampshire has happened, and happened by resignation or otherwise, and has happened by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the Legislature of New Hampshire, this gentleman ought to be admitted.

Now, what is the meaning of the word "happen?" In addition to the precedents already incidentally given I wish to call the attention of the Senate to some others. Mr. Hamilton, in speaking of this very thing in the sixty-seventh number of the Federalist, uses this language, referring to the clause in relation to filling vacancies in the Senate:

I mean the power of filling casual vacancies in the Senate.

He speaks of it as the power of "filling casual vacancies." So again in the same number he says:

Here is an express power given, in clear and unambiguous terms, to the State executives to fill the casual vacancies in the Senate by temporary appointments.

So Mr. Hamilton himself speaks of it as a casual vacancy which a governor may fill. The Senator from Tennessee alluded somewhat to the history of this matter in the convention. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to it again. The first time that I have been able to discover that this question of filling vacancies in the Senate arose in the convention which framed the Constitution was in the draught of a constitution or system of government proposed by Mr. Pinckney early in the session; which he called a plan of a federal constitution. Mr. Pinckney in his plan provided that the Senators should be elected by the house of delegates; he named his house of representatives the house of delegates, and he provided that the Senators should be elected by the house of delegates. I refer to this to show you the idea that the men of that day had of the meaning of the word "vacancy," and what the idea was of filling a vacancy in the Senate. After providing that the original election shall be by the house of delegates, he goes on to say:

As their times of service expire, the house of delegates shall fill them up by elections for —— years; and they shall fill all vacancies that arise from death or resignation, for the time of service remaining of the members so dying or resigning.

He goes on to define the word "vacancy"—and it is the only time when it was done—in the very clause itself, and he speaks of it as filling a vacancy "for the time of service remaining of the members so dying or resigning." Subsequently, as the Senator from Tennessee has already read, when the committee of detail made a report they adopted new phraseology. The language in that report was that vacancies in the Senate shall be supplied by the executive of the State—"vacancies in the Senate"—a broad term. That is exactly the meaning contended for by the other side.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator, if that original language had been used in the Constitution, could such a vacancy as we have now be filled?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I incline to think it could, because that language was not "vacancy which happens." I do not think that "vacancy" is the emphatic word here. You try to make it the word. If you say that anything which is empty is vacant that may be true in one sense, but that is not the Constitution. The draught as reported by the committee of detail was "vacancies in the Senate shall be supplied by the executive." It did not qualify, it did not restrain, it said "vacancies," and if that language had been adopted you might apply your broad definition that anything which is empty, not filled, is a vacancy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does not the report read by the Senator from Tennessee of the debate in the convention on the subject of the power of a person who had been elected a Senator in the regular way to decline the appointment or to resign it after he had it show that there was a question about that, and as a consequence of that the introduction of these words goes to show that they were put in in order to recognize a right of resignation, and not to limit the power of keeping the representation of a State full all the time by the governor once exerting that power before the Legislature met?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That was one reason given by Mr. Madison at the time he made his motion to amend; that is true; but I think you will recollect that was not the only reason given. I have not that debate now before me. It is true it was put upon the idea that a declination to accept the seat was like a resignation; it was one kind of resignation, and it ought to be provided for. Mr. Wilson objected to the whole clause; he moved to strike out the clause authorizing vacancies to be filled by the Executive upon the ground that he was unwilling to intrust the Executive with that power. Mr. Randolph came in and used a very remarkable word in reply to Mr. Wilson. He said that it was very important that that power should exist to enable the Executive to fill chasms in the Senate. Mr. Wilson had objected to conferring the power at all. Mr. Randolph wanted to confer a limited power for a specific purpose which could not be otherwise provided for, which could not be foreseen. He called it a power to supply chasms; he might have called them casualties. Then Mr. Madison made his motion putting the words "vacancies which happen by resignation or failure to accept the office shall be filled by the governor," and these words were adopted nem. con. Subsequently, when the Committee on Style came to revise, the words now in the Constitution were finally adopted.

Now, then, here is the point: the only case in which the term "vacancies which happen" was defined by anybody was by Mr. Pinckney in his draught of a Federal plan, and he speaks of appointments to fill that which remains of an unexpired term. Subsequently all qualification was abandoned by the committee of detail, and "vacancies" broadly were authorized to be filled by the governor. Mr. Wilson objected to that. Mr. Randolph insisted upon a qualified power at least. Mr. Madison comes in with his amendment, giving, among other things, the specific reason mentioned by the Senator from Vermont; that is true. In that way they were put in as words of qualification, and they are words of qualification. That is the history of it.

Then why were the words "vacancies which happen" put in? Why were those other words, "vacancies which happen by resignation or otherwise," put in? Were they not put in as words of limitation? Were they not intended to qualify the power, to prevent it from being general and universal? And yet, I submit, the very position taken by the minority of the committee and now advocated by the Senator from New Hampshire would obliterate every qualifying word.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Madison gave a specific reason.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes, he gave one reason. Still these are qualifying words. They are words which were intended to qualify the power, which do qualify the power, and which since have been accepted as qualifying the power. A vacancy which happens means a different thing from a vacancy merely. There may be a vacancy which does not happen. A vacancy may occur which does not happen. Would you say that the sun happened to rise this morning? Would you say that the sun will happen to set this evening? Never. Why? Because we know that by the fixed law of nature the sun did rise and that the sun will set, and that the sun will continue to rise and set. He would use words strangely who should say that the sun happened to rise this morning. You may say that the sun happened to be under a cloud on a given day. You cannot even say that the sun happened to be eclipsed, because astronomers know that an eclipse comes by the fixed law of the heavens, and you cannot say that it happens. The word "happen" applies to what is a casualty, to what cannot be foreseen, and it cannot apply to anything else.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say, Mr. President, that that is the dictionary definition of "happen," the etymological meaning of the word?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am not using the dictionary in this discussion. I really do not know what the dictionary has to say about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to my honorable friend that his definition, according to all the authorities on etymology, is only one of the definitions of the word "happen," and that in the same clause which defines the word, where "happen" is spoken of in the light of chance, as he is now speaking of it, the other meanings of the word, "occurring," "taking place," are put in the same connection as some of its meanings. Why does the Senator take one definition and exclude all the others?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. But I am using the word "happen" just as the voters on this very question have defined it, just exactly as the law-books have defined it. They say that the word "happen" in this connection has the meaning to which the Senator has alluded. It is an event which happens by casualties that cannot be foreseen, and therefore cannot be well provided for. Will any Senator say on this floor that the term of Senator Wadleigh happened to expire? Did the term now unfilled happen to begin on the 4th of March? Did we not all know, did not the governor of New Hampshire know, did not the Legislature of New Hampshire know, long ago, years ago, that the term of Senator Wadleigh would certainly expire at a fixed time—a time fixed by law? Did you not know that the new term would then certainly begin, that the law had fixed that it should then begin, and will you say that—that which was fixed inevitably to come, which was certain to come, happened to come? Will anybody say that? Will any lawyer use terms in that way?

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator says there is a difference between a vacancy and a vacancy which happens. I agree with him about that, and would not trouble him to amplify his remarks; but he says again there is a difference between a vacancy which happens and one which happens from resignation or otherwise. Will the Senator be kind enough to point me to the difference between a vacancy which happens, and a vacancy which happens from resignation or otherwise?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from New York has misunderstood me. I have not said that.

Mr. CONKLING. I so understood the honorable Senator.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I said that a vacancy would happen——

Mr. CONKLING. I understood the honorable Senator from Georgia to say, first, that there were qualifying words in the Constitution as to vacancies; that one of those qualifying words was the word "happen;" and that a vacancy which happened need not necessarily be a vacancy which only existed. I understood him to go further and say, that following the word "happen" were still additional qualifying words, to wit, "by resignation or otherwise."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is right.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator admits that I am right so far, while think I am right in the foundation of my curiosity and of my question, which I shall state again. I want to know what is the distinction between a vacancy which happens only, and a vacancy which happens from resignation or otherwise? There certainly must be a difference, provided the Senator is right in saying that he finds qualifying or restraining words in the language "by resignation or otherwise." If those words qualify, then they do certainly distinguish between a vacancy which only happens and a vacancy which happens by resignation or otherwise.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator is wholly mistaken in the inference which he drew from my position, although he states my position correctly in the last remark. In my opinion, the words "by resignation or otherwise" are additional words of qualification. That is all I have said.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. But they are words of qualification which only make more certain the character of vacancies fixed by the word "happen."

Mr. CONKLING. Then, if my honorable friend will pardon me once more, "they only make more certain." Now I quote him exactly. They only make more certain. If they do, certainly it is by some substantive meaning, by the fact that they import into this clause of the Constitution some visible, tangible, or ascertainable thing which without them would not be there. I ask the honorable Senator what is that thing which they only make more certain? Point out to me the meaning, the substance, the thing which is made more certain.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I am coming to the point as to the meaning of the words "by resignation, or otherwise." That is the very next point in my argument. It is not at all incumbent upon me to show why the words were put in, or rather to show a purpose different from that which actuated the framers in putting in the word "happen." That is not at all necessary for me to do; it is not at all important to my argument; but we are face to face with the fact that the framers of the Constitution had before them three occasions in which to provide for the filling of vacancies, and on all those occasions they spoke of vacancies which should happen. On two occasions they spoke only of vacancies which should happen. On the third occasion they not only spoke of vacancies which should happen, but they defined the manner in which they should happen, that they should happen "by resignation, or otherwise."

The best reason that I can give to the Senator, assuming that the interpretation which our predecessors have placed on the word "happen" in the other two instances is correct, is the assumption that the framers of the Constitution were determined to be more explicit in the third case than in the other two cases. The fact that the meaning of "happen" is defined in the clause relating to the Senate, and is not defined in the other clauses, has been used by some who were trying to give the broad construction to these words as evidence that the limitation we contend for, which lies in the word "happen," does not exist, because their argument was that if there was a limitation in the word "happen," there was no use for the framers in framing this clause in relation to filling vacancies in the Senate to add the words "by resignation or otherwise;" that they ought to have been content with using the words "and if vacancies happen" in this case as they did in the other two cases. All it can prove and all that it is necessary for me to prove, I suggest to the honorable Senator from New York, on the question of construction as to whether the word "happen" was a qualifying word or not, is that while the framers were willing to trust it in the other two cases, (and there might have been reasons why they should trust it in the other two cases,) yet in this particular case, as there was the specific objection in the convention to conferring this power upon the governors at all upon any terms, there was a reason why in conferring it they should be the more particular in fixing the qualification. That is all I can say on that point.

Now, Mr. President, what is the meaning of the words "by resignation or otherwise?" I say to the Senator from New York if the interpretation given to the clause of the Constitution which authorizes the President to fill vacancies that was adopted in 1822, and which Mr. Story and Mr. Sergeant both tell us has been the accepted rule since, was correct, I grant that the same thing would follow in this clause in relation to filling vacancies in the Senate without the words "by resignation or otherwise." But even if it be true that the interpretation given to the word "happen" in the other two clauses be incorrect, still that is no reason for holding that the qualification does not exist in this senatorial clause, because in addition to the word "happen" the kind of happening is specified, that is, it must be "by resignation, or otherwise." So unquestionably, whether the qualification exists in the other two clauses derived from the word "happen" or not, it certainly does exist in this clause. That is the point I make, and that is all. The qualification certainly does exist in this clause, because in addition to the word "happen" it says that the vacancy must happen "by resignation, or otherwise." What do those words mean? They were not inserted idly. The framers of the Constitution were not in the habit of inserting idle words in the Constitution. Gentlemen construe the word "otherwise" strangely. They say that the word "otherwise" means any vacancy, that is, they say that the framers of the Constitution put in a qualification by the word "happen" and by the words "by resignation," and then destroyed those qualifications by putting in the additional words "or otherwise." In other words, you use the word "otherwise" so as to leave the power without any qualification, as though it read, "If vacancies should happen to occur during the recess of the Legislature the governor may fill them by temporary appointment." That is your meaning.

I submit to Senators that the very position itself is absurd, for there are well settled rules of law for the construction of this sentence. You cannot take a sentence that way and use one word to destroy the meaning of other words. You cannot take a general phrase and use it to destroy the meaning of a specific phrase. On the contrary, you must restrain and qualify the general phrase by the meaning of the specific phrase. That is a well settled rule. Why? Because it is your duty in construing to give effect to every word and to give a meaning and a sense to every word. You are not at liberty to say that the framers of the Constitution not only used idle words but used words of significance if standing by themselves, and then destroyed the significance of those words by using a general term afterward. I wish to read some authority on that question. I will read some very strong remarks made on that subject in the speech of Senator Gore in 1814, to which I alluded. Speaking upon that subject he said:

> The first resolution declares the opinion of the Senate, that no such vacancy can happen in any office not before full. One of the gentlemen calls on me for authority to show that the office must have been before full.
> The answer is, that the plain sense and meaning of the terms will admit of no other interpretation.
> It is a sound principle of construction, that in every instrument you must give sense and meaning to every word if possible.
> If the construction contended for by gentlemen who oppose this resolution be true, the words "that may happen," are useless; and surely if the Constitution intended to convey the power like that exercised by the President, in the present case, it might and would have said, "the President shall have power to fill up all vacancies during the recess of the Senate." This is precisely the construction contended for, and thus it is insisted that the special power contains a general grant, which renders the special nature of the delegation useless, at the same time that it renders null and void the authority contained in the general grant of the President and Senate, and authorizes the President to annihilate all the privileges of the Senate in respect to the power of appointment. I may surely return the question, and ask the honorable gentleman whence he obtained authority for such a construction.

Again he says:

> All general phrases are defined and limited by the particular enumeration of powers which would otherwise have been embraced by the general phrases.

In the twelfth volume of Georgia Reports I find this very strongly stated by Chief-Justice Lumpkin, who was for over twenty-five years the chief-justice of our State, and who has a national reputation as a jurist. On this very point he says:

> I would take occasion to remark that the rule of construction applicable to all writings, constitutions, statutes, contracts, and charters, public or private, and even to ordinary conversation, is this: that general and unlimited terms are restrained and limited by particular recitals when used in connection with them. Not that I would reject the general terms altogether, but I would restrict them to cases of the same kind as those expressly enumerated. (12 Georgia Reports, 530.)

That is the rule. You must restrict the word "otherwise" here. Do not destroy the word "otherwise;" do not let the word "otherwise" destroy the word "resignation;" but you must use the word "otherwise" as applicable to cases like "resignation;" that is, cases of casualty. Therefore, what does the word "otherwise" mean in this connection? It means death, removal, expulsion, failure to accept, or a vacancy happening by any other casualty. Instead of saying "vacancies which happen by resignation, death, removal, promotion," or anything else, the framers used the words "by resignation or otherwise," intending the one word "resignation" to show you that the word "otherwise" was to be applicable only to cases like that governed by "resignation;" that is, cases of casualty which might happen.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I am listening with great pleasure and great satisfaction to what seems to me a very clear and able presentation by the Senator from Georgia; but to enlighten myself I venture to ask him a question. Suppose the design of the framers of this instrument was to deposit with the Legislature, as has been done, the power to fill original terms in the Senate; but in order that there might be no chasm in the Senate, or that the Senate might be kept full, to commit to the governors of the States the power to give temporary commissions in all instances when temporary vacancies occurred, either by death, resignation, expulsion, failure to accept, or, as in the present case, a change in the fundamental law of a State bringing on a hiatus. Suppose now that was the design of those who framed this instrument. My request to the honorable Senator is that he tell me what words they should have employed different from those which we find in order to vest that power and accomplish that object?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will answer the Senator with a great deal of pleasure. They should have employed the very words that are employed in the act of Congress carrying out this power vested in the President in certain cases. The words "occurring by death, resignation, or the expiration of a previous term where the Legislature has failed to elect" should have been used. That would have covered it.

Mr. CONKLING. If my honorable friend will pardon me, that would cover more than I have suggested to him. Why? It would cover every case where for any reason a Legislature decided not to elect, whereas I put to him this case: what language should have been employed to cover, and cover only in that respect, the instance of a vacancy which the Legislature had not been able to fill? If the Senator will pardon me for a single moment, my purpose is not to interrupt or divert him,—far from it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I see; I understand.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator will see that the distinction I take is not technical or formal; it is substantial; and I will prove that by a single illustration. If it should be the established law that wherever a Legislature decided not to elect the power to fill the vacancy should revert to the executive of the State, the Senate and all of us must see how exposed the whole process of filling seats in the Senate would become; because the governor and his friends by cabal, intrigue, maneuver, might so arrange that the Legislature would decide not to elect or would fail to elect in order that the governor might gather to himself the power to fill the vacancy. The next Legislature might decide not to elect, and so indefinitely within the six years the executive power of a State might usurp that which the Constitution deposits with the legislative power. Therefore, I ask the honorable Senator to give me the words or the alteration of these words by which the framers of the Constitution would have been able to cover the case now before us, without covering other cases which we must all know they could not have intended to cover.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I appreciate the Senator's question because it is a very direct and forcible one and well put, and he has ably presented, I trust, to the Senate the very reason why the power contended for was not given. It is difficult to find words by which you could confer the power contended for without opening the case to the fraud and usurpation so well spoken of by the Senator.

On the one hand the object was to keep up as far as possible the State representation in the Senate. On the other hand it was intended to prevent the very combinations and corruptions and cabals and usurpations in behalf of the State executive to which the Senator has alluded; and therefore no attempt was made to get language to accomplish both purposes, and it would be difficult, I confess, even now at this late day, to employ language that would do it. For instance, take the language in the report submitted by the Committee of Detail before these amendments were put in by Mr. Madison; the language was this:

> Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the Legislature.

That covers all vacancies. Mr. Wilson objected to this phraseology, intimated the very trouble the Senator from New York has, so much more ably than even he did, depicted in a few words, that it opened the opportunity for collusion and corruption and conspiracy between opposition parties in the Legislature and the governor, and gave occasion to usurpation by the governor, and he was opposed to putting the power in the governor's hands at all, and moved to strike out the whole clause.

The object of the framers of the instrument was to close the door to the possibility of the frauds to which the Senator from New York has alluded, and yet provide for the filling of casual vacancies, and therefore they put in the words of limitation which restrain the executive power to fill vacancies to cases of pure casualty that cannot be anticipated, that cannot be foreseen, and therefore where there can be no conspiracies or combinations to usurp power on the part of the executive. That is the very reason of the difficulty the Senator has so ably and so clearly suggested—the difficulty of employing language that would allow a governor to fill a term in the first instance, to appoint at the beginning of an original term, and thus enable him to adopt means by which he could prevent the Legislature from electing, and thereby bring about a vacancy for himself to supply. The very difficulty of providing against these evils was the reason why these limitations were put in the Constitution, and which result in preventing him from filling such a vacancy at all.

I say to the distinguished Senator from New York that he has made the best argument I have heard yet in a few sentences. If you by any interpretation of these words allow the governor to appoint at the beginning of a term simply because the Legislature for any cause has not filled the seat do you not see that all the difficulties to which the Senator has so eloquently alluded will occur at once? Do you not see that schemes may be resorted to to prevent the Legislature from filling the seat? How do you know—I do not say it, I do not believe it, but take it to illustrate—how do you know but that a few adroit persons in New Hampshire, knowing that the act of Congress of 1866 required the Legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of Wadleigh's term to elect the Senator, intended to bring on a vacancy by electing a Legislature in November last and postponing the meeting of the Legislature until June next? Do you not see that if somebody had a purpose to accomplish to force a vacancy, to bring about a vacancy, he had only to contrive any scheme by which the Legislature would not elect? I say again to the Senator from New York that he has struck the very point. Whenever you admit that the governor can fill a vacancy which is brought about by the failure of the Legislature to do its duty for any cause you open the door to conspiracy and fraud to prevent the Legislature from filling that vacancy.

There is but one escape from that result, and that is to say that the language of the Constitution intended to confine the power of the governor to cases of casualty that the governor could not foresee, that schemers in the Legislature could not foresee, that conspirators could not foresee, that nobody could foresee, and therefore nobody could conspire to bring about. That is exactly the reason of the limitation; and the very moment you open the door in this case—that is the chief significance of this question—the very moment you allow a governor to fill the office of Senator at the beginning of a term because the Legislature, for any cause, for any reason, by any means, have failed to fill it, in that event you open the door for the governor to make the appointment whenever the Legislature fails to elect, and the rule may be adopted all over the country and means may be universally resorted to to prevent the Legislature from electing at the proper time. And for that very reason the rule was wisely settled in Lanman's case, and as the report of the majority of the committee shows many cases have occurred since that where States have been allowed to remain for more than a year without one representative in the Senate because the Legislature had failed to elect, sometimes because of the conflict of parties, one party being dominant in one branch of the Legislature and another party being dominant in the other they would not agree to go into the election. We have given a list of such cases. Do you not see that if you once vary the rule in Lanman's case and admit that whenever the Legislature for any cause shall fail to elect a Senator at the beginning of a term the governor may appoint, you offer an inducement to the governor and men in the Legislature, for the reasons so ably depicted by the Senator from New York, to bring about that failure, that very thing which it was intended to prevent, that very thing which Mr. Wilson dreaded when he moved to strike out the power altogether? He did not want to trust that power to the executive; it was not right; he was not willing to risk it there. Doubtless his mind saw dimly what the mind of the Senator from New York now so clearly sees, that it would open the door to immense frauds.

This is not only the rule, but it is wise that it should be the rule. The primary object of the Constitution is to put in the State Legislature the power to fill this office and nobody else; but casualties may occur, death may come, resignation may come, Senators may be expelled; there may be divers casualties by which the term thus filled by the Legislature may become vacant, and vacant during the recess of the Legislature and when Congress may be in session. It is important, therefore, as was said by Mr. Randolph, to allow the governor power to fill these chasms, not power to fill an original term.

I want to read in the hearing of the Senate another authority. I stated the other day that this word "otherwise" had received in the courts a fixed interpretation. The Senator from Vermont was kind enough to say that he had never heard of such a construction put upon the word before. I have no doubt if I had time I could find numerous authorities; but if I have found one, that is sufficient for the purpose. I read from 21 Wisconsin Supreme Court Reports, the case of the State, on complaint of Kennedy vs. McGarry, page 503, the opinion being by Dixon, chief-justice:

> The statute defining the powers of the board of supervisors of Milwaukee County for the regulation and management of the house of correction in that county, contains this language: "Said board shall also appoint one inspector for said house of correction, who shall be the principal keeper of said house of correction, and who shall hold his office for the term of two years, commencing on the first Monday of January succeeding his appointment, unless sooner removed by said board for incompetency, improper conduct, or other cause satisfactory to said board."

One of the definitions of the word "otherwise" is "other cause," and every Senator will admit that the words are precisely the same. Mark the language:

Unless sooner removed by said board for incompetency, improper conduct, or other cause.

The question before the court was what was the meaning of those words "other cause" in the power of removal. Hear what the court say:

The board may remove for incompetency, improper conduct, or other cause satisfactory to the board.

Which you see was a very broad power. The word "satisfactory" is emphasized by the court.

By "other cause" we understand other kindred cause, showing that it is improper that the incumbent should be retained in office.

Mark you, unless removed for incompetency, or bad conduct, or other cause. Now the court decide that the words "incompetent" and "improper conduct" limit the meaning of the term "other cause" to causes growing out of the bad conduct or incompetency of the incumbent.

By "other cause" we understand other kindred cause, showing that it is improper that the incumbent should be retained in office. If the board should attempt to remove him for some cause not affecting his competency or fitness to discharge the duties of the office, that would be an excess of power, and not a removal within the statute. It would be equivalent to removing him without assigning any cause—a merely arbitrary removal which the statute does not authorize.

I submit that the language in this Wisconsin statute is much broader than the words in this clause of the Constitution, for it said the man should continue in office for two years unless sooner removed for incompetency, improper conduct, or other cause satisfactory to the board. Now come the court and say those words "other cause satisfactory to you" do not give you a roving commission to find any reason, but those words "other cause" are limited by the words "incompetency" and "improper conduct" in the connection in which they are used, and therefore "other cause" means "other like cause."

You can find a great many decisions to this effect. The language here is "if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise." Gentlemen say the word "otherwise" means any way. But the expiration of a term comes within the rule that says you shall not construe "otherwise" in that particular meaning. Why? Because thereby you destroy the limitation, and the word "resignation," being a word of limitation with specific and defined meaning, limits the meaning of "otherwise;" that is, "otherwise" means "other like cases." Without having seen or examined the authorities for this, I so stated the other day, and the honorable Senator from Vermont questioned it and said he could not understand how it could mean "by similar means." You can find a number of cases of the same kind. It would be unreasonable to put any other meaning on this word. If you say that "otherwise" shall have its broad dictionary meaning, not its legal significance; that it shall derive its meaning from itself standing alone and not in connection with other words used as a legal phrase, you make "otherwise" broaden the broadest meaning of the previous language; and the very purpose of the argument on the other side is to show that when the Constitution says "when vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise" it means that if vacancies happen, or if vacancies occur, the governor may appoint, and you give no meaning to, you destroy the meaning of, "by resignation or otherwise."

So, then, this clause of the Constitution not only requires that vacancies should happen, but, to put the question beyond all doubt, it goes on specifically to declare that they shall happen by resignation or otherwise; that is, by resignation or by other similar cause, to allow the governor to appoint. What is "other similar cause?" Casualty; death is a similar cause because it is a casualty; removal is a similar cause because it is a casualty; refusal to accept is a similar cause because it is a casualty; but the ending of a term at a fixed time by law is not a casualty. That is not like "resignation;" that is not "otherwise." Why should the framers of the Constitution have undertaken to apply the term "otherwise" to the expiration of a term, an end fixed, an end settled not only by law but by the fundamental law? You see the absurdity of it.

Mr. President, I have deemed it necessary to be thus particular. I have not prepared my remarks with the care that I ought perhaps to have done on such a subject. I have simply relied upon these authorities and some others that I have on my brief, but which I will not take up the time of the Senate to present. There is more involved in this question than Senators at first may suppose. You may think that, the very object of the Constitution being to assure to the States representation at all times, we ought not to be narrow in construction. So we ought not; but, mark you, the Constitution as it stands has put it in the power of the States to be represented at all times. If any State has failed to be represented here to-day, it is the fault of nobody but the State; it is not the fault of anybody else; it is not the fault of the Constitution of the country. New Hampshire was notified that the term of her former Senator would expire last March; she was notified that if she wanted to fill that term she must do it by a certain Legislature at a certain time. We could not compel her to do it. She has failed by reason of her own deportment to do it. You say it was an accident. Strange accident, the making of a constitution! She could have avoided it. No one could have avoided it but New Hampshire, and if New Hampshire loses her voice temporarily in the Senate it is because of her own fault; she cannot blame this body. If you relax the rule as settled in the Lanman case and adhered to ever since, for the purpose of admitting this most excellent gentleman from New Hampshire, whom I should be glad to welcome as our associate here, you open the door to all the frauds and corruptions and conspiracies so well put by the Senator from New York in his interruption a short time ago.

I say therefore it is important that you close up this door and leave it where the proper construction of the Constitution puts it, that the New Hampshire Legislature shall fill the original term. She has ample power to do it. Nobody can prevent her from doing it; nobody can compel her to do it, and if she fails to do it it is her own fault and she can complain of nobody else. But if you allow New Hampshire by reason of her own conduct, thoughtless though it may have been or otherwise or accidental, to break down this rule to admit her excellent Senator here for a short space of two or three weeks or months, you establish thereby a precedent which overturns a principle which has lasted half a century, and open a door of fraud that nobody can foresee or calculate against.

One remark which I wished to make I had forgotten. It is out of place in this connection in my argument, but I forgot it in the right place. Gentlemen say that Lanman was rejected because the governor gave him the appointment in anticipation of a vacancy; that is, his commission was dated in February and the vacancy took place on the 4th of March, and that was the reason. We have shown already that that was not the reason. That was a mistaken reason, picked up by a local editor of the National Intelligencer, and it has acquired more importance than squibs in newspapers ought generally to have, because Mr. Gordon took it and Judge Story took it in a note; but when you come to look at the debate it was not so, and do you not see how absurd it would be? Do you not see that if you adopt the rule that the date of the commission is to make a difference and that the commission must date after the vacancy actually occurs, you destroy the whole purpose of it at once? Take the case of Mr. Lanman. One term expired on the 3d of March. The next term began on the 4th of March. The President had called the Senate together in executive session. Now, suppose we take your rule that the governor of Connecticut could not commission Mr. Lanman until the 4th of March, do you not see the result? Mr. Lanman's commission, signed in Connecticut after the 3d of March could not get to Washington and be here on the 4th of March. Before his commission gets here the extra term to which he is appointed may be ended. See the absurdity of that construction. No lawyer ever put such a construction on it. The date of the commission is nothing. Why did the governor of Connecticut issue his commission in February if you look at the date?

Mr. EATON. There were no railroads then.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No; there were no railroads then. The President had issued his proclamation calling the Senate together in executive session. The Legislature, the governor knew, would not be in session. There was a recess of the Legislature. Therefore Connecticut could not be represented on the 4th of March unless he appointed somebody. Now, then, what does the governor do? He simply issues a commission to Mr. Lanman to enable him to have it here by the 4th of March. As my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] suggests, there were no railroads then, and he issued the commission, I think, about the 13th or the middle of February.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Lanman was here.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. But the commission was not. He could not take his seat without the commission. It sometimes happens that a commission is of more importance than a Senator, for without a commission there cannot be a Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. Allow me to suggest that there was something in that case, I think quite as important as the railroad, and that is, there was no vacancy. No vacancy occurred for nearly a month after the governor of Connecticut issued that certificate.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The certificate is dated in February and the vacancy occurred on the 4th of March, but the certificate was issued to take effect on the 4th of March.

Mr. BAYARD. There was no vacancy at the time of the commission.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am discussing that very question, and I am showing how absurd it is to say the certificate is void because there is no vacancy when it is signed. The question is when it is to take effect. There was no Legislature in session; the extra session of the Senate had been called; the governor of Connecticut knew that, and he knew that if he did not get Mr. Lanman's commission by the 4th of March to him in Washington he could not take his seat.

Mr. EATON. Why might not the governor appoint at a time in advance as well as the Legislature elect at a time in advance?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly, if the power exists. What is the power? To fill the vacancy. He did not issue the commission in February to take effect in February; he issued the commission in February to take effect in March; and he issued it in February because it was necessary to issue it then to enable it to get here by the 4th of March. If you take the construction that he cannot date it, cannot issue it, until after the 4th of March, the purpose of signing it might all be gone before the commission got here.

Mr. BAYARD. At this point I desire to draw the attention of the honorable Senator from Connecticut as well as of the honorable Senator from Georgia, to this fact. Both have said that there were no railroads in 1825 by which speedy conveyance could be had with Washington. That is true; but I said there was also the other difficulty apparently in that case, that there was no vacancy; and the answer is that although there was no vacancy at the time the certificate was granted, it was in the power of the governor to make an appointment prospectively, and the suggestion comes from all around the honorable Senator from Georgia that the Legislature itself can elect in view of a prospective vacancy. I wish to draw the Senator's attention to the fact that the power of the Legislature to elect prospectively and the power of the governor to appoint prospectively are not the same. It is only for a vacancy that shall happen during the recess of the Legislature that the governor may appoint. The vacancy had not happened at that time at all; there was none. Therefore the power of the governor to appoint prospectively is not at all equal to the power of the Legislature to elect prospectively. The power of the Legislature is during its session next preceding the time the vacancy shall occur; but the governor shall only appoint when the vacancy has occurred during a recess of the Legislature.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The power of the Legislature of which the Senator speaks is conferred by statute. We are talking about constitutional power now.

Mr. BAYARD. I apprehend all power conferred by statute is constitutional.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly, but I say to my excellent friend from Delaware I concede outright that if the governor of Connecticut issued a commission to Mr. Lanman to take his seat in February that commission was void if there was no vacancy in February. But if the vacancy was in March and the vacancy did occur in March and the governor, as a precautionary measure, in order to have the commission here by the time the vacancy did occur, so that the man could take the seat on the first day of the vacancy, dated his commission in February to take effect in March, it was good. How does any rule of law prevent that? How does the date render it inoperative? It is the effect that is to be determined by the Constitution, not the date of the instrument. It took effect on the 4th of March. But it is useless to discuss that.

I say, now, Mr. President, that three things I consider necessary: first, the word "happen" in the clause giving the power to the President to fill all vacancies which happen during the recess of the Senate means vacancies that happen by casualty. It was so determined in 1822 distinctly by a vote of the Senate. It is so regarded by Mr. Story, adopted by Sergeant on the Constitution, adopted by all the law writers that I am acquainted with as the settled rule on this subject. That is the rule, says one of the writers, that has ever since been invariably adhered to, and so the courts construe it, so law writers construe it. Then in relation to this case the language is not only that vacancies must happen, but the additional words of limitation and qualification are put in to remove all doubt; they must happen by "resignation or otherwise," defining the word "happen," defining that it means by casualty, it means by resignation or other similar way; and that being the qualification, the third proposition is inevitable, a mere corollary, and that is that the governor of New Hampshire had no power to fill the senatorial term at the beginning, for that is a vacancy created not by casualty, not by death, not by resignation, but by the operation of law at a fixed time, certain and inevitable. It is possible that the Senate is called upon to resettle this question which ought to be considered settled. It was settled over fifty years ago, and that settlement has been acted on ever since. If we shall unsettle it again after fifty years the world can justly say that nothing is ever to be considered settled here except that nothing is settled.

I again repeat that I should be very glad to admit this gentleman on many accounts, but for the reasons I have given I think we have not the constitutional power to do so.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, under the clause of the Constitution which makes the Senate the judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own members, we sit as judges, should consider as judges, and so speak. In this case I have formed an opinion the reasons for which I desire as shortly as I may to lay before the Senate, and I may be pardoned for repeating the basis of law and fact from which my opinion is deduced. The clauses of the Constitution affecting this case are in section 3 of the first article.

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.
> Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

It then proceeds to state the qualification for a Senator. Another clause of the Constitution provides, article 5, "that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

It is evident that up to this time there has been an irreconcilable conflict in the decisions of cases of the appointment of Senators by State executives. Senators have been refused admission in some cases, in others have been granted admission upon an apparently similar state of law and facts. The reports both of the majority and of the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate have detailed to us the many instances in which up to the year 1817 there was a current of authority flowing in one direction in favor of the admission of Senators appointed by State executives as well at the commencement of an original term as at any period during its continuance. Such is the historical fact. Then came the case of Lanman in 1825, again that of Mr. Sevier of Arkansas in 1837. There appears to be between those cases a conflict, because there was a difference of facts; but in the present case let me remind Senators that we are proceeding not only under the Constitution but under a law passed in pursuance of the Constitution, at least I have never heard its constitutionality questioned unless questioned to-day by the honorable Senator from Georgia. I refer to the act of 1866 now compiled in the fourteenth section of the Revised Statutes, which provides:

> The Legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.

By that law was indicated the Legislature and the only Legislature which should fill vacancies in the Senate of the United States, whether occurring by expiration of the term or from any other cause. Now I submit to the Senate that the case of Mr. Bell, the claimant from New Hampshire, has no precedent in its facts; and the conclusion to which this most respectable committee by their majority have come would amount to this, that by act of Congress you had prevented the Legislature "chosen next before the expiration of the term" from acting, and by a construction it is sought to prevent the executive of the State from acting, so that neither by its Legislature, the primary constituency of a Senator, nor by the action of its executive, that is the supplemental power acting contingently under special and restrained circumstances, can the State obtain her equal suffrage in the Senate, nor can the Senate have its subscription of composition from the State. Can any such case be presented as a precedent? Did any case ever arise before in which a construction was given to the Constitution that absolutely excluded the State from her equal suffrage in the Senate whether it was to come from the Legislature or from the governor acting within the restrained and contingent limits of his power?

Perhaps the most authoritative case, that in which at least the arguments are most fully reported and which certainly was argued with as much ability as any in the history of this body, was that of Mr. Phelps of Vermont in 1854. The question in that case was whether he having been appointed (and the validity of his original appointment by the governor was not questioned) could continue to hold his office after an opportunity had been given to the Legislature of his State to elect a successor to fill that vacancy, and the Senate by a decided vote of more than two to one, decided that he could not be appointed to continue in office after the next meeting of the Legislature. The reasoning of that case is to be found on page 618 of volume 1 of Contested Election Cases, being the report of the minority, A. P. Butler and J. A. Bayard, which after an elaborate debate was adopted by the Senate:

> The Senate of the United States is composed of organized constituencies, the State Legislatures; to them belong the power primarily of electing their Senators when they are in session at the happening of the vacancy and at their first meeting when it happens in their recess, and on them devolves the exclusive jurisdiction of filling such vacancies. Their right and authority to fill or supply vacancies which have been temporarily filled by executive appointment are as absolute and exclusive as was their power in an original election. When their power is brought into existence it must supersede all others, with this qualification, and that according to precedent, that they have a session to make the choice.

I beg the attention of the Senate to that reason:

> When their power—

That is, the power of the Legislature to fill the vacancy—

> is brought into existence it must supersede all others, with this qualification, and that according to precedent, that they have a session to make the choice. In our view it does not depend on the actual exertion of the power to elect, but on its existence.

Not on the exertion of the power but on the fact of the existence of the power. Can it be said that this reasoning will sustain the report of the majority in the present case where there has never been an opportunity for the exertion of the power by the Legislature to make a choice? What is the power that supersedes the temporary appointing power of the governor? The power of the Legislature, the primary constituency; but until that power has existence it cannot be exerted, and until it has existence it does not supersede the action of the governor.

> A Senator under an executive appointment may, or may not, represent the political views of his State; he may be the mere personal favorite of the governor. The Senate, as far as practicable, should be made to represent its constitutional constituency, and in this respect should preserve the republican feature of our Union.

Who will not assent to that? And assenting to that how is the title of the present claimant shaken? In the year 1878, by a change in constitutional arrangements made lawfully, the time of choosing a Legislature in that State was altered, and instead of electing it as theretofore in the spring of the year they elected it in the autumn of the year, choosing in the month of November instead of the month of March. The Legislature chosen in the month of November, according to its own limitation of appointment, could not be convened until the month of May, 1879. A vacancy took place, occurred, or happened, a vacancy came to pass in the office of Senator from that State on the 4th of March. There was then no Legislature in session. On the 18th of March it became necessary for this body to convene. It is a continuing body. I agree that extra sessions are as constitutional, as much within the purview of the Constitution as its regular sessions; and we are here under the Constitution and by law, and a vacancy exists in the representation from New Hampshire which did occur in the recess of the Legislature of that State. If the governor of New Hampshire desired that his State should be represented, he had one of two courses open. If the machinery of the government of that State would permit him to bring the Legislature together, it was more in conformity with republican form that he should convene the Legislature although the Constitution might give him a discretion to make a temporary appointment; but as matter of law if he had convened the Legislature what Legislature would have been convened? The Legislature chosen in November, 1878, or the Legislature that preceded that? Clearly the preceding Legislature, the Legislature that adjourned in June, 1878, was alone the Legislature that under the constitution and laws of the State of New Hampshire could be convened, and yet that Legislature would have been unable to choose a Senator. And why? Because in the language of the act of 1866 it was not the Legislature chosen next before the expiration of the term——

Mr. CARPENTER. May I be pardoned for a suggestion?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. I take it for granted that the State of New Hampshire could not have two Legislatures at the same time. The old Legislature, if it could have met in extra session on the 5th of March, would have been the one that should be convened, the Senator says. That was the only Legislature that could or did meet until after the happening of this vacancy, or its occurrence, as you choose. Now, I want to know why that Legislature was not the Legislature elected last before the vacancy took place? There was no other Legislature and could be no other at that time.

Mr. BAYARD. The construction that I give to the act of Congress would not be affected because its language is this:

> The Legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress, shall, &c.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is the Legislature; that is the Legislature in existence before the expiration of the senatorial term. Now, I say that the only Legislature of that State which had been elected, because the only Legislature existing last prior to the expiration of the term, was the old one. The other was not the Legislature at that time, was not when the 4th of March came, is not to-day. If you were to have an extra session to-day in New Hampshire it would be the old Legislature that would be convened, and not the new one. Therefore I say that is the Legislature to-day, a month after that vacancy took place, which was elected last prior to that vacancy.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not agree with the Senator, if I understand him correctly, because it seems to me by the very force of the language that there was a Legislature "chosen" in New Hampshire in the month of November, 1878, and that was the one "chosen next before" the 4th day of March, 1879, and being so chosen it was, if I read the plain meaning or what is to me the obvious meaning of the statute, the Legislature that must fill a vacancy to occur after its being so chosen.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Sentaor from Delaware allow me to ask my colleague a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. When was the Legislature which will assemble in New Hampshire in June next chosen?

Mr. CARPENTER. In the first place, what is the Legislature? The members who will be the Legislature when the new constitution comes into force were elected at the time you say; and if that is a Legislature now, then there are two Legislatures in that State to-day, which I maintain cannot be.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. When the Legislature assembles in June next, if that question were asked my colleague, when was that Legislature chosen, would he say it was chosen on the day it assembles, or on the 5th day of November, the day upon which the members were voted for?

Mr. CARPENTER. If you came to me with your question I should have to answer that that has not anything to do with this debate, because New Hampshire cannot have two Legislatures at the same time. Are there two Legislatures there to-day?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No; but the act of 1866 speaks of the Legislature chosen next before the vacancy; that I think is the word used, "chosen."

Mr. CARPENTER. The governing word is "Legislature;" it must be a Legislature, and if it does not come to the point of being a Legislature, it cannot be anything.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the argument of my honorable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] would be stronger if the words of the act of Congress were not what they are. If the words of the act of Congress had been that the election should be by the Legislature which was elected and organized next before the vacancy, he would be right; but it is perfectly clear that the day of election, the day of choice was the date for choosing the Legislature which has not yet assembled and organized. The Senate, however, must weigh the force of the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin, which I confess does not strike me.

The language of the act of Congress of 1866, putting in motion the constitutional powers of the Legislature and regulating them, was intended, I presume, to prevent any antecedent Legislature from anticipating vacancies which had not occurred, or from filling vacancies by anticipation; in other words, usurping the power of the nearest Legislature to the event of the vacancy by a long preceding election; and they therefore gave this interpretation to the language of the Constitution that made it obligatory upon the Legislature, after a temporary appointment had been made by the executive, at its "next meeting" then to fill such vacancies. The language is mandatory. An important question was which Legislature shall do this thing, and the law answers that which is chosen at a date nearest to the time when the vacancy occurs. In this case the Legislature so chosen is that which under the laws of New Hampshire cannot be convened until May. The Legislature that preceded it is not, according to my construction of this law, competent to elect to fill this vacancy. In that state of things, has or has not the contingency arisen contemplated by the Constitution; has or has not the vacancy happened which was contemplated by the Constitution, and which the executive of the State is authorized temporarily to fill "until the next meeting of the Legislature?"

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It is whether in point of law and fact the Legislature spoken of by the Senator from Wisconsin is the Legislature elected in November, or whether it be the Legislature that was elected in March, 1878, that must choose the Senator? Does not the inability of the Legislature elected whenever it was, arise from the action of New Hampshire and New Hampshire alone, and does she not by that action consent that a Senator shall not be elected, and could not New Hampshire by her own act have avoided this catastrophe? Could she not have made provision that either Legislature might assemble and elect and should be the Legislature for that purpose?

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to put one more question, and I will make a contract with him that I will not interrupt again?

Mr. BAYARD. Very well.

Mr. CARPENTER. Suppose the Legislature should be convened to-day in New Hampshire by a call from the governor to attend to any State business. This vacancy has already existed a month. Could not that Legislature fill it?

Mr. BAYARD. I hold not.

Mr. CARPENTER. You think not?

Mr. BAYARD. I think not.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then suppose, putting a case, the new constitution had said this Legislature elected in November before the term expired should not meet for ten years, then for ten years there could be no Legislature to elect a Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think the reductio ad absurdum is a fair way of arguing. We are dealing with what I consider is an important question, and the question before the Senate now is I think whether we shall give the act of 1866 such a construction as shall deprive a State of her equal suffrage in the Senate and the General Government of a member of one of its essential branches? That is the question. What construction will you give to that act?

Now considering this by the light of the cases which have preceded, there is no case like the present to be found,—none whatever. There is no such case where the attempt of a Legislature to elect would have been directly in the teeth of the letter of the law of Congress proposing to regulate this subject. I am now proceeding upon the hypothesis that the act of 1866 is warranted by the Constitution and being passed in pursuance of it is to be followed and the action of a State in violation thereof is void. Therefore considering the facts, what construction will the Senate give? That which will substantially satisfy the great object for which Senators were to be elected, the constitution of this branch of the legislative power, or that it shall at once defeat the right of a State to its equal suffrage in the Senate and prevent the Government of the Union from having its subscription from a State of its necessary complement? I say no such case has occurred before. It is difficult to imagine the case occurring again. The danger of such a construction therefore cannot be as great as the alarmed imagination of my friend from Georgia depicted it.

Look at the meaning of the decisions which have been referred to in report of the committee and in argument. The case of Lanman in 1825 is fully reported nowhere. The note in Gordon's Digest which forms the syllabus of Mr. Bartlett's compilation, and the very meager outline of a report in Niles's Register, are all before us, and it is not too much to say that they are entirely unsatisfactory and fail to give the reasoning upon which the votes of the majority were cast in that case. Now, one fact does appear in Lanman's case, that that gubernatorial appointment was manifestly not within the letter or the meaning of the Constitution.

In the first place the governor assumed to act at a time when there was no vacancy. On the date of his certificate there was no vacancy. The language of the Constitution had not been satisfied. His power was restrained to an emergency which had not arisen. If vacancies happen, says the Constitution, during the recess of the Legislature, the executive may make temporary appointments until the next meeting, and so on. Had the vacancy happened? Must not the vacancy occur before the governor can act? Plainly; and had it occurred when he did act in 1825? Certainly not. He acted on the 9th of February and there was no vacancy for nearly one month after that time. How then can it be said that if the constitution gives to the executive of the State only as a matter of secondary resort, not as a primary power, and for a temporary period and only under certain contingencies the right to make the appointment of a Senator to supply a vacancy in the State suffrage and supply membership in this body,—how can it be said that that right exists until all the facts have occurred which alone justify its exercise? If the vacancy had not happened—I am now leaving out of consideration the meaning of the word "happen" and the words associated with it; I shall presently come to that part of the matter, but I am treating it for the present as if a vacancy which he would otherwise have been competent to fill, he was not competent because of a lack of authority under the Constitution; and therefore I say that the construction given to the report of the committee who reported in his favor in 1825, that which is taken by Judge Story of whose authority it will do for no man to speak without respect, is to be regarded, and what is it? That the Senate by a vote of 23 to 18 decided that the appointment could not be constitutionally made until after the vacancy had actually occurred. Judge Story gives that as the reason why Mr. Lanman was refused his seat in the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask a question? There is a clause of the Constitution to which he has not referred authorizing the President to fill vacancies in civil offices that happen during the recess of the Senate. Does not the President appoint before the time arrives for the vacancy to take effect?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not speak of custom, but I know a case in which that was proposed to be done at the last session of the Senate, and I remember some private conversation between the honorable Senator from Florida and myself in which I gave him then in private the same opinion that I do now in open Senate, that I doubted whether until the vacancy had occurred the emergency for the executive action had arisen.

I prefer, however, Mr. President, to argue this case solely upon the basis of the language of the Constitution applicable to the office of Senator. There may be analogies between the case of filling vacancies in the office of Senator and the power of the Federal Executive to make temporary appointments to fill general official vacancies which may happen during the recess of Congress. I do not deny that there may be analogies, and the same reasoning may be applicable to many cases; but I feel that in this case it is safer, and better, and it is sufficient for us, to confine our present consideration of the Constitution to the case of Senators elected or appointed under its provisions.

I have said that the case of Mr. Lanman in 1825 is not so reported as to give us a satisfactory understanding why it was that the vote of 23 to 18 was cast. If the statement made by Judge Story and his construction of the meaning of that vote is true, then it puts Lanman's case entirely beside the one which we are now considering, because he was excluded for a totally different reason from that which is sought to be alleged as the ground for refusing Mr. Bell admission. He was excluded, says Judge Story, on the ground that the vacancy had not occurred at the time the governor undertook to fill it, and by the terms of the Constitution he could not fill it by anticipation, but must wait for the actual occurrence of the vacancy.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will my colleague allow me to call his attention to what was decided in the Lanman case as stated in this body by his father, whose statement I will read, if he will permit?

Mr. BAYARD. I have the case here. I admit the authority with reverence; there can be none higher with me, but I think perhaps I shall meet the opinion of the Senator referred to by my respected colleague by saying that he was not considering and did not consider any such case as that which is now before the Senate, because it was from the language written by him in 1854 that I read to show that only until the opportunity was given to the Legislature to fulfill its functions the power of the governor to appoint came in as secondary and supplemental. I have quoted at length in the course of my remarks from the minority report which I find at page 618 of this compilation of contested elections, signed by Judge Butler of South Carolina, and Mr. Bayard of Delaware.

But I come to speak now of the case of Mr. Sevier that arose in 1837. The decision in that case was in one important respect upon facts similar to the one before us. Mr. Sevier was duly elected for a constitutional term and under the Constitution his term as finally determined was for two years and not four or six. It was upon the admission of Arkansas as a State in the Union. Mr. Sevier was one of the first Senators elected from Arkansas. He was elected in 1836. According to the Constitution he and his colleague had to draw lots to know to which class of Senators they should be assigned. In that lottery Mr. Sevier drew the shortest term, which expired on the 4th of March, 1837, so that having been elected in 1836 he occupied a seat but about one year. After he drew the short term and before the period arrived at which he would have to retire, according to the limitation of his term of office, the governor of the State, in anticipation of the vacancy which must happen after the 3d of March, 1837, appointed Mr. Sevier to fill the vacancy that would necessarily exist after the expiration of his constitutional term—and the Senate decided to admit him under such an appointment.

Now it is said that the fact was that his term was decided by lot, that whether Mr. Fulton his colleague or himself should have a longer or shorter term, was a question that had been decided at once upon their admission by lot, or perhaps before they took their seats; but in any event it was for a constitutional term. The Constitution in dividing Senators into three classes provides as well for terms of two years and four years as it does for terms of six years. It is just as definite in one case as the other, and the fact that it was one seat in the Senate and not another seat did not affect the law or the reasoning applicable to the law or the power of the governor of Arkansas to fill the vacancy. The expiration of a term of two years is just as void of uncertainty as the expiration of a term of six. You no more can say that a thing "happens" at the end of two years than at the end of six years. If you are to apply the definition of uncertainty to the word "happen" then it applies to anything that must occur in the certainty of the world's affairs, whether it is at the end of one, two, or three years. Mr. Sevier was appointed; he was appointed at the end of one original constitutional term and the commencement of another. Nay, more; he was appointed in anticipation of a vacancy that had not happened or did not exist at the time of his appointment; and yet the Senate of the United States admitted him to its membership.

According to the construction adopted by Judge Story in his Commentaries upon the case of Lanman, Mr. Sevier would not have been entitled to his seat, because the contingency had not arisen at the time of his appointment by the governor of Arkansas, the vacancy had not happened, and until it had happened the governor had no power to appoint. That was the reasoning in Lanman's case; but the Senate seemed to disregard it wholly in Sevier's case, and further than that they admitted him despite the fact that he was appointed by the governor to commence a new term upon the expiration of a constitutional term for which he had originally been chosen. The fact that when two Senators first come here from a State one is to have a term of two years and the other a term of four years awarded by lot does not affect the constitutionality of their terms. It does not affect the right of the governor to fill vacancies in such terms or the right of the Legislature to fill vacancies when such terms expire. The same reasons, the same rules apply to fill any constitutional term under the Constitution.

All terms of senatorial service are fixed by the Constitution, all are equally certain to expire by the lapse of time. The power to fill them at their commencement is as strong in one case as in the other, and I do not think a reasonable distinction can be shown why you should not fill the beginning of that term which is marked by the expiration of a preceding term because that preceding term under the Constitution is two years instead of four or six. The question in Sevier's case was whether it was to be Fulton's seat or Sevier's seat which was first to become vacant by the efflux of time. The uncertainty was as to which of those terms was to be fixed by lot at two or four years; but the instant that the lot had been drawn and the term had been fixed its efflux was certain, there was no uncertainty about it, the two years were bound to expire as certainly as the four or six, and the new term commenced upon the expiration of the old.

So then I say the decisions in the cases of Lanman and Sevier are utterly, as far as they are reported to us, inconsistent with each other, and the reasons that rejected Mr. Lanman would have rejected Mr. Sevier, and indeed there were additional reasons for Mr. Sevier's rejection that did not exist in Mr. Lanman's case.

In the history of the Constitution by George Ticknor Curtis, he treats in a short paragraph of the exercise of these powers to fill up vacancies in either branch of Congress and points out the reason why there was a mandatory clause in relation to the House of Representatives that did not exist in respect to the Senate:

> The difference of origin of the two branches of the Legislature made it necessary to provide for different modes of supplying the vacancies that might occur in them. The obvious way of effecting this in the case of a vacancy in the office of a representative was to order a new election by the people, who can readily assemble for such a purpose; and the duty of ordering such elections was imposed on the executives of the States, because those functionaries would be best informed as to the convenience of their meeting.

And I believe that under the act of Congress now existing it is left to the discretion of the executives of the different States when they will call special elections to fill vacancies occurring:

> But the State Legislatures, to whom the choice of Senators was to be confided, would be in session for only a part of the year; and to summon them for the special purpose of filling a vacancy in the Senate might occasion great inconvenience. The committee of detail, therefore, provided that vacancies in the Senate might be supplied by the executive of the State until the next meeting of its Legislature.

Therefore, the reason is intelligently stated by this able and distinguished commentator and historian of the Constitution why it was, from the difference of the constituencies to elect a Senator and a Representative, that the power was given to the executive of the State to make a temporary appointment to the Senate which should end when the next session of the Legislature should occur, upon whom was imposed, by mandatory phrase, the duty to fill the vacancy which had occurred.

Now, sir, as to the meaning of the words "vacancy" and "happen." I admit there is great force in the reasoning and in the authorities of the Senators who have spoken in favor of the report of the committee; and authorities are to be found which would restrain the meaning of the word "happen" so that it is to be only the result of a casualty. "Happen" is used by lexicographers as a synonym to "occur;" "to happen" is "to occur;" "to occur" is "to happen." The common use of words may perhaps often misapply either of these; but can we divorce this word "happen" from its associates? Is it possible that when the framers of the Constitution, such admitted masters of language as they were, inserted words, they did it for the purpose of restraining the meaning of the words which they had previously employed? I suggest to the honorable Senator from Georgia, whom I do not now see in his seat, that if it had intended that nothing but a vacancy by resignation should become a case for a temporary appointment by the State executive, why not say "a vacancy which shall happen by resignation and not otherwise?" Is it possible that "otherwise" means "the same?" Does not "*other*wise" mean "other ways?" Does it not mean "not in a similar manner?" I despair of appreciating the force of the English language if I am told that "other" means "the same," and that "otherwise" means "likewise or similar." I confess my inability to grasp so surprising and strange a meaning of the word "otherwise" as it occurs to me. You may fill this vacancy if it happen by resignation or otherwise, and it is hereafter that "otherwise" is placed in that connection to restrain the meaning of the word "resignation," and not to enlarge it! I cannot so construe it.

A vacancy has happened; it has occurred; it has come to pass in the represenation of the State of New Hampshire in the Senate of the United States. It did not happen by death, nor by expulsion, nor by resignation; but it did happen "otherwise." Mr. President, it seems to me that in the construction of the frame-work of government substance, and not technicality, should be followed, and that its great objects should be always kept in view. Recurrence to the debates in the convention wherein was framed this Constitution of our Government will show that there was great apprehension, and at that time well founded, among the founders lest the Government of the Union should not be supplied by the voluntary elective action of the States. They knew that it was in the power, as it is in the power of the States, or a majority of them, to refuse to elect Senators, and so the legislative powers of the Union would be suspended. In that most luminous and able opinion which stands almost without its equal in the annals of our jurisprudence, the opinion of Chief-Justice Marshall, in the case of Cohen vs. Virginia, he states that proposition nearly in the words I have used.

Knowing such power to exist in the States, what was the action of the convention? They met, not to place difficulties and technicalities in the way of representatives coming into this or the other House of Congress, but to do everything that should encourage their presence and induce them to come here whenever they were the actual representatives of their people. The history of those early days will show that the means of transportation and travel were scanty and poor; the compensation given to members of Congress was in miserable proportion to the loss of time, the trouble and expense to which they were subjected in coming to Congress. It was difficult in those days for State Legislatures to meet; still more so for the Legislature of the Union to be brought together; and when they did so meet at their first session, how many weary weeks that grew into months of anxiety, elapsed before a quorum of this Senate could be secured? Can it be that they designedly employed in the Constitution language that was intended to prevent vacancies in this body from being filled and prevent the States from coming here by their representatives? Can it be that they designedly provided that vacancies should occur without even a possibility of filling them, or is it not in reason, in common sense, in the very spirit of nationality and union so essential for us all—is it not reasonable to say that when they used the word "resignation" as one means by which a vacancy should occur, they did not restrict it by coupling it with the words "or otherwise," but that they meant to enlarge it? Why, sir, this power of gubernatorial appointment ends necessarily when the next Legislature meets. Why? Because the Constitution says that the Legislature must "then" fill the vacancy, and the power is theirs exclusively to fill the vacancy. And, therefore, as in Mr. Phelps's case, it was decided that when they once have met, whether they have exercised the power or not, the existence of the power and not its exercise is the test; and the power once brought into existence by their meeting is theirs exclusively, and no executive can subsequently fill that vacancy by his appointee.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. Under that provision of the Constitution the appointment made by the governor can only last till the next session of the Legislature?

Mr. BAYARD. That is so.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the governor of New Hampshire should call a special session of the Legislature to-day, the old Legislature would meet to-morrow if he were to call it for to-morrow. According to that, if the old Legislature of the State is the only one now in existence, it would meet to-morrow. The Senator admits that this appointment of the governor would fall on the meeting of the old Legislature, and yet he thinks that that Legislature cannot fill the vacancy.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator has returned, I will not say to his first love, but to one of many in this case in his attack upon the obvious meaning of the act of Congress. I take it for granted that the Legislature to be called together is a Legislature competent to elect; otherwise there is no use to call it, and now how stands the question as between him and me? I understand still he does not consider that the Legislature which is chosen next before the occurrence of the vacancy is the only one to elect, whereas I do, and, therefore, I think that the case he puts or the impossible case which is sought to be created by the majority of the committee in their report, will be this, that you place a State in such a condition that she has no Legislature that can elect a Senator, and you refuse to allow the vacancy to be filled by the governor. Now, that I hold is a state of affairs never contemplated by those who framed this Government. They did intend that there should be the primary power in the constitutional constituency of a Senator, which is the Legislature, to elect either for original terms or to fill vacancies; but in their absence, when a vacancy happened which they, not having been assembled, had no opportunity to fill and therefore had no duty to fill, the governor should appoint until they met, and until the time had come for the exercise of the exclusive power which the mandatory phrase of the Constitution imposed upon the Legislature, which is that they shall proceed to fill that vacancy.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the Senator will allow me a moment, the provision that the appointment made by the governor shall extend only to the meeting of the Legislature is in the Constitution of the United States. It does not acquire support from the act of 1866, and cannot lose any force in consequence of it. Therefore this appointment which has been made, if it is a valid one, by the governor of New Hampshire must expire as soon as the Legislature of that State convenes. The Congress of the United States cannot determine what is the Legislature of New Hampshire, but if the governor of that State should convene the Legislature of the State under its constitution and laws to meet to-morrow morning, the old Legislature would have to meet.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Does not the Constitution require that Legislature to fill the vacancy?

Mr. BAYARD. I would rather turn the Senator from Wisconsin over to the report made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections on this very case at the last session. The opinion was reported to the Senate, and I believe it was accepted and adopted by the Senate, without any division, that the Legislature competent to elect Mr. Bainbridge Wadleigh's successor was the Legislature that was chosen in the month of November, 1878, and not the prior one.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to state that that report was made without any dissent by the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. BAYARD. It was the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAYARD. And accepted by the Senate without dissent?

Mr. McMILLAN. And adopted by the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. I had forgotten the exact history of its adoption, but it will do for the present to answer my friend from Wisconsin. The question then was considered and it was decided that the "next Legislature" which was competent to elect a successor to Mr. Wadleigh was that which could not under the laws of New Hampshire assemble until 1879.

However, Mr. President, this is all that I meant to say, perhaps more than I meant to say, for I should have concluded my remarks long ago but for the interruptions to which very naturally and no doubt very properly I was subjected.

I have given this opinion not without great hesitation. I will not say that on every point it is as satisfactory to me as I would wish, because it is not devoid of doubt as to its conflict with certain rules which have been ably sustained in the Senate before now; but I am satisfied of its substantial justice and its safety. Considered by the light of the cases which have been brought here to justify the exclusion of the present claimant I can see that it is a totally different case with a totally different state of facts from any which have hitherto presented themselves to the Senate. And I prefer that the great and substantial objects of the Constitution should be kept in view in making constructions of its provisions to technicalities which, although I will not deride or affect to despise them, still fail to meet the broad, strong idea that was intended, that this Government should be maintained for the sake of the States through the action of the States, and that no State without its consent should be deprived of its equal suffrage in this body. It is for that great principle, it is for the sake of that essential bond of Union, that I would throw no difficulty but every encouragement rather in the power of the State to have its representative here, because as I have said before, and as Chief-Justice Marshal said, this Government depends for its legislative existence upon the voluntary action of the States in sending their Senators here. If of two constructions one will further the great objects of the Constitution, and the other will tend to obstruct them, I shall prefer always to adopt the former.

Mr. GARLAND obtained the floor.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to say a word before the Senator from Arkansas proceeds.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I was going to move that the Senate adjourn. The Senator from Arkansas gives way for that motion.

Mr. PADDOCK. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that he withdraw the motion to adjourn and let us have a brief executive session.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Very well.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. BRUCE. Before that is done I desire to offer a resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate appoint a select committee of five on the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, to take into consideration all matters relating to said institution; that said committee be authorized to employ a clerk; and that the necessary expenses be paid out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 8, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. BRUCE, Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin, Mr. GORDON, Mr. WITHERS, and Mr. GARLAND as the select committee to take into consideration all matters relating to the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company under the resolution of the Senate of the 7th instant.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed, under the provisions of section 3756 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, Mr. WHYTE, Mr. RANSOM, and Mr. ANTHONY as members on the part of the Senate of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 24th of March, 1879, information concerning the refunding of the public debt and the amount of public moneys held by national-bank depositories; which the Secretary proceeded to read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] to this communication, which is responsive to a resolution submitted by him. What disposition shall be made of it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let it lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication will be printed and lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Delaware.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WITHERS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, to report it without amendment. I ask that it be printed and placed on the Calendar, and I give notice that I shall call it up as soon as the present question of privilege before the Senate has been disposed of.

Mr. BLAINE. I offer an amendment to be proposed to the Army appropriation bill just reported.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, and Mr. INGALLS. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported, if desired.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of section 6 the following:

And any military, naval, or civil officer, or any other person, who shall, except for the purposes herein named, appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description, either concealed or displayed, within a mile of any polling place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall on conviction be punished with a fine not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask that the amendment be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Maine.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 367) granting an increase of pension to Isabel L. Evans; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous conent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 368) for the relief of Emanuel Klauser; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOOTH (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 369) for the relief of Alexander McDonald; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 370) granting a pension to Phœbe C. Doxsie; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on the file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KIRKWOOD (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 371) to organize the National Railway Company of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. GROVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 372) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Willamette River, at Portland, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 373) to aid in the protection of life and of the public buildings and property against loss and damage by fire; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 374) for the relief of James A. Heard; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 375) to repeal sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put this bill upon its passage at once and without a reference to any committee. It repeals the two sections of the Revised Statutes passed in 1862 which provide test oaths and disqualifications for jurors in the courts of the United States, the effect of which practically is to exclude the great body of the citizens of intelligence and character from the jury-box in the Southern States. The Senate has already signified its approval to this measure of repeal; and in view of the situation of public affairs which is well known and comprehended in the Senate, I earnestly ask that no objection be made to the present consideration and passage of the bill. I do not desire to debate it, but offering it as I do in a spirit and for the sake of justice and good feeling among our countrymen and between the political parties of the two Houses of Congress, I earnestly hope that the unanimous consent, which I know is necessary for its immediate passage, will be granted by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is not unanimous consent, Mr. President. I am not aware that the Senate has passed any bill to repeal section 821. If the Senate has done so, it has escaped my recollection. I should be glad to have the honorable Senator from Delaware inform us when it was that the Senate passed a bill to repeal section 821, which is a section providing merely for a discretion in the court to excuse a juror from serving who has been engaged or who swears that he has been engaged in an insurrection or rebellion.

There are circumstances under which section 821 as it stands would be too broad theoretically. The time has been so long and people have grown up so much that I do not know that practically it would very often happen that it would work any injustice as it stands; but theoretically it might in certain cases. In certain other cases it would be of great advantage to the interests of justice that substantially that provision should be there. The words of section 821 do not refer exclusively to the rebellion or insurrection that began in the year 1860 or 1861, but they refer to and cover as they stand now any act of violence by an armed concerting body of men that, within the decisions of the courts, made long before the rebellion that we are all so glad is over occurred, amount to an insurrection against the laws of the United States; as if a body of men should combine together to resist the whisky laws, the internal-revenue laws, hundreds of them in some sections of the State of Vermont (I will not name any other State because I do not wish to be invidious) and some one of them at last is arrested. In that small State and in that small district the whole body of the jurors summoned may contain a certain percentage of the very accomplices, associates, and fellows in that very concerted insurrection for a breach of the law. As this law stands, it would authorize the judge in a given case to sift out the juror and to leave off from the panel the accomplices and fellow-criminals of the very man who was to be tried. In such a case I suppose everybody would agree—I suppose so until I hear otherwise—that a law of that kind would be right and that what it requires ought to be done.

Then, Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senate has never to my knowledge voted to repeal section 821 in toto, and inasmuch as very likely if this bill goes to the proper committee it is now so organized that undoubtedly it would receive prompt action and due consideration, that committee might substitute for section 821 a provision which would be satisfactory to everybody, would meet the ends of justice, and would escape the occasional evils that my friend from Delaware thinks would arise if the law were to stand, I must ask, with great respect to my friend, that the bill go to a committee.

As to section 820, that, as everybody knows, was repealed by both Houses of Congress in the year 1870 or 1871, if I am not mistaken, and got back into the Revised Statutes by one of that numerous class of accidents that we know ran through the whole book. The Senate has since passed an act to repeal that section, but the House of Representatives at the last session found it convenient not to take it up, or to speak more respectfully, found it inconvenient to take it up and to do anything with it, so far as we know. Therefore I hope the bill will take the usual course. It can be acted upon undoubtedly very soon.

Mr. BAYARD. I am aware that nothing could pass the bill at this time but its acceptance by the entire body. Of course a motion to carry it to the committee is regular; it is in accordance with the rules of the body; and therefore I have nothing more to say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 376) granting a pension to Hiram Johnson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 377) for the relief of Robert Ewing; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WHYTE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 378) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Captain Lambert Wickes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 379) for the relief of Cora A. Slocumb, Ida A. Richardson, and Caroline A. Urquhart; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LAMAR asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 380) for the relief of Henry E. Sizer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 381) for the relief of Wetmore & Brother, of Saint Louis, Missouri; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 18) to inquire into and define the acts of July 27, 1866, and June 28, 1870, granting lands to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BECK, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers in the case of T. T. Garrard and others be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, it was Ordered, That J. N. Casanova have leave to withdraw his memorial and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the testimony taken by the committee to investigate and report the best means of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases in the United States be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and delivered to the National Board of Health.

APPORTIONMENT OF DEPARTMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. GARLAND submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment be instructed to inquire into the expediency of apportioning the clerks and other employés in the various Departments of the Government among the several States according to their ratio of population, and to report by bill or otherwise.

ACCOUNTS OF JOHN I. DAVENPORT.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution offered by me yesterday, which I now send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware calls for the consideration of the resolution submitted by him yesterday, which will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BAYARD April 7:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a statement of all sums of money which have, in 1870 and in each year since, been paid out of the Treasury to John I. Davenport, either as chief supervisor of elections, clerk of the United States circuit court, United States court commissioner, or in any other official capacity, or for any service or disbursement whatever; distinguishing between payments as chief supervisor, clerk of the circuit court, or United States commissioner, and for other services or disbursement; and to transmit to the Senate transcripts of any and all bills, accounts, or claims on which such sums were paid to the said Davenport, and all official correspondence respecting such accounts, claims, auditing, and payment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to be permitted to read this resolution over for a moment. I did not notice that it was called up and I have not read it, which I will do in a single moment if I am allowed. [A pause.]

I do not understand,—perhaps it is not important that I should or that any other Senator except him who moves the resolution,—the object of several of its clauses. However, without understanding, I do not feel called upon to object. The Senator wants to know what this individual received as clerk of a court and in various other capacities. Not being able to understand the motive of it, I make no objection to it.

The resolution was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no further business for the morning hour the Senate will proceed to the consideration of its unfinished business, being the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections declaring "that Hon. Charles H. Bell is not entitled to a seat as a Senator by virtue of the appointment by the executive of New Hampshire." The pending question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to strike out from the resolution the word "not" before the word "entitled."

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the position that I take in reference to this matter, from my reading of the Constitution, is that Legislatures of the States, being the original constituency of the United States Senate, must themselves by election place a Senator in this body at the beginning of a new term; or, to state the proposition somewhat differently, it is not within the meaning of the Constitution that the governor of a State can put upon the floor of the Senate a Senator at the commencement of a new term of six years, or a new term that might be by the meeting of the Legislature afterward for a shorter period. Before the governor of a State can appoint a Senator to fill what he may consider a vacancy in the Senate, there must not only be an unfilled seat but a broken term previously held by some one else. Those three propositions, or rather those three different ways of stating in effect one proposition, I shall attempt to maintain before the Senate in a few brief moments upon a fair construction of the Constitution and upon the precedents which have been set by this body under the Constitution.

There is very little light to be thrown upon this subject, in my judgment, by the statutes of the different States or the statutes of the United States upon any question that has yet been sprung by any Senator here. The analogy is the most remote, if any exists at all. Even the decision, an extract from which was read by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] the other day from Dillon on Corporations, rendered in a case reported in the seventh Indiana Reports, (and I take it for granted that is as strong an authority as could be produced, because that learned Senator produced no other,) bears very remotely, if at all, upon this question. That decision, as I shall show after awhile, was upon a section of the constitution of Indiana as wholly different from this section of the Constitution of the United States as it is possible for two sections of constitutions to differ which look ultimately to the same purpose, that is, the filling of a vacancy. Neither does the statute of 1866, referred to so frequently yesterday by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] help us at all in this investigation, because the language of the Constitution cannot be amplified, nor can it be narrowed by any statute. The Constitution, under which that statute purported to be enacted, cannot be enlarged and it cannot be modified by that statute. It would not take a great deal of time, I think, to show that that statute is not constitutional; but that is not one of the questions involved here. Here we are remitted at last to the Constitution itself to find out just what is our duty in this given case, and to ascertain whether the claimant to this seat has been properly delegated by the proper authority to fill a seat in the Senate.

The first and second clauses of section 3 of article 1 of the Constitution must be taken together and construed together; and, when analyzed, it is almost remarkable what a fitness, what a perfect propriety exists all through in every word which is used in each of these clauses looking to the organization and continuation of the Senate as a legislative body. It reminds one when investigating, as he must be constantly reminded when looking at this instrument, of the great difficulty if not the almost impossibility of ever taking one word from this instrument or adding to it without destroying its harmony and its effect:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

According to the interpretation of the Senator from Delaware, if the Legislature of any State of the eleven that first ratified the Constitution had failed to send two Senators here to compose the Senate, the governor of the State could have sent two to compose the body. There is no half-way ground, because we have heard it enunciated here by the Senator from Delaware and by the minority report that if the vacancy exists, by a robust and athletic construction of the Constitution somebody must fill it; it must not go unfilled. That is the purport of the Indiana decision, which I shall read after awhile, but upon a section of their constitution totally different from this. Let us imagine the State of Delaware through its governor, after she had ratified the Constitution, sending two Senators here to compose this body. It would be a very wonderful stretch of imagination to picture it, because it would be a sight at which men might weep if angels might not.

Now run this matter through further. The second clause of section 3 of article 1 provides that—

Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year; of the second class, at the expiration of the fourth year, and the third class, at the expiration of the sixth year.

For what purpose?

So that one-third may be chosen every second year.

Not "appointed" every second year. If the construction of the opposite side is correct it should have said "so that one-third may be chosen or appointed;" but we find not here the words "or appointed." We have only the word "chosen," the very word which is used in the first clause of this section, when it says "chosen by the Legislature," which means elected by the Legislature. It is hardly worth while for me to remind the Senator from Delaware how dangerous it is in the interpretation of any instrument, from the Constitution down to the lowest and smallest written document, to incorporate words into a statute or into a constitution which do not exist there; yet to make his argument tenable you must read, "so that one-third may be chosen or appointed every second year." However, the framers of the Constitution did not incorporate the word "appointed," but they said "chosen," to tally with the word "chosen" used in the first clause of the third section of this article.

Now, we have the vacation of these seats by law. When that is done, according to the fair interpretation of this instrument, the Legislature alone can step in. Then:

And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise.

That is, "if vacancies happen" after the seats have been filled, after the Legislature has chosen, "by resignation, or otherwise," meaning by expulsion or by death. Those three are the only cases. The word "happen," whether you enlarge it or whether you narrow it in its construction, affects at last the incumbent in the seat by some accident or by some casualty. Hence the word "happen" is used, referring to something which takes him out of the seat, leaves both an unfilled seat and a broken term. The precedents cited by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] yesterday sustain this position. The debates in the case of Dixon, which was never referred to a committee but acted upon by the Senate, sustain it, as do the reports in other cases to which I shall refer before I conclude. That is the fair and the proper construction of this instrument; and when you give it that construction you obey the first rule of construing written instruments, which is that every word in the instrument must live and speak; you cannot throttle it and take one word out and put another in.

I say, then, on this point, that the Legislature being the original constituency, that constituency must first act; and if the person thus chosen falls out of his seat by any accident, any happening of an unforeseen event, then the governor steps in and supplies the place temporarily; says the Constitution, by "temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature."

In my humble opinion, the theory that the Senate must be full, and that where the Legislature fails for any cause to fill a seat the governor, therefore, must do it, or somebody must do it, finds no support in the Constitution. It is a well-established principle of jurisprudence that when one tribunal has jurisdiction and fails to exercise it no other tribunal can assume it. The President sends in nominations to the Senate; the Senate advises and consents; but if the President fails to send them in, according to the argument of the Senator from Delaware, the Senate must nominate and then confirm, because the offices must be filled regardless of how! The House of Representatives is to originate money bills and the Senate may amend them; but if from failure to perform its duty, faom caprice, or what not, the House should neglect to originate them, the Senate then must come in and originate revenue bills itself! That is the theory on which the argument on the other side of this question rests.

The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution provides for the governor of a State calling upon the President to aid in suppressing domestic violence and insurrection when the Legislature is not in session. Suppose the Legislature is in session and fails to make such a call, and in the opinion of the governor there is occasion for calling for force, can he call while the Legislature is in session? He is bound to do it according to the argument insisted on here. It would be like the wise justice of the peace, having no jurisdiction in divorce cases, who said the man must have a divorce, and he granted it because the chancery court had dismissed the man's bill on demurrer; but he was bound to be divorced. [Laughter.] That argument is answered by the law. When the law has prescribed one form of action and it is not complied with, to allow some other authority to interpose is always the beginning of usurpation in all republican governments from the days the first republic was ever formed to the present day. I say, important as it may be that these seats shall be filled, it is more important that they shall be filled according to the Constitution than filled according to the judgment or caprice of the governor of a State; and I assert further, for the best interests and perpetuity of the Government, important as it is that the Senate should be full, it is better the seats should be vacant than that they should be filled in violation of the Constitution.

So much for that part of the question, Mr. President; and I wish now to call the attention of the Senate to the Indiana decision, the only one that has been alluded to. To state it briefly before I read the opinion of the court; a new circuit was created by the Legislature of Indiana and under the State constitution the governor had the power to appoint a judge where there was a vacancy. A Mr. Stocking was indicted in this new circuit and he was convicted, and he carried the case to the Supreme Court on the ground that there was no proper tribunal before which he was tried. The court in passing upon that say:

It is objected that the judge who presided was not properly the judge of that circuit, because appointed by the governor instead of being elected by the people. The objection is not well taken. The act creating the circuit was declared in force from its passage, as a case of emergency.

The Constitution has created the Senate under clause 1 of section 3 of article 1, and all it needs, according to that very language, is that it should be "composed." So the State of Indiana created this circuit by an act which went into operation at once. The court say:

If there was a vacancy, it existed independent of that declaration. If there was no vacancy, that body could not create one by a declaratory enactment. The vacancy flowed as a natural consequence of their doing what they had a right to do—to create a new circuit. There is no technical nor peculiar meaning to the word "vacant" as used in the Constitution. It means empty, unoccupied; as applied to an office without an incumbent. There is no basis for the distinction urged that it applies only to offices vacated by death, resignation, or otherwise. An existing office without an incumbent is vacant, whether it be a new or an old one. * * * The emergency which created the office would imply that the vacancy in the office of judge in the new circuit should be filled immediately.

Now, how does the governor fill it?

The eighteenth section, article 5, provides that the governor shall, by appointment, fill a vacancy in the office of judge of any court.

That is all the constitution of Indiana says. Now will any one take his microscope and see how much that varies from the provision of our Constitution which we now have in hand. There the governor was empowered under the constitution to fill any and all vacancies in the judicial office. Here the Constitution, after providing what seats shall be vacated by operation of law and when, then says if any of these seats happen to become vacant by resignation or otherwise the governor may appoint temporarily. So it is nothing to the purpose to read this decision. The decision of a court, though it is frequently not the case in point of fact, is always supposed in law to have been made with reference to the particular facts of the case before it; and that decision must be confined to the power granted under section 18 of article 5 of the constitution of Indiana, which has not the remotest similarity to the provision of the Constitution of the United States we are now speaking of.

Both the reports, the majority and the minority, omit in their list of cases a very important case that was decided by the Senate in the very early history of the Government, in fact the very second case of this character, which I will now proceed to refer to, and I will read it the more readily because it answers directly the question that was put the other day by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] when he had the floor upon this question. It is the case of Kensey Johns, of Delaware:

George Read, esq., having resigned his seat in the Senate on the 18th of September, 1793, the executive, on the 19th of March, 1794, appointed and commissioned the said Kensey Johns to represent the State in the Senate till the next meeting of the State Legislature.

On the 24th of March, 1794, Mr. Johns appeared in the Senate and produced his credentials of appointment.

Whereupon it was moved that they be referred to the consideration of the Committee of Elections, before the said Kensey Johns should be permitted to qualify, who are directed to report thereon.

And it passed in the affirmative—yeas 13, nays 12.

On the 26th of March the committee made the following report:

"The Committee of Elections, to which were referred the credentials of an appointment by the governor of the State of Delaware of Kensey Johns as a Senator of the United States, having had the same under consideration, report:

"That George Read, a Senator for the State of Delaware, resigned his seat on the 18th day of September, 1793, and during the recess of the Legislature of said State."

There was a clear case of vacancy happening, whatever difference of opinion we may have about the full meaning and import of the word "happen."

"That the Legislature of the said State met in January and adjourned in February, 1794.

"That on the 19th day of March, and subsequent to the adjournment of the said Legislature, Kensey Johns was appointed by the governor of said State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation aforesaid.

"Whereupon the committee submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Kensey Johns, appointed by the governor of the State of Delaware as a Senator of the United States for said State, is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States, a session of the Legislature of the said State having intervened between the resignation of the said George Read and the appointment of the said Kensey Johns."

On the question to agree to this report, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 7.

We have here an unquestioned vacancy by resignation. We have in this case also a meeting of the Legislature and their failure to elect. Then the seat was vacant, and under this strong construction given to the Constitution in this debate the governor of Delaware thought he could appoint. The Senate decided that he could not.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator allow me to suggest that a session of the Legislature of Delaware was held after the vacancy happened and before the governor assumed to appoint Mr. Johns; and if I understand that case—it was examined by the committee although not referred to in either report—the refusal to admit Mr. Johns was put upon the ground that the Legislature met and had a session after the vacancy happened and did not elect; and consequently, the Legislature having met, and having had an opportunity to elect a Senator, and having not done so, the governor had not authority to appoint.

Mr. GARLAND. That is precisely what I stated.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Allow me further to say that precisely the same question was discussed in the Phelps case. The Kensey Johns case is referred to, I think, in both the majority and minority reports in the Phelps case, and it is agreed to by the minority report, and we find no fault with that case, but we think that it is not a case in point.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator's statement of the Johns case is precisely what I stated before I read the case. The Senator from Wisconsin states the facts and the theory of the decision as I understand them; but in the name of the Constitution and all law pertaining thereto and made thereunder, if he agrees to that decision, what becomes of this case that he is now advocating? It is a stronger case for admission by all odds than the claimants for this seat. Here, I repeat again, was an unquestioned vacancy and one by resignation, in the very word of the Constitution. It is true a Legislature did intervene and it failed to elect, but the minority report, as well as those who have advocated the same doctrine on the floor, says it does not matter how the vacancy occurs, if it is a vacancy, the governor must fill it the first chance he gets.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If I do not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. GARLAND. No interruption. We are trying to get at the truth.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Then I desire to call the Senator's attention to the language of the Constitution:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature.

Now, the ground that that decision is put upon is that there was a meeting of the Legislature after the vacancy had occurred or happened, and consequently that the authority of the governor to make the appointment did not then exist. The governor undoubtedly could have made the appointment if he had made it prior to the meeting of the Legislature; but the Constitution expressly provides that he shall make temporary appointments "until the next meeting of the Legislature." That meeting had occurred, and consequently he had no further right to make an appointment.

Mr. GARLAND. That does not affect the question as to what is a vacancy, which lies at the bottom here. I say this is a stronger case calling for an executive appointment than the present case from New Hampshire, if you are to consider that there can be a strong case at all arising. One cannot be strong or weak though, because each one must stand on the Constitution upon its own merits. Here was a vacancy, and after the Legislature failed to elect it was an indefinite vacancy until that Legislature was called together again or met under the law. This State then went, according to that decision, unrepresented. The very result was reached that the Senator from Delaware says cannot be countenanced for a moment, though we know that the State of Missouri was partly unrepresented at one time for nearly two years on this very theory. I happened to find in the Philadelphia Times the other day the following piece of history on this subject:

> The same question—

Speaking of this case from New Hampshire:

> The same question arose in Pennsylvania in 1855. During the winter of that year, the know-nothing Legislature got into a factious wrangle over Cameron and his rivals, and failed to elect a Senator. The State was thus unrepresented from the meeting of Congress in the fall until the middle of January, and Governor Pollock, after an exhaustive examination of the question, decided that the vacancy was not one that he could fill by appointment. In that opinion the leading lawyers of the State concurred, and Pennsylvania was without a Senator until Governor Bigler was chosen in 1856.

That is a piece of history. I sent for and got the message of Governor Pollock, which simply referred to the matter and stated that he considered that he had no power to appoint, and referred the matter to the coming Legislature. The great State of Pennsylvania was here several months without one of her Senators.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I suggest that the reason why he did not have power to appoint was that there had been a session of the Legislature and the Legislature had not elected.

Mr. GARLAND. But the Senator from Wisconsin unwittingly dodges the question that is here presented. We are invited to discuss the question whether or not the country can stand the calamity of a vacancy here for any cause; and the argument is that the governor must fill a vacancy anyhow. Here were vacancies in two cases, vacancies that were undisputed and cannot be disputed.

But now let us look at some other cases. The case of Mr. Dixon, of Kentucky, has been referred to, and I will not take up the time of the Senate in debating that. Then there was the case of Mr. Williams, of New Hampshire, just such a case as that of Kensey Johns, and just such a case as that where Governor Pollock refused to fill a vacancy. The case of Mr. Williams arose in 1854:

> Having been appointed by the governor of New Hampshire to fill a vacancy and the State Legislature having met and finally adjourned without filling it, it was held by the committee that the right of representation under the appointment had expired.

That is a repetition in the same State of New Hampshire of this very question. Now, to meet what the Senator from Wisconsin says, suppose the governor had made this appointment before the Legislature met, how long would it have lasted? It would have continued only until the meeting of the Legislature and the election or failure to elect of the Legislature that intervened, and then what are you to do? According to the theory that is here zealously and emphatically urged, the governor would have a right to appoint, but that is not the theory, and by the decision of the Senate in the cases of Johns and Williams is not the legitimate theory growing out of the language of the Constitution.

Now we come to the case of Phelps, and that case let me call your special attention to. The minority report against his taking his seat was adopted by the Senate, and I wish now to call the attention of the Senate not to the debate, but to the minority report. Two Senators who discussed the question yesterday on the side I am on referred to the debate, but I wish to call attention to a clause of this report signed by Senators Butler and Bayard:

> The Senate of the United States is composed of organized constituencies, the State Legislatures; to them belong the power primarily of electing their Senators when they are in session at the happening of the vacancy and at their first meeting when it happens in their recess, and on them devolves the exclusive jurisdiction of filling such vacancies. Their right and authority to fill or supply vacancies which have been temporarily filled by executive appointment are as absolute and exclusive as was their power in an original election. When their power is brought into existence it must supersede all others, with this qualification, and that according to precedent, that they have a session to make the choice. In our view it does not depend on the actual exertion of the power to elect, but on its existence. A Senator under an executive appointment may, or may not, represent the political views of his State; he may be the mere personal favorite of the governor. The Senate, as far as practicable, should be made to represent its constitutional constituency, and in this respect should preserve the republican feature of our Union.

There, Mr. President, is the great reason which lies at the bottom of the argument I am attempting to make. That is the overwhelming argument why a governor cannot thrust himself in and send a person to represent his State in the Senate of the United States at the beginning of a term, where there is not a concurrence of both an unfilled seat and a broken term. There the power devolves on the original constituency whom the Senators are supposed to represent immediately, that constituency representing the State. We know in the history of this body how often it has been that the governor has sent his mere personal favorite for a few months to go home and be ignored by his constituency, and a man nearer and dearer to them, more intimately connected with them, returned to take his place, and he heard of no more forever in these Halls. That is the theory, that is the idea, that is the great purpose of having Senators elected by the State Legislatures.

Cushing, in his Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, section 272, states the matter thus:

> Each State is entitled to be represented at all times by two Senators, and elects them by the Legislature of each for the term of six years, whenever vacancies occur by lapse of time.

Here a vacancy has occurred by lapse of time, but instead of electing one to fill it by the Legislature the governor has appointed one, reversing the rule as given by Cushing. Again, he says:

> Occasional and unforeseen vacancies occurring by reason of death, resignation, acceptance of a disqualifying office or otherwise are filled, for the residue of the unexpired term, either by the Legislature, if then in session, or by appointment of the executive.

Unforeseen vacancies, that is vacancies as distinguished from those occurring by lapse of time, expiration of a term, &c., are to be filled for the unexpired term; but here is a new term, now beginning, which the governor ventures to fill. The plain and unambiguous language used by Cushing sets at naught this effort to fill this new term by the executive.

Mr. President, we have heard of the Sevier case and the Lanman case. The Lanman case stands untouched for all these many years, and supported by the precedents referred to yesterday by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] and the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY,] and I agree with Paschal in his Digest of the Constitution that the Sevier case cannot be reconciled with that of Lanman, and I believe that Sevier's case was decided wrong, although my State received by his admission a noble, true, and able representative. There is no half-way ground in this matter. You must go from the beginning to the end. Mr. Grundy made the report in the case of Sevier, and Senators who think the Sevier case was right will see that Mr. Grundy in the report draws a distinction between that and the case of Lanman. To my mind it was "a distinction without a difference," but if Senators think otherwise the Senate then adhered to the decision in Lanman's case. In his report Mr. Grundy said, speaking of the decision in Lanman's case:

> The decision seems to have been generally acquiesced in since that time, nor is it intended by the committee to call its correctness in question. The principle asserted in that case is that the Legislature of a State, by making elections themselves, shall provide for all vacancies which must occur at stated and known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution.

So, then, if Sevier's and Lanman's cases were the same and Sevier's was decided wrong, surely there can be but one decision in this case. If Sevier's case was decided right and Lanman's case right, that is the end of this question, because Lanman's decision has been followed by the authorities and the precedents for over fifty years. Take it on either horn of the dilemma, and this application must be dismissed from the Senate on principle. We cannot at this day and time subscribe to the doctrine that because the Legislature for any reason fails to exercise its jurisdiction the governor may come in and make himself the constituency of a Senator and send him here.

Mr. President, I have occupied the attention of the Senate longer than I intended; and to close just exactly where I began, I repeat that there is no authority in law, by my construction of the Constitution, for the admission of this applicant; there is no precedent to be found for it; there is no analogy upon which it can be rested. At the beginning of a new term the governor of a State cannot send a Senator here on any ground. The governor cannot place on this floor a Senator to begin a new term. There must be an unfilled seat and a broken term previously begun and held by some incumbent to allow the governor to appoint. If Mr. Wadleigh had resigned on the 20th of February and the governor of New Hampshire had appointed Mr. Bell to fill out the unexpired term, how long could he have retained it? Till the 4th of March. That is a sufficient answer to this whole case, it seems to me. Can it be said that he could then take him and send him back here from the 4th of March to begin a new term? He could not, because he under the Constitution, if it means anything, can only fill the breach that has occurred in the wall by putting in another brick or filling it up with mortar, as the case may be.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I should regret but two things in this case, either that the Senate should be divided by party lines or that the State of New Hampshire should be deprived of that which she is entitled to on this floor, her just and equal representation. But, sir, this case must be determined by the Constitution and the law, and to that the State as well as we must submit. What I have to say upon the subject shall be directed to a consideration of the constitutional provisions and the statute upon the subject. I take the Constitution; I find in article 1, section 3, clause 1, thus:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

"The Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State," and they shall be "chosen by the Legislature thereof;" they shall hold for a term of six years, and "each Senator shall have one vote." Here are mandatory provisions in regard to all the subjects-matter contained in this clause. The number, two Senators; no State shall have less than two; it is mandatory; the constituency the Legislature, "shall be chosen by the Legislature" of the State; their vote, "each Senator shall have one vote." There is no ambiguity here as to the constituency; it is not the people in their individual capacity at the polls, nor is it in their capacity as a whole; nor is it the State; nor is it the governor; nor is it any organism that may be called into being by the executive or people; it is the law-making power of the State that is vested with this authority under the Constitution of the United States to elect Senators, not the people individually, not the executive, not the people at the polls in their primary or any other capacity save as they are represented by the law-making power, the Legislature of the State. They shall choose the Senators. I turn then to article 1, section 4, clause 1, and find thus:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

"But the Congress may by law at any time make or alter such regulations." Congress has acted, whether constitutionally or not I shall not attempt now to discuss; but upon the statute-book, under date of 25th July, 1866, is found a statute enacted by Congress regulating the times and the manner of electing United States Senators. Why is this? Because the power that exists in the States to fill the seats in this Hall must be exercised by the Legislature, and Congress has thus prescribed the mode and the manner of exercising the power thus given. The Government is not to fail; the responsibility is upon the States—the Constitution and the statute place it upon the States. The words are, the States shall elect; Congress prescribes the manner of the election and the time. Congress may make these regulations, and has done so.

Now, I affirm that the act of 1866 carried into the Revised Statutes is an interpretation of the constitutional provision, and by it we are to be governed. Precedents fade away if this be a constitutional interpretation of the Constitution itself. If it is, we are bound by the statute thus enacted. It is found in the Revised Statutes, beginning at section 14. What are the provisions of this statute? Section 14 is this:

The Legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.

Here is the obligation placed peremptorily upon a "Legislature." What Legislature? The Legislature elected preceding the expiration of the term of a Senator in Congress, which term is fixed by the other clause of the Constitution at six years, about which no man can err, about which the organism of the State must know, about which, if it intends to keep up its representation in the Senate, it is bound to know. Six years is the term, the full term. This is a mandatory provision of the Constitution; and the other thought which comes by construction, that the Senate is a continuous body, yields and gives place to the mandatory provision that a full term is for six years, of which the State in all its organism, of which the Legislature, the power that elects the Senator, must take notice.

It is thus prescribed by the statute. The Legislature is commanded, it is mandatory upon it; the Legislature is commanded to elect, and the specific Legislature is pointed out—the preceding one. What is its duty? Senators will notice that this is mandatory throughout. "Shall proceed to elect." When? What? Elect "a Senator in Congress;" and the statute as enacted originally, but not now found in the Revised Statutes, contains these words, "in the place of the outgoing Senator," showing clearly what was in the legislative mind at the time of the enactment of the act of 1866. "Shall proceed to elect a Senator in the room of the outgoing Senator" were the original words, and of course it follows that the construction to be placed upon section 14 is that they shall proceed to elect a Senator in Congress in the room of the outgoing Senator. For how long? Can there be any doubt about that? For a full term. The Constitution says so; the statute says so. The duty is cast upon the Legislature and upon the organism of the State to elect a Senator for a full term in the place of the outgoing Senator. It fixes beyond question the duty of the Legislature under this provision of the Constitution to fill a term of six years.

But go further. I turn to section 16. After section 15 has appointed the mode and manner of electing the Senator, in section 16 I find these words:

Whenever, on the meeting of the Legislature of any State, a vacancy exists in the representation of such State in the Senate, the Legislature shall proceed, on the second Tuesday after meeting and organization, to elect a person to fill such vacancy—in the manner prescribed in the preceding section for the election of a Senator for a full term.

Now, is it possible to err in interpreting this statute? Can there be any question about the plain reading of the law? Is it not plain that the fourteenth section and that which follows it, the fifteenth, command the election of a Senator by the Legislature, which Legislature is pointed out, for a full term, and that when a vacancy occurs under other circumstances the sixteenth section comes into play. What other vacancy could there be? The evident answer is one that has occurred under other circumstances than those which arise from the existence of a full term to be filled. It is the only interpretation that seems possible, and in my view it is the reasonable one.

Mr. CARPENTER. When that shall happen.

Mr. WALLACE. When that vacancy happens. Having notice of the time—the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire had full notice of the time when it should act, in view of the expiration of the term—the Constitution placed upon it the responsibility of action; it was bound to take notice. Having full notice of the time to act, it must act. It is bound to act, or it fails to perform its duty as a part of the family of States; it fails to carry out the Constitution.

But it is said the State of New Hampshire would be without a Senator if this be the interpretation. The responsibility for that is not upon this body; it does not come to our door. The States are members of the family which meet in this Chamber, and they have responsibilities and duties, and they must perform them. If there come a vacancy in this Chamber in a full term, by reason of the misfortune or the fault or the laches of the State of New Hampshire to act, it does not lie at our door, it lies at the door of the State of New Hampshire, and to that extent she loses representation. Sir, the State organization must act. It must acquiesce in the constitutional provision and in the statute that interprets and enforces it, or it loses its representation in this body.

We turn next to clause 2 of section 3 of article 1:

And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

The statute of 1866 interprets this provision, and precedents are valueless if it has rightly enforced this clause of the Constitution. It has in emphatic words said that the Legislature, a specific Legislature, a named Legislature, shall elect a Senator for a full term, and no other interpretation can reasonably be given to the two sections that I have read. That the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, that the organism that exists there to carry on the government of the State, may sit still and not perform a duty placed upon it by constitutional requirement and statutory enactment, seems to me to be an absurd proposition. It must act, and failing to act, the result must follow that it has no representation in that term in this body.

But what of the words "happening during the recess?" The words in this clause of the Constitution are, "happening during the recess of the Legislature," and they apply to a vacancy other than a full term. Assuming that the statute rightly interprets the Constitution, can these words apply to a vacancy to occur at a fixed date, to be filled by a named body at a given date when in session, of which the State and the Legislature have full, clear, and distinct notice, and about which a plain, clear, and distinct duty is placed upon them?

These words cannot apply to this case if this statute be a faithful interpretation of the Constitution, and we for the present assume it is. First, it does not happen within the plain meaning of the word "happen." "Happen," when both the law and Constitution point out the time when the Senator shall be chosen! "Happen," when everything surrounding its duty in regard to filling up its membership in this body points out the hour when it must act! It cannot be that the words "happen during the recess" can be applied to this case. The term "happen" cannot reasonably be applied to the occurrence of an event for which the hour is fixed. "During the recess." Can these words be applied to the body named and commanded by the statute to act? It is in being; it is organized; the day and the manner of its processes are prescribed; and, as I have already said, the statute makes a distinction between a full term and a vacancy. The fourteenth section relates to the former, and the sixteenth and seventeenth to the latter. The word "vacancy" as used in the sixteenth section can only relate to a seat occupied under gubernatorial appointment, for it distinguishes that vacancy from a full term. The fourteenth section relates to a full term, and the sixteenth and seventeenth sections relate to a vacancy which can be filled by the governor.

Now let us take the debates in the Congress that passed this statute of 1866 and see what was said then. I turn to the Globe, on page 3732, the 11th of July, 1866, this statute having been passed on the 25th, and I find that the late Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Howe, said, in discussing the subject, this:

> Managing elections which are necessary to the organization of a House is one thing; controlling elections which are only to choose a member of another House is another thing. It seems to me the proper penalty, and the only proper penalty, to impose upon a State for omitting to elect a Senator is to leave it without that much representation in this body.

He had offered an amendment bearing directly upon this subject, which amendment was incorporated in the act of 1866. Next I turn to what Mr. Reverdy Johnson said pending that debate. He said:

> The Government of the United States cannot go on without a representation in the Senate of the United States. The Constitution assumes that every State in the Union will elect Senators, and the Constitution in its spirit is obligatory upon every State to make such an election. The only way, as I think, to compel the States to perform that constitutional obligation is to stop the wheels of the government of the State until that higher duty is performed.

Here, contemporaneous with the passage of the statute, is found a statement by Senators of the result that comes from our refusal to recognize the power of the governor to fill the place, if we interpret the Constitution as the statute has interpreted it.

Mr. President, it seems to me that, taking the statute, the Constitution itself, and the contemporaneous interpretation of the statute, they all bring us to the conclusion that the governor of the State of New Hampshire had no constitutional authority to fill any portion of this full term, but that, on the contrary, a constitutional and statutory obligation was upon the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire to fill this term; and that if by any failure of its organism there was not such a Legislature in existence preceding the expiration of the term as could elect, the fault does not lie with the Senate, but lies at the door of the State of New Hampshire, and she must suffer loss of representation until her own organism fits her to choose a Senator in the mode that the Constitution and the statute point out.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senate and the country upon the fact that this question is to be decided not upon partisan grounds. The debate which has already taken place—the remarks of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] yesterday and of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] to-day show that these Senators are divided upon this question by principle and not with any regard to political consequences. Indeed, in the present situation of things, there are no political consequences to result from a decision either way. The New Hampshire Legislature which will meet next June, is a republican Legislature. They will send a republican here. The relative strength of the two parties in this Chamber is such that it makes no difference whether we adjourn daily by eight majority or nine. There is, therefore, nothing of partisan consequence pending upon the result. It is, however, highly important that at this time, when no partisan temptation allures us, we should settle this question upon principle, and thereby give to our determination the weight which a decision thus made will always have in the future of the Senate.

We are, moreover, acting as judges in this matter. Each House is by the Constitution made the judge of the "elections, returns and qualifications" of its own members. The Senate in this particular is acting judicially. We cannot receive a man here from New Hampshire because we want another republican; we cannot reject a man coming here from New Hampshire because he is a democrat and we think we have too many democrats already. The question is not what will be the partisan effect of seating one man or of rejecting another; but which man, by the Constitution and laws, is entitled to a seat? Even if a settlement of this question might change the political complexion of this Chamber, nevertheless, every Senator is, on his conscience and by his oath, bound to act as a judge would act on the bench. He is bound to ascertain, in the first place, studiously and carefully, what the law is, and he is bound to declare it impartially and honestly.

Now, what are the facts of this case? In March, 1878, a Legislature was elected in New Hampshire to continue in office until the first Wednesday of June next, 1879. That Legislature is still in full existence as the Legislature of the State. In that body, elected in March, 1878, to-day is lodged the legislative power of New Hampshire. If on any sudden emergency the governor of that State was compelled to convene the Legislature to-day, under that call the Legislature elected in March, 1878, would assemble. They are to-day the only body of men in that State possessing legislative power, or who could assemble and act under a proclamation from the governor of that State in any emergency which required legislation. In June, 1878, this Legislature held a session continuing through the month of June, and in July adjourned sine die. That was the session of the Legislature which by the constitution and laws of New Hampshire, then in force, was the last Legislature that would convene in ordinary session before the term of Mr. Wadleigh in the Senate would expire.

On the 4th of March, 1879, Mr. Wadleigh's term did expire, the Legislature not being in session; and on the 13th of March, the Legislature not being in session, the governor appointed Mr. Bell to hold a seat in this Chamber until the then next session of the Legislature of New Hampshire, and Mr. Bell makes claim to a seat here. The question is, as I said, not whether we want another republican, nor whether we want to exclude a democrat, but whether, on the facts of the case, by the Constitution and laws of the land, Mr. Bell is entitled to be a Senator. Nothing could be more dangerous, even in a mere party sense, than to settle such a question with any view to temporary party convenience. A bad example, a vicious precedent thus set, will always come back to torment its inventors. The history of this nation within the last five years furnishes some pregnant illustrations of this.

On the 13th of March, 1879, was the governor of New Hampshire authorized to appoint a Senator under the Constitution? Let us see what the Constitution is; and although it has been referred to several times, I will again read the material provisions, because they should be borne in mind in every such discussion and vote in this body.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. If it will not interrupt my colleague I should like to ask him a question at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WITHERS in the chair.) Does the Senator yield to the interruption?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Do I understand my colleague to hold that the Legislature elected in New Hampshire in March, 1878, is the Legislature and the only Legislature—no, I will leave out "the only Legislature"—is the Legislature which could elect a successor to Mr. Wadleigh?

Mr. CARPENTER. My colleague need not leave out "the only Legislature," because if it is the Legislature that can do it, it is the only Legislature that can do so.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Very well, answer that.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do hold that; and that is what I am going to try to prove if my colleague will permit me. I have found it impossible both in this Chamber and in the courts of law, with my limited capacity, to argue thirteen questions at once, and do it well. I shall therefore take up the various questions upon which this case depends one by one, and the question I now wish to consider is whether by the Constitution of the United States, apart from the legislation of 1866, which I will consider in due time, the governor of New Hampshire had the power to make this appointment.

The Constitution contains a provision, in regard to the other House, which is worthy of consideration here. It is as follows:

> When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

Manifestly the idea here is to provide for a vacancy happening in a term which has before been filled by election. For instance, Wisconsin has eight members of the House of Representatives. If one should die, there would be a vacancy in her representation, and the governor of our State would have to issue his writ for a new election to fill that vacancy. I have never understood, I do not believe that where the terms of members of the House of Representatives have not been filled, the governor can issue his writ and thus call an original election to fill those terms. That is not contemplated by this provision of the Constitution. It is only where they have been filled by elections in the ordinary way and a vacancy afterward happens in the term, that the governor issues his writ for a new election to fill that vacancy; and that has always been the interpretation of the Constitution and the practice under it.

Come now to the Senate. In the first place:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.
>
> Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year; of the second class, at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments—
> Appointments!
> until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall THEN fill such vacancies.

Section 4 of the first article is as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

This is to be read in connection with the fifth article, (at page 48 of our Manual,) which provides as follows:

> No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

This is clearly a restriction upon the power granted in the fourth section of the first article, that Congress may alter the State regulations except as to the place of choosing Senators. In other words, Congress can make no alterations of the regulations prescribed by a State, which shall have the effect to deprive such State of its equal representation in the Senate for a single day. A single day is as clearly in violation of this provision of the Constitution as five years. There may be an extra session convened here to consider the question of a war with England and with the rest of mankind, and every State is entitled to be represented on that question that day, and an act of Congress which makes it impossible for her to have that representation is an unconstitutional act of Congress, utterly void, of no force or effect, and binding upon the action and conscience of no member of this body.

Now, let us examine a little more critically this provision of the Constitution. In the first place, the regular terms are to be filled by Senators chosen by the Legislature; but when a vacancy happens in the recess of the Legislature, the governor may make a temporary appointment. The governor cannot choose a Senator to fill such a vacancy; hence he appoints. The choosing relates to the regular term, and is to be by the Legislature; but the temporary vacancy that may happen in the recess of the Legislature may be filled by an appointment by the governor to last until the next session of the Legislature of that State.

In order to uphold this appointment and give Mr. Bell a seat, two things must appear: first that a vacancy had happened within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution, and second that it had happened in the recess of the Legislature of New Hampshire.

When the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] announced his construction of that provision which speaks of "vacancies by resignation or otherwise," I was inclined at that time to side entirely with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] upon that point. It was to me a totally new idea, and I thought the word "otherwise" there should be construed as "otherwise than by resignation," and that it would cover any vacancy. The Senator from Georgia, however, in support of his view referred to one case in the Wisconsin reports which fully sustained him. By a subsequent examination of this question, I have become perfectly satisfied that he is right and that that clause of the Constitution must be construed in the manner which he pointed out. This reminds me of what Judge Downer of our State once said to me while we were consulting about a case which came up to the supreme court having been mangled by malpractice, as I thought, in the court below. I said to the judge "This man should be sued for malpractice." "Well," he replied, "I do not know about that; I am an older lawyer than you are, and I learn so much law every day which I did not know before, that I should be very, very reluctant to sue any man for malpractice." Turning last evening to the books, (and especially to "Broom's Legal Maxims," which I take to be the horn-book on this subject,) at page 565, under the maxim of noscitur a sociis, I found a collection of cases. I will take the time to read but one, and that is a quotation from a decision of Lord Ellenborough in 5 Maule & Selwyn, page 465, in the case of Cullen vs. Butler, which is supported by Lozano vs. Janson, 2 E. & E., 160; Phillips vs. Barber, 5 B. & Ald., 161; Deveux vs. J'Anson, 5 B. &. C., 519, and several other cases which are cited, and also several other cases which may be found in the American reports.

Broom says:

> The following instance of the application of the maxim, noscitur a sociis to a mercantile instrument may be mentioned on account of its importance, and will suffice to show in what manner the principle which it expresses has been made available for the benefit of commerce. The general words inserted in a maritime policy of insurance, after the enumeration of particular perils, are as follows:
> "And of all perils, losses, and misfortunes, that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandises, and ship, &c., or any part thereof."

Broader words cannot be conceived of.

> "These words, it has been observed, must be considered as introduced into the policy in furtherance of the objects of marine insurance, and may have the effect of extending a reasonable indemnity to many cases not distinctly covered by the special words: they are entitled to be considered as material and operative words, and to have the due effect assigned to them in the construction of this instrument; and this will be done by allowing them to comprehend and cover other cases of marine damage, of the like kind, with those which are specially enumerated, and occasioned by similar causes; that is to say, the meaning of the general words may be ascertained by referring to the preceding special words."

Then he cites a great number of cases which I will not take the time of the Senate to read or refer to, but all sustaining the principle of construction which was expressed so clearly by the Senator from Georgia. This falls exactly into line with the fair construction of the Constitution, it being manifest to every one who consults that instrument that it was the intention of its framers that the regular terms should be filled by the Legislature. It was only occasional, casual vacancies, that might happen, which were to be filled, not by an election, but by a temporary appointment made by the governor, to have effect until the next meeting of the Legislature of the State.

Again, although I would not decide a question of this kind upon a lexicon, yet a very critical examination of the minutest details of the Constitution always inspires new admiration for the accuracy of the learning, literary and legal, possessed by its framers. If it were not irreverent, we might say that the Constitution was inspired, the choice of its language in all the details of its provisions being so appropriate. Take this word "happen." Of course the expiration of the regular senatorial terms is fixed by the Constitution and laws, and will occur with as much regularity as the sun will rise and set, while the Government lasts. There is, however, a class of vacancies, that may happen, not regulated by law. Those vacancies which are not certain to, but may "happen." What does the word "happen" mean? Turning to Webster's Dictionary I find three definitions given of it. The first is, "to come by chance, to come without one's previous expectation, to fall out;" the second is, "to come, to befall;" the third is, "to light, to fall or come unexpectedly." In all the definitions of this word "happen" the elements of chance is embodied, and this shows that the word "happen" was used by the framers of the Constitution with as much felicity as any other phrase found in that instrument.

The same word occurs three times in the Constitution, and always in connection with vacancies occasioned by chance or accident. Article 2, section 2, provides:

> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

Article 1, section 2, provides:

> When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, [in the House of Representatives] the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

And article 1, section 3, concerning the Senate, provides:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

The word "happen" appeared in the original draught of the Constitution, and remained through all the changes and revisions of that instrument by the convention; and was manifestly selected as appropriate to the particular vacancies spoken of.

Now, as to the phrase "shall happen by resignation or otherwise." I repeat,—seeing the Senator from Vermont now in his seat,—that when the Senator from Georgia first suggested his construction I concurred with the view taken of it at that time by the Senator from Vermont; but on examination of the authorities last evening I found that the position taken by the Senator from Georgia in that particular was well warranted by decisions both in England and America, and I come now to its application here.

After providing in the Constitution for the regular terms, then it comes to vacancies that shall happen, that shall come unexpectedly, that shall come without having been looked for, and it says all such "vacancies happening by resignation or otherwise"——

Mr. MCMILLAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to make a suggestion to him upon the construction of the Constitution as to that word "happen" applicable to this particular case?

Mr. CARPENTER. I cannot refuse any Senator's interruption, as I interrupt so often myself.

Mr. MCMILLAN. When did the vacancy happen in that case? Not solely at the expiration of the full term of Mr. Wadleigh, but when the Legislature of New Hampshire, by reason of a change in the State constitution was disabled from filling the office.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then, I understand the Senator that this vacancy did not happen on any particular day but kept happening every day?

Mr. MCMILLAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I want him to construe this word "happen" in connection with this case. The term of Mr. Wadleigh ended at a particular time. The governor filled a vacancy which happened. When did it happen? When the seat was not filled by the Legislature that should have filled it if it had the power, so that it took not only the expiration of the term of the Senator, but the accident or the circumstance which transpired to prevent the Legislature of New Hampshire from filling the vacancy. Then the vacancy happened.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is a pretty long question.

Mr. MCMILLAN. If the Senator will answer it, that is all I desire.

Mr. CARPENTER. The office of an interruption as known by lawyers—and I do not pretend to know anything except as a lawyer—is not to reply to each paragraph of an opposing argument, but it is to suggest some point that has been overlooked by an opponent, some piece of testimony that he has forgotten, or some misstatement that he is making. Now, judged by any such standard, the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota are not an interruption. They are a reply interjected into my speech. Although I may be making a very insufficient and weak argument, I desire to take the entire responsibility of it, and make it myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator will permit me to say that I understood from his opening remarks that he was desirous of ascertaining the truth in this case and of satisfying others who were to act upon this matter as to the truth of his position. Now, he construes a word in the Constitution in a particular manner, and says that it applies to the expiration of a full term of a Senator under the Constitution.

Mr. CARPENTER. No, I do not say it applies to any such thing; I say it does not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator says that the expiration of the term of a Senator is the occasion upon which the exercise of power in the executive of a State conferred by the Constitution intervenes.

Mr. CARPENTER. I say on the contrary, it is not the case.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then if the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to further interruption?

Mr. CARPENTER. I submit to my friend from Minnesota that if he will let me give my perhaps erroneous view of this subject, when I conclude I will stand on my feet and be cross-examined to his heart's content.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have not said the Senator's views were erroneous.

Mr. CARPENTER. No, I say that.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have only expressed a circumstance to the Senator which I desired him to explain, that I might form as correct a view as himself upon the subject.

Mr. CARPENTER. And in the course of my explanation the Senator breaks in and asks me to explain.

Mr. McMILLAN. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CARPENTER. I am arguing the precise question as well as I can which he wishes me to argue, and he interferes with me and says "will you not go on with that point" while I am going on with it. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLAN. I desired to suggest to the Senator merely a circumstance which would qualify his explanation of the term "happen."

Mr. CARPENTER. That is in the nature of a reply.

Mr. McMILLAN. I made a suggestion to the Senator which I desired him to answer.

Mr. CARPENTER. What is the suggestion?

Mr. McMILLAN. I have already stated it to him; but if he sees proper to avoid any answer, I am of course satisfied.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator be kind enough to state it once more, as I did not clearly understand him?

Mr. McMILLAN. I thank the gentleman for his remark in that connection. The expiration of the term of the late Senator from New Hampshire occurred upon a certain day during the vacation of the Legislature, and when the Legislature which had been chosen prior to that time could not elect a successor.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the Senator means the Legislature elected in the fall of 1878, it was not a Legislature when Mr. Wadleigh's term expired.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then the fact that no successor was elected to succeed Mr. Wadleigh created a vacancy which occurred during the recess of the Legislature, and the fact that the Legislature of New Hampshire could not elect is the circumstance which occasioned that vacancy. That is the reason why the vacancy happened.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator from Minnesota illustrates by his argument—for it is not a question at all, it is an argument—that he takes a different view of this subject from that which I take. I have great respect for his opinion; at the same time I must vote upon mine, and I am trying to state mine now, and right in the midst of explaining what I understand to be the meaning of this word "happen," the Senator interrupts and asks if I will not argue the question of what is the meaning of the word "happen" in the Constitution. I am doing that, as well as I can, and I am very sure that I shall not do it any better for being interrupted. I am also perfectly sure that my argument will be better understood, if it deserve the name of an argument, by being put head first instead of tail first. In the arrangement which I had made for my remarks I had determined to reserve the point which the Senator is now troubled with, for my conclusion.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator will excuse me. I knew his ability and supposed that no question would interrupt him.

Mr. CARPENTER. It does not, except that it takes time, and life is short. That is the only objection. [Laughter.] I have lost the trail of my remarks, but I will break in somewhere in the line and probably come back to the point after a while. I think I was upon the meaning of this word "happen" in the Constitution, when the Senator from Minnesota interrupted to say that he desired to hear me upon that very point, and which he certainly would have done in five minutes more. I was trying to show, I believe, that the framers of the Constitution had here used that word "happen" with felicity. They knew the difference between a vacancy happening by casualty in the recess of the Legislature, and a term that had never been filled. This word "happen," in its proper definition, involves the element of chance. It cannot with propriety, that is considering the strictness of the use of language in the Constitution, be applied to a term that has never been filled. To illustrate: suppose that when the Constitution was adopted by the States, and the President of the United States had taken the oath of office, the States had not elected Senators to this body. The office of Senator was created when the Constitution was adopted. Does anybody suppose that before a single Legislature had elected Senators, the governors of the respective States could have filled this Chamber by temporary appointments? I believe no one will assert this. And yet what is the reason? It is because the word "vacancy," as used here in the Constitution, does not mean the expiration of a full term, nor that the full term has never been filled. A vacancy "happens." The language of the Constitution is not "if there shall at any time be a vacancy the governor may appoint, to have effect until the next meeting of the Legislature," but it must be a vacancy happening in the recess of the Legislature, a vacancy happening upon what the Legislature has done, a vacancy occurring in a term which the Legislature has filled. I say that is the plain meaning of the Constitution, comparing its different provisions, and I repeat that this word "happen" here was used felicitously because it embodies the element of chance, and shows that in order to authorize the governor to make an appointment, there must be a vacancy which has happened "by resignation or otherwise," in other words, "by resignation and so forth." That is, by resignation or some other unexpected cause. A very common phrase in statutes is the words "and so forth" which means what? Things of a similar kind. For instance, the statutes of several of the States exempt "to a mechanic, miner or other person" property to the amount of $400, the courts; yes, the courts of Kansas—for I see the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] is rejecting this theory—his own courts have held that under that statute exempting to mechanics, miners and others $400, the word "others" does not mean everybody, as the word would naturally mean standing alone; it means others of a like kind, falling within the same class, thus referring to and indorsing the English decisions to which I have already referred. I think I can refer the Senator to one or two cases in Kansas. A case in 9 Kansas, page 30, follows this principle. A case in 2 Minnesota, page 89, also follows the same principle; and indeed this is but adopting the principle well established by the English courts, by Lord Ellenborough and by others, whose authority, without the support of any American courts, would be sufficient to settle this question, because they were adjudications pronounced and well known before the Constitution was adopted. A very strong case on this point is that of Cullen vs. Butler, 5 Maule & Selwyn, 465; and I will also refer, in this connection, to the act of 1866 already referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] and which is expressive of the understanding of Congress upon this subject. Section 14 provides that:

> The Legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent such State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress.

What is the meaning of this section? What did Congress intend to accomplish by it? The lawyers in this Chamber will tell you that it is the duty of every one called upon officially to construe a statute, to so construe it, if consistent with its language, as to carry out the intention of those who enacted it. Was it not intended by that section to provide that the Legislature which sat next before the expiration of the term should fill it? Was not that the meaning of it?

> The Legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time, &c.

When that act was passed, I believe there was not a single State in this Union, whose Legislature, elected next prior to the expiration of the term, did not also meet and organize prior to the expiration of the term. The fact is that this case of New Hampshire has arisen since the act of 1866 was passed, it was not in the mind of the men who passed that act; and to say that that act should be warped and twisted to meet a case which has since happened, out of the ordinary course of proceedings of the States; a case which was not contemplated, not foreseen, not thought of, is to pervert every established principle for construing a statute.

> The Legislature of each State which is chosen—

If the act had read: "The Legislature of each State which is in existence next preceding the expiration of the time," there would have been no question about it; and yet the fact is that when this act was passed in every State, I believe, the Legislature chosen next before the expiration of the term also assembled next before the expiration of the term, so that at that time and in that statute the words "chosen next preceding the expiration of the time" and so forth, had the same effect as the words "in existence last before the expiration of the time" would have. At that time the two phrases would have meant precisely the same thing. That they mean different things now is because this eccentric proceeding has taken place in New Hampshire, by which a Legislature chosen at one time is to have no official existence for nearly a year afterward; a case which Congress did not at all anticipate when the act of 1866 was passed. But let us proceed with this act.

Section 15 provides:

> Such election—

[That is to fill the term]—

> shall be conducted in the following manner: Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator, &c.

I need not read more of this section, for everybody understands it. Then comes section 16. Section 15 having fully provided for the election to a full term then section 16 provides that:

> Whenever on the meeting of the Legislature of any State a vacancy exists in the representation of such State in the Senate, the Legislature shall proceed, on the second Tuesday after meeting and organization, to elect a person to fill such vacancy in the manner prescribed in the preceding section for the election of a Senator for a full term.

Following precisely the analogy of the Constitution and providing first for the election to the full term, the act proceeds in a separate section to provide for the case of a vacancy that has happened; and how is that vacancy to be filled? By the Legislature, in the same manner that the law requires for filling a term; by an election by the two houses acting separately, or by joint convention of the two houses.

I am amazed that any man can take the act of 1866 and say that it gives any countenance to the idea that Congress intended to do what it is said has been done. I submit that you cannot give this act such a construction, if you can possibly avoid it, consistent with the language of the act.

There is another piece of evidence on this subject to which I wish to refer, and that is the record of proceedings in the Senate last June, when the bill to enable the Legislature of New Hampshire, then in session, to elect, was before the Senate. I understand (and as my colleague is thoroughly posted in that matter he will be able to set me right if I am wrong) that the bill which was introduced by him was introduced for the express purpose of being defeated, for the express purpose of enabling the Committee on Privileges and Elections to make upon it an adverse report.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I introduced a bill, but I did not introduce it for that purpose.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator seems to have got sick of it soon after introducing it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not at all.

Mr. CARPENTER. My colleague reported against it, did he not?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I did not report it. I concurred in the report, however.

Mr. CARPENTER. Which was against it?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Which was against it.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have always understood that when a Senator concurs in a report, it is his report; in other words, it is the report of all those who concur in it. The Senator says when he introduced the bill he meant to pass it, but he changed his mind immediately, and reported against it. I understand, in other words, that it was designed to bring this body to vote upon the question of whether that Legislature could elect, and to vote that it could not. I infer as much from the RECORD. I find Senators here saying that that Legislature might elect; a bill was introduced declaring that that was the true meaning of the Revised Statutes; yet I find the very Senators who expressed such opinions voting against the bill. But I particularly refer to the RECORD to show that the opinion I hold is confirmed by able Senators now on this floor. When this bill was before the Senate Mr. Wadleigh claimed that it ought to be passed. I read from page 4357 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Mr. WADLEIGH. The Senator from Ohio would have us believe that there is some doubt as to whether this Legislature or the next is entitled to elect. That is a matter which greatly concerns the people of New Hampshire. It is desirable that that question should be settled at once so that they may not put themselves in a position from which they cannot be extricated without great embarrassment. Accordingly a bill was presented to this body by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which reported unanimously that this Legislature cannot elect the Senator, that the next Legislature must elect. That shows to us clearly that unless this bill passes there must be a vacancy in this Senate from the State of New Hampshire for three months in the next Congress. That is the reason why this proposition should pass.

It was very clearly the opinion of Mr. Wadleigh at that time that the governor could not fill that unfilled term at its commencement. But Mr. THURMAN inquired:

Is there any probability of Congress being in session during those three months?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I do not know about that.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire why the governor of New Hampshire cannot appoint for the vacancy until the Legislature meets in June?

Mr. BLAINE. He cannot do that if the previous term has fully expired.

Mr. WHYTE. Suppose this Legislature has power to elect and does not elect, is not that a vacancy?

Mr. BLAINE. Then the power of the governor does not come in.

Mr. WHYTE. It does, apparently.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all.

Mr. DAWES. Every precedent of the Senate is against that.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Maryland is too good a lawyer to make that assertion.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Having examined the precedents, I am inclined to think the governor cannot appoint.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course the governor cannot appoint. Nothing is better settled than that. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] will give his assent to that, if the term has fully expired.

I am certain my republican friends will not complain of me when I am sustained by such authority. [Laughter.]

As I have said, to authorize the appointment by the governor, two things must be found to exist. First, a vacancy must have happened; and it must have happened during a recess of the Legislature of the State. It is maintained that on the 13th of March there was a recess of the Legislature of New Hampshire. Let us stop and examine that a little. Was there a recess of the Legislature of that State on the 13th of March, 1879? In the first place, what is a recess of a legislative body? The dictionaries define it as a cessation from the labors of that body. When the body has been organized and doing business it takes a recess either for an hour, or a day, or a month, or six months. A recess is the suspension of legislative labors. It implies an organization of the Legislature and a subsequent adjournment. So in speaking of the whole term of a Legislature, when the session has performed its business and nothing more need be done until the next regular session, they adjourn until that session, or adjourn sine die. That is a recess of a Legislature. Let me ask my friends here what Legislature of New Hampshire was in recess on the 13th of March last? What does the term recess of a Legislature, in this provision of the Constitution, mean, except that it is a recess of the Legislature which if in session might make the election? Any other construction makes nonsense of it. Why require a recess to exist in order to let the governor act? Simply because if the Legislature is in session they must act, and the governor only acts for them temporarily in their recess. Then it is certain that the recess contemplated by the Constitution is a recess of the Legislature which was in existence on the day when the appointment was made. The only Legislature of New Hampshire on that day, was the old Legislature; yet the learned Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] says if that Legislature had been convened on the 4th of March in extra session to elect a Senator and had been in actual session on that day for the express purpose of filling that term it could not have done so. To that extent Senators must go to maintain the power of the governor in this case to appoint. Take it upon that ground. Suppose the Senator is right in that? Suppose that that Legislature, the old Legislature, could not elect a Senator if they were sitting to-day—for that is what the Senator from Delaware distinctly answered to my question yesterday—what is the result? A recess of the Legislature which can make the appointment cannot occur until such Legislature is in existence; that is certain. The new Legislature of New Hampshire will have no official existence until the first Wednesday of June next. Then the governor must wait until that Legislature shall assemble and take a recess before he can make an appointment, upon the ground urged here that he is acting in a recess of the Legislature. I do not see any escape from this conclusion. So that, if these Senators are right in the theory upon which they would give Mr. Bell a seat, they must go one step further and deny him a seat because the governor acted prematurely. It will not do to say there was on the 13th March last a recess of the Legislature which was not then in official existence. The Legislature elected in March, 1878, are to hold until next June, when the new constitution goes into operation. Until that hour it is as silent as though it had never been written. It has no effect until that time. It is silent until the first Wednesday of June next, but the old constitution and the old Legislature continue until that time.

But by some provision of law the people, in the fall of 1878, chose the persons who, after the first Wednesday of June next, are to compose the Legislature of that State. Until that time arrives the persons so elected are not members of the Legislature of that State. When the new constitution takes effect they will, in virtue of the action of the people last fall, become members of the Legislature; but at present they have no official existence. When Territories under enabling acts of Congress form constitutions of State government, they elect their Senators; and the practice has been that such embryo Senators come to Washington to procure the admission of the Territory as a State. But they are not Senators until the State is admitted. If Congress should never admit the State they never would be Senators. If the State is admitted then the election of such Senators is cured by relation, and they become members of this body.

Such precisely is the situation of those persons who have already been elected to compose a Legislature under the new constitution of New Hampshire. Until the new constitution takes effect they are not members of the Legislature of that State; nor could they, before that time, assemble and organize as a Legislature. If the governor of that State should to-day find it necessary to convene the Legislature, in extra session, to meet a sudden emergency, the old Legislature would respond to his call; because it is the body which now possesses, and until the first Wednesday of June next will possess, the legislative power of that State. On the 13th of March last, and to-day, there is no Legislature of that State, except the old one elected in March, 1878. From this it follows that if on the 13th of March last there was a recess of the Legislature of New Hampshire within the meaning of the Federal Constitution, it was a recess of the old Legislature. It is absurd to say that there was at that time a recess of a Legislature not then in existence.

But it is clear that to authorize the governor to make an appointment there must have been a recess of the body which at that time possessed the legislative power of that State; because the governor, in making such appointment, acts only for the Legislature which, if in session, could make the election to fill the term.

But the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] contends that if the old Legislature were convened to-day, it could not elect Mr. Wadleigh's successor. If this be so, then it is certain that its recess confers no power upon the governor to act.

But upon the theory that the old Legislature could not make such election, then it is certain the governor was not authorized to act on the 13th of March last; because the new Legislature, which is not yet in official existence, cannot be in recess as the Legislature of that State, and the governor has acted prematurely. He must wait until that Legislature has an existence, and after organization, has taken a recess, before he can make an appointment in virtue of the recess of that Legislature.

But it is so clear that the old Legislature, if it had been convened by the governor on the 4th March last for the purpose of electing a Senator to succeed Mr. Wadleigh, would have had the power to make such election, that nothing more need be said about those gentlemen who will, after the first Wednesday of June next, compose the Legislature of the State under the new constitution.

But let us examine the matter further. On the 13th March last the governor, acting in the recess of the old Legislature, for at that time it was the only Legislature of that State, and consequently was the only Legislature that could be in recess, appointed Mr. Bell to be Senator until the then next meeting of the Legislature. Now suppose the governor had died on the 14th March, and his successor had qualified, and called an extra session of the Legislature to meet on the 20th day of March to elect a Senator. Of course the old Legislature would have assembled. When they were assembled would not that have been a session of the Legislature of that State, and would not the appointment of Mr. Bell thereby have been terminated, even conceding its former validity? This certainly would have been so, apart from the act of 1866; certainly would have been so under the constitution. But the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] says Congress has by the act of 1866 forbidden that Legislature to act. I think it a great error so to construe the act of 1866. But if it must be so construed then I have a short reply. The act forbids the State of New Hampshire to exercise her rights as secured to it by the Constitution of the United States. The act is therefore unconstitutional and utterly void.

I submit that the State of New Hampshire has a right to an equal representation on this floor. She had a right to assemble her Legislature in that State according to the forms of law by a proclamation of the governor on the 3d of March to elect a Senator for the term beginning on the 4th of March, and it is not within the province of the Senate or of both Houses of Congress to strip her of that power.

Suppose the governor had so convened the Legislature, and the old Legislature had met on the 3d day of March and on the 4th or 5th had proceeded to elect, what would have been the effect upon Mr. Bell's appointment? The Constitution says that if the vacancy happens, and I pass by the meaning of that word now, the governor may make a temporary appointment until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill the vacancy. In the case I suppose, I ask any lawyer in the Senate if the old Legislature, elected in March, 1878, convened by a proclamation, would not have been the Legislature which the Federal Constitution declares shall fill that vacancy?

To escape that conclusion Senators must say that New Hampshire on that day had two Legislatures, one to do certain things and the other to do certain other things. But the most important thing that New Hampshire had on hand on the 5th of March last was to elect a Senator, and if the governor had convened a session of the Legislature for that purpose on that day, I want to know upon what authority, I want to know by what clause in the Constitution, both Houses of Congress could pass a law which should deny her the right to do so? But it is said the act of 1866 has done that. Then the act of 1866 is unconstitutional and void, and passes out of this discussion entirely. But I submit that the act of 1866 has not done it. It is an unnatural and an unreasonable construction of that act to say that it means that the persons who would some time in the future become members of the Legislature, it may be one year, it may be two years after the expiration of the term—that they, and they alone, and not the Legislature in life and existence on the 4th of March, shall make that election. Such a construction would make the act unconstitutional, and therefore is not to be adopted unless its language imperatively leads to that conclusion, and then the act must be declared void.

We must distinguish between that which is ordained by the Federal Constitution, and that which is established by State constitutional laws. The Constitution of the Union guarantees to every State the right of perpetual representation in this body. Although a senatorial term may expire on the 4th of March, the President may convene Congress in extra session on the 5th, to consider the most important questions; questions of peace or war; questions deeply affecting every State of the Union; and every State is entitled to be represented in such session. An act of Congress which makes it impossible for a State to enjoy this right, deprives the State of that which the Constitution secures to it, and is therefore null and void. If the act of 1866 must be so construed as to deprive New Hampshire of her constitutional right of representation, then it is void. It should not be so construed if its language will admit of any other construction. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] in the discussion yesterday, attempted to parry the effect of questions I put to him by saying it was wrong to reduce matters to the reductio ad absurdum. I suggest to that Senator, not only with deference to his opinion but with affection for him personally, that that depends entirely upon whose argument is reduced to it. It is perfectly legitimate, perfectly consistent with courteous debate, to show that the argument of an opponent leads to such conclusion. I asked that Senator yesterday whether, if the new Legislature of New Hampshire should not be in official existence for ten years, it would be in the power of Congress to declare that such Legislature, and not the one in existence at the expiration of a senatorial term, should elect the successor. He complained that the question involved a reductio ad absurdum. Yet I submit to that Senator that if Congress could defer the power of election from a Legislature in existence when the term expired to one which would be in existence three months afterward, it could as well confer it upon a Legislature which would be in existence ten years afterward. Conceding the power of Congress to postpone the power of election beyond the commencement of a new term, it would clearly be within the discretion and power of Congress to determine how long such power should be postponed.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question here, in order that I may get the right understanding of his remarks?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. Speaking of the Legislature that would have power to elect, if the Legislature were convened, the Senator reads this clause of the Constitution:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

If I understand the argument of my friend, he holds that a vacancy occurring by the expiration of a term is not a vacancy within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution. Then, if that is the case, this provision that the Legislature "shall then fill such vacancies" has no application, because it is only in cases of vacancies which the governor may fill by a temporary appointment that this clause provides that the Legislature at the expiration of such temporary appointment shall fill the vacancy.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is undoubtedly so; but what is the consequence; what does it prove?

Mr. THURMAN. It proves that the Senator's remarks have no application, as it seems to me, but it may be for want of comprehending his meaning. That is the reason why I ask the question. It proves that if the Legislature should now assemble, if the Senator's interpretation of the Constitution is correct, that clause in the Constitution which provides that the Legislature "shall then fill such vacancies" would have no application.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is giving to my remarks a most remarkable turn. The Constitution here treats of two subjects; first, the election to fill the regular terms. There is no dispute among Senators about that. That is to be done by the Legislature. Of course if the Legislature is not in session on a certain day, whenever it is in session it must then perform the duty. Nobody doubts that; but the appointments to fill vacancies happening in the recess of the Legislature are only to last until another meeting of the Legislature, and therefore the Constitution provides that the appointment which the governor shall make in the recess shall expire on the meeting of the next session of the Legislature. They are different subjects entirely.

Mr. THURMAN. If my friend will permit me, I admit that if there is a Legislature competent to elect and if it were to assemble now, it would be its duty to fill the vacancy whether any appointment had been made by the governor or not, but it would not result from that clause of the Constitution which the Senator read.

Mr. CARPENTER. Not at all; I do not claim that it would.

Mr. THURMAN. It would result from the other clause, which requires the Senator to be chosen by the Legislature.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is precisely what I have for an hour been contending for. We agree entirely in regard to those two provisions of the Constitution. One has relation to the vacancies that may chance or happen in the recess of the Legislature, whereas the other, the general, provision applies to all the cases where the Legislature is required to elect for the term.

Mr. President, I have taken much more time than I intended to occupy when I commenced addressing the Senate. I have no partisanship about this matter. I never saw Mr. Bell until he came here, but he seems to be a gentleman, he is a republican, and I would be very glad to have New Hampshire represented by two Senators. I sympathized deeply with the sentiments of the Senator from Delaware yesterday, who was so anxious to preserve the integrity of the Union and the peace and prosperity of the American people that he wanted to let Mr. Bell in. I am equally anxious to preserve the Union and to preserve the prosperity of the people and the integrity of the Constitution, and for that reason I cannot vote to seat Mr. Bell; believing that to do so would be to violate the Constitution. I maintain and believe that the construction which has been put upon the act of 1866 caused the evil in this case. The old Legislature had the power in my judgment to elect a Senator and ought to have elected one at its session in June last. As it did not, the State must take the consequences and be partially unrepresented until the Legislature shall be in session to elect a Senator. In this matter the Legislature represents the State; and when the Legislature last in session previous to the expiration of a senatorial term, having power to make an election, refuses or neglects to do so, then until an election can be made, in conformity with the Constitution of the Union, the State, by its Legislature, has consented to waive its right of equal representation in this Chamber.

The action of the Senate at its last session, is claimed to have influenced the Legislature of New Hampshire in session in June last, not to make an election; and therefore it is claimed that a strong equity exists for admitting Mr. Bell to a seat under this appointment. If this question were to be determined, not by the constitutional laws of the Union and of that State, but by good nature and official gallantry, Mr. Bell might found some claim upon this ground. But the most ignorant person in the land is presumed to know the law, therefore I think the Legislature of New Hampshire must be subjected to the same presumption. If other Senators can feel justified in absolving themselves from obedience to the constitutional laws, and admit Mr. Bell upon the ground that the action of the Senate last year misled and deceived the Legislature which ought to have filled this term, they will be justified in voting to seat him, and their doing so will cause me no regret. But I cannot yield to such considerations without doing that which in my opinion would violate the Constitution I have, as a Senator, sworn to support. And while I pass no criticisms upon those who differ with me, I must perform my duty as I understand it.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, I rise not to argue at length the question now before the Senate, but to explain very briefly the reasons which will influence me in casting my vote upon it. There is no right of more inestimable value secured to the smaller States by the Constitution than that of equal suffrage in the Senate. It is the only right of which they cannot be deprived even by a constitutional amendment, unless it is assented to by all the States, without the grossest breach of the national faith, because the Constitution declares that "no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

The manifest intent of the framers of the Constitution in employing the language they have used was to provide the machinery by which both senatorial terms in each State should be kept filled and the equal suffrage of the State in the Senate maintained, unless the Legislature of the State, representing its sovereignty, should by its own default permit one or both of them to become vacant. We ought not, therefore, to put such a construction upon the Constitution, unless its language imperatively requires it, as in effect to declare that while the intent of its framers, as expressed on its face, was that "no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate," its provisions in regard to choosing Senators by the Legislature and in regard to making temporary appointments by the executive to fill vacancies are so inaptly expressed as to defeat that intent. We ought rather to so construe it as to give full effect to the manifest intent of its framers, that each State shall be enabled at all times and under all circumstances to be represented by two Senators on this floor.

The Constitution provides that the Senators to represent a State shall be chosen by its Legislature; and that "if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies;" and it provides that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." Congress in pursuance of the power thus bestowed upon it has provided by law that the Legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of a senatorial term shall elect a Senator to fill such vacancy. The Legislature of New Hampshire chosen next preceding the 3d of March last, when Mr. Wadleigh's term expired, has not met and cannot meet under the provisions of the constitution of that State until June next.

The question we have to decide is whether or not under these provisions of the Constitution and law of the United States and of the constitution of New Hampshire the governor of New Hampshire had the right to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term until the next meeting of the Legislature?

Construing the provisions of the Constitution relating to this subject and the law providing for the election of Senators together, and with a view to carrying into effect their principal intent, that the equal suffrage of each State in the Senate shall be maintained if it can be done without doing violence to the language of the Constitution, I understand the meaning of that instrument and of the law passed in accordance therewith to be this:

That whenever a Legislature is charged by law with the duty of filling a senatorial term, and refuses or neglects to discharge that duty, that term must remain vacant until the Legislature which represents the sovereignty of the State chooses to discharge the duty which the law devolves upon it. Such a vacancy is not one which the executive of the State can fill by a temporary appointment made either before or after the vacancy actually occurs, because the State through the Legislature has decided to deprive itself for the time being of its equal representation in the Senate, but when a vacancy occurs in the recess of the Legislature—I ask especial attention to this proposition—I repeat when a vacancy occurs in the recess of the Legislature and no Legislature is in default because of not having filled it, then the executive can make a temporary appointment; whether the vacancy is one caused by the expiration of a term or by the resignation, or otherwise, of the person chosen to fill it.

This construction is perfectly consistent with the language of the Constitution, unless a narrow and technical meaning is to be placed on the word "happen" and makes the constitutional provision such that no State can ever be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate unless by the default of its Legislature, of its executive, or of the person selected to act as one of its Senators. On the other hand, if the word "happen" is to be construed as necessarily involving the element of casualty, and consequently as forbidding under any circumstances the filling by a temporary executive appointment of a vacancy caused by the expiration of a term, then we are driven to the alternative of depriving a State of its equal representation in the Senate when its Legislature is in no default in not having filled the vacancy, and when its executive has attempted to fill it by a temporary appointment. So harsh a construction of the Constitution—one reflecting so seriously upon its framers by reason of their inapt use of language to render effective their declared intent—ought not to be adopted by the Senate unless the language of that instrument is so unambiguous as to admit of no other interpretation.

Every constitution and code of laws contemplate the filling of every vacancy in an existing office with all convenient speed, and where an instrument or statute without violence to its language is capable of two constructions, that one should never be adopted which requires an existing office to remain vacant; and this is especially so in a case like the present, where to keep the office of Senator vacant is to deprive the State of its equal suffrage in the Senate without its consent.

But it has been contended in substance that the people of New Hampshire must be presumed to have been aware of the provisions of the United States law regulating the election of Senators at the time they adopted their organic law; and that, as by that organic law the Legislature chosen next preceding the termination of a senatorial term cannot meet until after the beginning of the new term, they must be presumed to have intended and consented to the necessary result of their own act in adopting that organic law.

But I answer that there are some presumptions which lead to results so unjust that no tribunal which has full discretion to reject them, and to decide the question at issue upon its merits, will adopt them as a mere matter of law. It will at least exercise its discretion this far: to require some proof that the presumption which the law would draw is true as a matter of fact. Now it is absolutely inconceivable, as a matter of fact, that the people of a small State like New Hampshire have, with full knowledge of its effect, adopted a constitution under which, so long as it remains in force, as often as a senatorial term expires by limitation, the vacancy must continue for three months.

In cases where the executive of a State has the unquestioned right to make temporary appointments the Constitution declares that such appointments shall expire with "the next meeting of the Legislature." Yet from the very foundation of the Government the Senate, in order to prevent a vacancy and to preserve the equal suffrage of the States in this body, has construed that language to mean that the temporary appointment shall remain in force until the next meeting of the Legislature and election by it of a Senator, or until it shall meet and adjourn without making an election. I confess this is a liberality of construction which I would have hesitated to be the first to suggest, but as it is perfectly well established and as it greatly aids in keeping the seats in this body filled, and thus in preserving the equal suffrage of the States therein, I should be extremely reluctant to see it abandoned.

In view, then, of the liberal construction always placed by the Senate on the phrase "until the next meeting of the Legislature," it ought to have no difficulty, in order to effectuate the same important object, in construing the word "happen" as equivalent to "occur;" which, indeed, is the word substituted for it by Congress in the section of the law providing for the election of Senators to fill vacancies. If such a meaning be placed upon the word "happen," there is no difficulty about construing the Constitution and United States laws made in conformity therewith to mean what I have already claimed is their meaning—that whenever a vacancy occurs in the recess of the Legislature, and which no Legislature of the State is in default for not having filled, it can be filled by an executive appointment, whether the vacancy occurred by reason of the expiration of a term or by reason of the resignation, or otherwise, of the person selected to fill it.

Believing this to be the construction which ought to prevail I shall, unless my views in the course of this discussion undergo an entire change, vote to seat Mr. Bell.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, in the discussion of this question it is hardly conceivable that there can be the least party feeling or bias. The seating of the claimant, Mr. Bell, will make no political change in this body; and whether he be seated or not, a successor to Mr. Wadleigh will be chosen by the Legislature of New Hampshire, of the same political party to which he belongs, next June. The importance of the matter, therefore, it seems to me, arises only from the fact that this will be a precedent on the precise question whether the governor of a State, when the regular term of a Senator expires during the recess of the Legislature of that State, can appoint a Senator for that State. It is well that we are called upon to decide this question under circumstances when there can be no partisan or political feeling as to the result; but it is important that we should decide it according to the true intent and meaning of the Constitution, as our decision will have weight as a precedent.

I have given my best attention not to preparing an argument on this question, but with a view of satisfying myself of the correct rule on the subject according to the Constitution. I have come to a conclusion, and with great respect to others I will say as to the conclusion at which I have arrived that I have no doubt in my own mind that the Constitution does not confer power upon the governor to appoint a Senator to commence a new term of six years. I shall content myself with stating very briefly the conclusion to which I have come and the reasons which have led me to that conclusion. I shall not endeavor to make an elaborate argument. I concur in the views so well expressed by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY,] by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] and the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.]

I wish, however, to ask the attention of the Senate to what has seemed to me to be entitled to weight. I wish to call attention a little more particularly to the language of the Constitution on the question whether the governor can appoint a Senator to commence a new term on the expiration of the prior term of six years. I first ask the attention of the Senate to the language of the Constitution. If the last part of the clause of the provision of the Constitution wherein the word "vacancy" is used had been left out, would there be any doubt that it was the exclusive right and the duty of the Legislature to choose a Senator for the term of six years on the expiration of a prior term? The language of section 3, article 1, is that—

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years.

The section then provides that the Senators first elected shall be divided into three classes, and that—

The seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year; of the second class, at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class, at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one-third may be chosen every second year.

Chosen by whom? By the Legislature unquestionably. Therefore, if you leave out all as to "vacancies," and the word is used twice in this subsequent part of the paragraph, you will have the power conferred and you will have the power conferred coupled with the duty imposed upon the Legislature, to choose Senators on the expiration of terms of six years. The Legislature under this provision has exclusive power to fill all vacancies caused by the expiration of the terms of six years.

But it is said that the word "vacancies" in the subsequent part of this provision covers the vacating of a seat in the Senate caused by the expiration of an incumbent's term. Does it do so? I shall not stop to repeat what has been so ably said by the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Winconsin as to the significance of the words "happen by resignation or otherwise," but I wish to call attention to the "vacancies" which the Legislature may fill as contradistinguished from choosing a Senator for a full term. The first part of this section provides fully for choosing a successor to a Senator whose term has expired. What, then, are the "vacancies" which the Legislature shall fill and which the governor may temporarily appoint an incumbent to? The provision is:

If vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

The "vacancies" which the governor may temporarily appoint to and the "vacancies" which the Legislature shall fill at its next session are "vacancies" happening or occurring during the running of the six-year term for which the Legislature alone can choose a Senator. Is it not, then, true, in the plain language of the Constitution, that the governor may temporarily appoint in the recess of the Legislature to fill only such "vacancies" as the Legislature by the Constitution shall fill the first time they meet after the "vacancies."

The provisions of section 3, article 1, of the Constitution, prior to this in which "vacancies" are mentioned and provided for, conferred full power on the Legislatures to keep the Senate full by choosing Senators to succeed those whose terms expired by constitutional limitation, by the expiration of the six years.

This last part of the clause to which I have alluded provides that where "vacancies" happen during a recess of the Legislature the governor may appoint and the Legislature shall fill such "vacancies" at their next meeting. I submit that the plain meaning of this, its spirit, its intent, is that they are vacancies occurring during the efflux of the term of six years, and they are not vacancies which exist when the six-year term has expired.

I appreciate the force of the argument (and I mean to give it due weight) that we should give that construction to the Constitution if we fairly can which will tend to keep the representation of the States in the Senate full; but I cannot do that against the language of the Constitution, what I believe to have been the intent of its makers. I think it is manifest they were solicitous that the men sitting here as Senators should not be selected by one man in a State but that they should be selected by the representatives of the people of the State in the Legislature. Hence the "vacancies" which the governor can fill temporarily by appointment must occur during a recess of the Legislature. If the vacancy occurs while the Legislature is in session, although it is the last day of its session, the governor cannot appoint at all. It is conceded that such a vacancy must occur during the recess. If the Legislature is in session when the vacancy occurs and fails to choose a Senator, the governor can never appoint a person to fill the vacancy. If the governor appoints temporarily and the Legislature meets and for any cause or for no cause does not fill the vacancy which had occurred and which the governor had filled by appointment, the Senator so appointed goes out of office at the expiration of the first session of the Legislature, and there can be no one to take his place till the Legislature fills the vacancy.

I allude to this only to show that the framers of the Constitution intended to limit and restrict the power of the governor to put a man upon the floor of the Senate as a representative of the State. I think the meaning of the language of the Constitution is that the vacancy which is made in this body by the expiration of the six-year term of a Senator must be filled by the Legislature, and this is not a vacancy which happens by resignation, or otherwise, within the meaning of the Constitution. The vacancy which the governor may fill is one which occurs during the running of a six-year term, and which the Legislature must fill, not for six years, but for the unexpired portion of the term.

Without arguing further the point, relying upon the arguments made by other gentlemen upon this question, asking each Senator to examine the Constitution and see if the vacancies to which the governor may appoint are not only those which occur during the term of six years, and not those made by the expiration of the prior term to which the Legislature alone is authorized to choose an incumbent, I am content to leave this question.

Now, a few suggestions about the precedents. I conceive there is nothing very significant in the precedents down to the year 1825. In that year the term of Mr. Lanman, from Connecticut, expired on the 3d of March. The governor of that State, by an appointment dated the 9th of February, reciting that he had been notified that there would be an extra session of Congress on the 4th of March, and that the Legislature would not meet for some months after the meeting of the extra session, did appoint Mr. Lanman a Senator until the next meeting of the Legislature. I concede that there is a difference in fact in that case and this in this particular, that the governor of Connecticut did appoint before the vacancy had actually occurred, but I fail to find any evidence which is reliable that the decision of that case was at all influenced by that fact. Had the objection been made that the appointment was made before the vacancy occurred, the governor of Connecticut could have made another appointment on the 4th of March and he would have been admitted to a seat. He did not become an appointee until the 4th of March, for the executive of Connecticut could not appoint till then. No such objection was made, and therefore I believe that it was decided on the broad ground that the governor could not appoint a Senator to commence a new term.

My friend from Delaware says it is not so regarded by Judge Story. I know Judge Story puts it on something else; but I call attention to what was the opinion of men, some of whom were active political men in 1825, some of whom I believe voted for the decision in 1825 excluding Mr. Lanman from a seat. My friend from Connecticut well says that Judge Story gives no reason or authority for his opinion. When the question came up again in 1854, in the Phelps case, this was the interpretation put upon the decision in the Lanman case. I have looked into the debate of 1854. The point under adjudication there was not, I concede, the point here; but it involved the question of the governor's power to appoint. I will not read what has been read already in this debate, but I ask Senators, as better than my own opinion, to permit me to read a few sentences from what was said first by Judge Butler, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and an able lawyer. He said in the debate in 1854 on the Phelps case:

It seems to be conceded, that the authority to choose a Senator to commence a new term of six years, after the efflux of a regular term, is exclusively vested in the State Legislature.

He said further:

In 1825 Lanman's case came up for consideration, involving both the questions. In that case, after a very full debate, it was solemnly decided that it was not competent for the governor of a State to put a member on this floor at the commencement of a term. In other words, it was decided that his power of appointment could not be substituted for the election of the State Legislature. Even if such had not been the decision in the case of Lanman, I take it for granted that such would be and must necessarily be the decision now.

He is speaking of the case that had stood unchallenged since 1825, and he speaks of it as settling, not the question whether because Lanman's appointment was dated before the vacancy he was not to be admitted, but it was put by him upon the ground that there was not power in any governor under the Constitution to appoint a man to begin a full term as successor to a Senator whose term has expired.

Mr. Badger, of North Carolina, who has the reputation, and I believe justly, of having being a very able lawyer, and who differed from Judge Butler in politics, said:

Now, my friend from Kentucky has suggested one or two questions, which I think will be sufficiently answered by this statement. The vacancies which the executive of a State is authorized to fill are never vacancies that happen by the efflux of time; they are not foreseen vacancies; they are vacancies that "happen by resignation, or otherwise."

Here is a great lawyer of the party opposed to Judge Butler and others who spoke, saying:

Mr. President, from an exceeding desire to give to this clause of the Constitution such a construction as would keep the Senate always full, I labored hard, a year or two ago, when we had questions of this kind before us, to find out some method of supporting, in my own mind, the construction that a vacancy happening by the efflux of time, and not filled beforehand by the Legislature, might be brought within this limited power conferred upon the executive; but, sir, I have been obliged to abandon it.

He, a good lawyer, having in mind the importance of keeping the Senate full, says he labored hard to come to the conclusion that an executive could fill the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of a six-year term, but he had to abandon it.

"By resignation, or otherwise," is the language. We must expound the word "otherwise" to apply to vacancies happening by similar events; that is, unforeseen events—death, resignation, appointment to an office which disqualifies—and it can never be applied to the expiration of the term of a Senator which leaves a seat vacant on this floor. My opinion, therefore, is, that the governor of a State has no power to fill a vacancy in this body which is brought about by the expiration or efflux of the time for which a Senator was elected—in other words, at the determination of his term in the Senate. It must be a vacancy in the term happening during the recess of the Legislature; it must be a vacancy in the term happening by resignation or other casualty. That I understand to have been the express and solemn decision of the Senate in Mr. Lanman's case, in 1825, overruling one or two earlier decisions, which had passed, perhaps, without full consideration.

I read this because it had and should have great weight. It was said in the presence of able statesmen who were lawyers. This was in the Phelps case, where this point was debated fully. The governor in the case of Phelps appointed temporarily to a vacancy occurring during a term; the Legislature came together, and after sitting a few days, adjourned without filling the vacancy, and the Senate held that the appointee could not continue to sit beyond the session—a pretty close construction as to a vacancy clearly within the meaning of the last part of the clause of the Constitution in question. I call attention to it to show that Senators desiring to construe the clause so as to keep the Senate full would not construe it to keep that seat full, though there was a clear vacancy during a recess; and yet the governor could not keep the man here if the Legislature met and did not elect.

Now, Mr. President, in regard to the Sevier case I need not add to what the Senator from Georgia so well said. The very men who voted upon it said they did not mean to shake the Lanman case. Although I might not agree with that decision, they decided it saying they held the Lanman case correct.

Then, I ask, is it wise to depart from what these Senators say in 1854 has been the uniform construction of the Constitution, based upon the Lanman case down to that time, which they all approve; and although I have not read all the debate I believe no Senator disputed the propositions put forth by Mr. Bayard, by Judge Butler, and by Mr. Badger. Judge Butler stated that it was a conceded point, and that it must have been decided the same way then if the Lanman case had never been decided, and a leading whig lawyer and jurist said that he had striven to come to the conclusion that some of our friends now come to here, with a view of keeping the Senate full, but that he had to abandon it, and his deliberate conclusion is, first, that the Lanman case solemnly decided it, and second, that he has come to the same conclusion that the expiration of a term, the ending of a term of six years, is not a vacancy to which the governor can appoint.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from New York permit me to ask him a question for information? Suppose there being now a vacancy (which I presume we all agree there is) in the senatorial representation of the State of New Hampshire, the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire were now in session and were to proceed to fill that vacancy, under what clause of the Constitution would they get the authority to fill it?

Mr. KERNAN. Choosing a Senator to a term which had been vacated by the efflux of time, I should say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I understand from my friend that they get it under the first three lines of section 3.

Mr. KERNAN. And what is in the residue, namely: "so that one-third may be chosen every second year." This aids the first clause, I think.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then my friend perceives that under the first clause, by the express language of the Constitution the Legislature must choose for six years. That is plain because it says so in terms, and there is not any noscitur a sociis or anything else that can get it out of that. Now the next clause is that the Senators shall be divided into classes so that one-third of the Senators may be chosen every second year. This third to which the New Hampshire class belongs cannot be chosen every second year, for a part of it has gone by. That power of choosing every second year is lost in its exact continuity. There is a vacancy. That is admitted. Now when that vacancy is filled up, it is filled up as a vacancy; the term does not begin in June when the Legislature begins.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not want to detain the Senate; I will only state my view.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I merely wished to ask him whether he did not come down at last to the power to fill vacancies.

Mr. KERNAN. It is a fair question, and I do not complain of it. I understand if this Legislature chooses a Senator now, it chooses him for the term of six years from the 4th of March, 1879, and no other, and I say further that while I admit that the vacating of a seat in this body by the retirement of Senator Wadleigh, of New Hampshire, leaves in one sense a vacancy in this body, a vacancy in the representation of that State, I have argued and I feel very strongly the conviction that it is not the vacancy which the Constitution meant to allow the governor to fill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is another question. I merely wished to know whether there was a vacancy now.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not think there is, within the meaning of vacancies which are to be appointed to temporarily by the governor, and filled not for six years, but filled for a portion of a term under the last clause. But, Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate further. I only wanted to do justice to my colleagues on the committee, with whom I fully concurred, by expressing my strong conviction that the conclusion of the majority of the committee is correct.

One word on another subject. The Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] for whose opinions I always have great respect as I have a very high regard for him, argued as though there was something in this case that Congress was to blame for, and therefore we should give the construction he contended for to the Constitution. He said in substance, alluding to the act of Congress of 1866, when before has Congress by its law prevented a State from having its representation in the Senate? I do not understand that we have prevented it. The law of 1866 was made long before New Hampshire changed its constitution, and it was made when it suited them precisely under their old constitution. If they have changed their constitution and laws by inadvertence so that they have not the right Legislature there to elect, that is not the fault of Congress, but it is their misfortune, and I am frank to say, though I never had my attention called to it till yesterday, that I think they could have called together the Legislature elected in March, 1878, and elected a Senator. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin in that. What is the language?

The Legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected shall choose a successor.

What is the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire to-day? Is it the one that by the new constitution was elected last November, and is not to come into legal existence until next June, or is it that body in which is vested the law-making power to-day in New Hampshire, and the only body that can make a law to-day, for, as I understand, the old Legislature elected in March, 1878, is continued in being for a year, and the new one, as it is called, is not a Legislature until the constitution makes it such in June next? But I do not attach importance to this. I do not think we can change the construction of the Constitution of the United States on this subject to accommodate it to the action of States. The Constitution I think vests the exclusive power of choosing Senators for six years, of choosing a Senator who is to succeed an incumbent whose term expires, in the Legislature; and that is the case before us. There is no vacancy in the sense of the Constitution to which the governor could appoint. I say such a vacancy is one happening during the running of a six-year term, and not one which occurs when a term expires.

The Legislature elected in March, 1878, as I understand, held their regular session by law last June. Why did they not choose a Senator then to succeed Mr. Wadleigh? They were then the Legislature elected under their constitution and laws last before the vacancy, and if they had elected I have no doubt the election would have been held valid.

I have said, Mr. President, all I desire, and I have submitted my views as those very earnestly entertained by me after examination and believing that we ought to adhere to what has been the understanding ever since 1825 by all that we find in the debates or in action, because where there was a departure from it they affirmed that the correct decision of this question was made in the Lanman case.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, perhaps everything that I could say on this subject has already been said and much better said than I could hope to say it; but as the member of the committee who reported the resolution under consideration to the Senate, perhaps it is incumbent upon me to express some views in regard to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Would the Senator prefer to go on to-morrow?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no choice on that subject.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. It is late now. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have only taken the floor now because nobody else claimed it, as I supposed the debate was about closing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield for the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 22, noes 18; and (at three o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 8, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. D. T. PHILLIPS, of Parsons, Pennsylvania.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

CHANGE OF NAME OF SCHOONER.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution which I ask the courtesy of the House to pass at this time. I present the resolution at the request of the officers of the New York custom-house, for the benefit of the owner of a vessel in my district.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit the owners of the schooner Isle of Pines to change the name to George S. Sleight.

Mr. REED. I object.

HENRY VOELTER.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House cause to be printed for the use of the House the reports of the Commissioner of Patents and the examiner upon the application of Henry Voelter for a reissue of his patent for making wood paper-pulp.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Allow me to state to the gentleman from Michigan that last session a resolution calling upon the Commissioner of Patents to send papers in this case to the House of Representatives was passed, and that instead of sending copies he sent the whole of the original papers in the case, while the House did not desire to have printed any papers except the report of the Commissioner on the subject. And now those original papers are here and the Commissioner desires them to be returned to the Department. The object of this resolution is to authorize the Clerk to copy the paper desired and print that and return the rest to the Department, in order that it may not be deprived of its record.

Mr. CONGER. They will probably be safe here for two or three days more.

Mr. SPRINGER. They have been here for months.

Mr. CONGER. And they have not been destroyed yet. That is a good reason why there is no hurry in this matter.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Commissioner's request is that they be returned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects. That is conclusive for the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. Objections are sometimes made without reason.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the rules be amended so that Saturday of each week be set apart for the consideration of bills committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union other than the regular appropriation bills.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FRYE. Before the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] proceeds, I desire to speak a moment on a question of personal privilege.

In the debate a few days since I took occasion to quote from the Okolona States, a paper published in Mississippi, and I stated that it was a paper of respectability and reflected the sentiments of the Mississippi democracy. Thereupon a gentleman, whose name I do not remember, said that its editor was a "carpet-bagger," and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] said the editor was a sutler in a Michigan regiment. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] said that the paper represented no respectable element of the Mississippi democracy.

Now, sir, I do not wish to misrepresent anything in any remark which I made, and in justice to myself, in justice to the gallant soldier on the other side, I desire the Clerk to read the letter which I send up.

The Clerk read as follows:

OKOLONA, MISSISSIPPI, April 3, 1879.

DEAR SIR: In the discussion in the House on the 1st instant, Mr. MULDROW, of this State, is reported as saying that our paper (the States) "represented no respectable element of the Mississippi democracy."

I wish that you could then and there have confronted him with the following; (I would send the entire paper but must not break our files:)

"Southern States. Okolona, Mississippi. A. Y. Harper, W. H. Kernan, editors. Wednesday, August 28, 1878. For Congress, first district, HENRY L. MULDROW, of Oktibbeha."

The editor-in-chief of our paper is Colonel A. Y. Harper, a confederate officer in the late war.

Respectfully, yours,

WILL. H. KERNAN.

Hon. Mr. FRYE.

Mr. FRYE. That is all I desire to say.

ORDER OF DEBATE.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. McLANE. Before the gentleman from Tennessee moves to go into Committee of the Whole I desire to call the attention of the House to a practice which prevails in the Committee of the Whole as to the assignment of the floor, and I desire to move that Rule 59 shall be the rule for the government of the Chairman. Of course this does not exclude from him the right to make a list. Rule 59 is ample to govern the Chairman and the Speaker in their practice, a practice giving rise to great dissatisfaction, that of filing a list of from sixty or seventy to eighty names, in advance even of the Chairman taking the chair, and by which he is governed. A more unreasonable and abusive rule of the privilege of the House I cannot conceive; therefore, before we go into Committee of the Whole, I move that Rule 59 be enforced.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE 59. When two or more members happen to rise at once, the Speaker shal name the member who is first to speak.

The SPEAKER. Rule 113 will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE 113. The rules of proceedings in the House shall be observed in Committee of the Whole so far as they may be applicable, except the rule limiting the times of speaking; but no member shall speak twice to any question until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that there is a list here which he has not seen, but gentlemen entered their names with the Clerk. Of course he has no wish on the subject except what is just to the two sides. The Chair thinks that in these recognitions they ought to be made from side to side.

Mr. McLANE. That is a matter of the discretion of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair in the House has always recognized this practice.

Mr. McCOOK. I would like to hear, for information, how long this custom has been equivalent to a rule in the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not a rule.

Mr. McCOOK. I know that; but it has been a custom for many Congresses.

Mr. CLYMER. That was the practice of the House during the period of the Speakership of Mr. BLAINE, and it was the practice during the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. COX. This custom grew up during the war; the war made it a military necessity.

Mr. McCOOK. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, without a wish to discuss the question, that the rule has now been in practice for fourteen or fifteen years, and that the matter be referred if necessary to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. It has been a subject of discussion among the members of the Committee on Rules, but, the Chair thinks, not in committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose that there is no doubt that it rests in the discretion of the presiding officer to recognize members, and that the presiding officer shall have knowledge of those who desire to speak, and if it is necessary that he shall have a memorandum of those persons who desire to speak; that is only decent and proper. I do not suppose that the presiding officer is bound by a rule that says that he shall not have a list.

The SPEAKER. When the late Speaker Kerr occupied this chair he stated that he only had a list for his own convenience. The Chair presumes that that was the purpose of all Speakers in having a list.

Mr. MITCHELL. I came in since this question was raised; and I do not understand how any custom shall abrogate the rules in the recognition of a member who is entitled to the floor. If that be the rule there ought to be some notice to members of who is to occupy the chair. Now, so far as this measure is concerned, it must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, and the House has not yet resolved itself into Committee of the Whole. The Speaker has not yet exercised his power under the rules to designate the person who shall preside. I submit that if there be any such rule there ought to be some prescription of it; and it ought not to lie in the breast of a man not yet designated.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Maryland does not apply to any particular member, but applies to whoever may be chosen as chairman.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not understand the remark of the gentleman from Maryland and was not addressing myself particularly to it, but to the remark which dropped from the gentleman from Ohio, which I understood to relate to a practice in this House that may be proper enough in the case of the Speaker, but whether it be proper in the case supposed or stated is, I think, an entirely different question. I understand that some seventy or eighty gentlemen have had their names placed on the list for speeches in Committee of the Whole, and that this list is to control the matter of recognition. For myself I care nothing about the matter.

The SPEAKER. This is a proposition not to have the recognition controlled absolutely by that list.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Allow me to say just one word before this question is acted on. No person possesses more arbitrary power over men and measures than the Speaker of this House. I have been myself a witness of the enforcement of the rule which the gentleman from Maryland proposes to require to be executed, and I have in times past believed that the Speaker of the House has "run" the legislation of the country so that the personal fortunes of men have been placed in the hands of but a few individuals. For one I have been pleased to see grow into a custom the practice of which the gentleman from Maryland complains. It is the only practice under which justice can be done to every member upon the floor, so that all may have an equal opportunity to be heard. Under the old rule the Speaker may, upon the other side or upon this, commit the control of every measure into the hands of but a few men. I have witnessed that, and against that practice I have been in former times a bitter protestant. I would rather see observed the custom which has grown up than see the rigid enforcement of the old rule. Some of us are humble men, modest men; yet our constituents, who have sent us here to represent their views and sentiments, may desire that we shall take part in the debates. Hence I say the modest men, the young members on this floor, should have the opportunity to be heard, and that this matter should never rest in the arbitrary discretion of the Speaker, so that he may commit the entire control of measures to a few of his favorites. I honor the custom rather than the rule.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that it is ever impossible for a member of this House to get an opportunity to say what he wants to say. I do not know that I have ever experienced any great difficulty in saying something at the proper time. Let me illustrate by what occurred on Saturday last in Committee of the Whole.

There had been an outrageous attack made upon the conduct of elections in the city of Philadelphia, where, as the Speaker himself knows, the right to vote is fully protected; where no man who has the right to exercise the elective franchise is deprived of that right. Now, I know very well that on Saturday last the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole would have been glad to give me the floor for a few minutes to reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY;] but there was the list, which had to be adhered to. I was very anxious to answer the gentleman from Ohio at that time. Yet I preferred that the list which had been made should be adhered to regularly, even though the immediate result was to deprive me of the opportunity of answering that outrageous attack upon the city of Philadelphia in reference to the exercise of the elective franchise—a city where no man is deprived of his right to vote, or ever has been while the republicans have had control. This is all I desire to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, there are difficulties connected with this matter, and I think it would be well if the Committee on Rules should consider them. It is almost imperatively necessary that the Speaker of the House should have ample discretion as to who shall have the floor, or, as they say in the Spanish chamber, who shall have "the word." Members of the House who are chairmen or members of certain committees are reasonably entitled to preference with regard to recognition when the particular subject-matter coming from that committee is before the House. In the same way members who have peculiar interests in certain questions are entitled to preference. Discretion in regard to this matter ought to be left if possible with the Speaker. Yet, sir, we are bound in some way to have a list of this kind. In the French Legislative Assembly no man can take the tribune until he has his name enrolled. That rule in the French chamber grows out of the very necessity of the case. It will be found that the same necessity exists in this House. Let us, then, have this matter referred to the Committee on Rules for consideration; but so long as the rule remains, and gentlemen insist on its observance, it will have to be observed by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. My friend from Maryland, I suggest, might make a motion to have this matter referred to the Committee on Rules, with the view of having the rule in this regard amended if necessary, or of making some further provision for its execution.

Mr. McLANE. My motion is altogether misapprehended by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] and I think also by the gentleman on the other side from the State of New York, [Mr. MCCOOK.] I have made no motion to adopt a new rule. Nor have I made any motion to dispense with the customary list. That list is a mere aid to the Speaker or the Chairman; and as an aid I have no objection to it. It has been the universal practice in this House to have such a list, not only within the last ten years but for the last forty years. I had the honor to sit in this House over thirty years ago; and we had then precisely the same custom as now; but this list was regarded merely as an aid to the Chair, not as imperatively binding upon him; the Chair never regarded it except at his own will and pleasure.

And now the reason why I make this motion is because the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole has communicated the fact that he will regard the rule absolutely, or rather the custom under the rule. I do not mean the chairman of this particular committee which is about to be formed, but the chairman of the past committee; and I have every reason to know that the chairman of the committee about to be formed will administer the duties of the Chair in that way; that he will treat the list as an absolute direction to him, so that no man on this floor can take it unless he takes it in the order in which his name stands upon that list. It thus becomes a rule, and as a rule I think it a bad one.

As a suggestion to the Chair I have no objection to it at all. Therefore my motion was that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole should be instructed to govern himself by the rules of the House; no more, no less. He will have the same discretion as the Speaker has in the House, and he will be held to his proper responsibility for the manner in which he discharges that duty.

I need not say to this House that any Speaker or any Chairman who sat there and recognized partially one side of the House rather than the other would lose the confidence and the respect of the House. We have no fear of any such thing like that suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee. Any Chairman, any Speaker, is bound by the rules of the House to recognize the member who first rises, subject always to this discretion of recognizing either side of the House or recognizing the chairmen of committees who have the responsibility of particular measures then pending.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let me ask the gentleman from Maryland a question. What is that list worth if you execute rigidly Rule 59?

Mr. McLANE. It is worth much, and for forty or fifty years it has been the practice of this House, so the Speaker or Chairman should know who wished to speak. It is only a suggestion to him I say, and I have no objection to it as a suggestion. Vote as you please on the proposition, but at least understand what it is. My motion is that the Chairman shall be governed by the rules of the House; no more, no less. That is the motion I have made, and on it I want to have a vote of the House. I hope the gentleman from New York will not move to refer it to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. COX. I do not want to refer it. I am perfectly willing to vote.

Mr. FINLEY. Is it in order for the House to restrict the Chairman of the committee to observe any particular rules? Is it not the duty of the Chair to observe the rules?

Mr. McLANE. It is perfectly within the power of this House to instruct the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. If this resolution makes any change in a custom of the House, establishes any different order of proceeding, it ought to have consideration by the Committee on Rules. If it does not, if it is no new guide to the Chairman or the committee, then it is unnecessary.

Now, I agree that this is a delicate question. You can hardly change the present arrangement without infringing upon the rights of the Speaker, the necessary rights which he must have and must exercise. I know it has been the custom to put the names down on a list, although following that list sometimes works hardships to members. Preparing a new list beforehand, before the chairman is appointed, and having names entered upon it, sometimes before it is known whether the House will go into Committee of the Whole and who will be its chairman, evidently works sometimes wrong. For instance, in this last session, I among others found fifty to sixty names on the list of speakers in the Committee of the Whole so that I was not reached at all. A good many others were, however, reached and had their opportunity. When I came to look for the list this time I found seventy or eighty names upon it, while my name is not upon it at all. Other gentlemen are upon it who have the same right I have and somewhere some one of them will give me some of his time, I have no doubt, if I should desire to speak upon the question. If this resolution is acted on at all it should go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MONEY. It is immaterial to me whether the rule or the custom under the rule shall be observed, but I do insist on one thing, and that is, that if the rule is to prevail it shall be observed, and if the custom is to prevail of having a list that also shall be observed. I say this because in a late discussion gentlemen whose names were upon the list in the hands of the Chairman were not recognized in the order in which they were enrolled there. The Chairman recognized gentlemen at his own pleasure without any regard to the rule and without any regard to the custom. That is what I object to. I have as much right to the attention of this House as any other man on this floor, and I say my name was on that list for five minutes only, (which were denied me by the objection of the gentleman from Michigan,) and I never had the opportunity of getting that five minutes because the gentleman who occupied the chair at that time chose to recognize before me gentlemen who were not down on the list at all. And this has become the custom until gentlemen on this floor are simply at the mercy of the gentleman who happens to occupy that chair. Now, I object to that. He should either follow the rule or he should drop the rule and follow the custom—it is immaterial to me which—but one or the other should be observed in fairness to men who have constituencies to represent here. And I do object, and shall object, and, if necessary, shall go further than I do to-day in objecting to being ruled off the floor by the arbitrary power of the gentleman who occupies the chair. I insist on either the rule or the custom being observed. Having equal rights here, we should have an equal hearing in the House.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say a word in reference to this motion. I entered the Hall as the gentleman from Maryland was addressing the House, and I understand that this question comes up as a question of privilege in reference to the construction which should be placed upon the rules of the House, and especially how far Rule 59 shall govern the Speaker when debate is progressing in the House upon any subject-matter before it, and how far the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, upon any question which the House may be considering in committee, shall be governed by that rule and by general parliamentary law.

I think there can be no question, Mr. Speaker, that Rule 59, which I believe has already been read in the hearing of the House, plainly indicates that when these rules were adopted it was the purpose of the members of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States to conform to general parliamentary law with reference to the conduct of the debate upon any question pending before it; and I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the custom of allowing the occupant of the chair to indicate by a list of names upon his table who shall be entitled to the floor has grown up here within the past few years in violation of this rule and in violation of the general parliamentary law which is intended to facilitate rather than to restrict debate. The operation of it, as we who have been here during the last two or three Congresses have witnessed, has been to give to the first twenty, thirty, or forty gentlemen whose names happened to be on the list the right to debate every question which comes before this House, whether the body presided over by the Speaker or the Committee of the Whole presided over by its Chairman. I say this is a custom rather to be honored in the breach than in the observance, and that the time has come when the House ought to direct the occupant of the chair in this matter. I am very well aware, and I say it with all respect to the present occupant of the Speaker's chair, that he found this custom in existence when he was elected to the Speakership, and that he finds it still in existence when he is re-elected to the Speakership, but I say it is a custom which has grown up in violation not only of the specific Rule No. 59, which is to govern the proceedings in this House, but that it is in violation of general parliamentary law with regard to the conduct of debate.

We have all observed the fact, who have been here for the last two or three Congresses, that under the operation of the method of debate in this House, as now conducted, the floor of the House, which should be the common right and privilege of every member speaking for his constituency when he can obtain it under the forms of the conduct of business which have prevailed here for the last few Congresses, has been peddled out, if I may so speak, by the reporter of a bill, whether the chairman or other member of a committee, in accordance with his own fancy as to who should occupy it. The consequence has been that one or two committees have had—and I may say that one committee of this House, the Appropriations Committee, which has become the absorbing committee, has had—the right to take the floor on the first day of a Congress when its bill is reported, and to indicate by arbitrary action on the part of its chairman who shall have the floor. When I say this I do not refer to any gentleman holding that position during the last two Congresses. But the custom has grown up that either the chairman of the committee which reports the bill or the member of the committee who has the bill in charge indicates in what way the control of the floor shall be farmed out to the particular individuals he may indicate. I say this is a wrong practice under the rule. This is a violation of the rules of the House, and not of the rules only, but it is a violation of the great right of debate under the universal parliamentary law as it is understood in all deliberative bodies which are seeking to investigate questions of great interest for the people. I say it violates those general parliamentary laws in thus attempting to restrict debate.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman in what way the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations farms out the floor of the House, except during the hour to which he is himself entitled?

Mr. HOOKER. In this, Mr. Speaker, that when the chairman of a committee makes his report he undertakes to indicate and usually does indicate the time which is to be occupied in the discussion of the matter by an arrangement between this side of the House and the other side of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. There is no farming out the floor of the House in that.

Mr. HOOKER. There is a restriction of debate; and the fact, I take it, is too apparent to be denied.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi will notice that the rules provide that the chairman or the member of a committee reporting a bill has the right to open and close debate, being entitled to one hour for each in a continuing discussion. He has no right to "farm" out anything but that time. But in a protracted debate, under the rule, the member of a committee reporting a bill has one hour to open and another to close.

Mr. HOOKER. But you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, and the distinguished gentleman who was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress is well aware, that under your methods for the conduct of business you absolutely exclude more than two-thirds of the members on this floor from any participation in the debate at all.

That is its practical operation, as has been witnessed by every man who was a member of the Forty-fourth and Forty-fifth Congresses. I say, therefore, that you ought to recur back to the orbit intended by the rules, and that you have no right, by implication or otherwise, to violate them in any form whatever. I say further, that under the operations of the various Chairmen of Committees of the Whole the rules of the House have been violated. We have seen its bad effect at this session during the debate on the Army bill. There were a great many men who wished to express their views on that question, but they found that the debate was in part regulated by those who were fortunate enough to have their names on the list, and they did not see fit to claim any part of the time allotted to others. I say that this is a bad practice. It is not only a violation of the rules of the House, but a violation of parliamentary law governing the subject of debate. I will take occasion here to refer to that author on parliamentary law who has expressed the subject with greater clearness and precision than I can do it. I allude to the following paragraphs in Cushing's Manual:

1532. When a motion is regularly made and seconded and proposed as a question from the Chair, "every member is then at liberty to debate with freedom upon it, and to agree or disagree to it as he may think reasonable" and proper. But, though the latter part of this principle is universally true, as every member may agree or disagree to whatever question is put to the House, the former admits of an exception in regard to those questions which require unanimous consent. Questions of this description, as, for example, on giving leave to withdraw a motion, are not properly debatable, at least on the part of the negative; for, if any one member objects, the question is as effectually negatived as if a majority of the members were opposed to it; so that debate on that side would be a mere waste of time.

1533. The term debate, in its strictest sense, is applicable only to what is said on the one side or the other of a question which the House is to decide by a vote. In a broader sense, it embraces everything which is said in the House by members, whether upon a question pending or in reference to any other proceeding, matter, or business whatever. The rules of order by which the speaking of members is regulated, together with the exceptions to those rules, having relation to debate in its broadest signification, the subject of order in debate is now to be considered in the most extended as well as in the narrowest sense.

1534. It is not necessary in order to render words disorderly that they should be uttered in debate, strictly so called; if used in any parliamentary proceeding, as in making a motion, or answering a question, or stating a fact, or even in reading from a book or paper, they are equally subject to the animadversion of the House, as disorderly. All language not addressed to the House, in a parliamentary course, must be considered as mere noise and disturbance.

1535. When a member desires to address the House, either in reference to a pending question, or for any other purpose, he must first obtain possession of the floor, in the manner already adverted to, when considering the subject of motions. If one member only rises to speak, he, of course, is to be heard. If two or more rise at or about the same time, and claim the attention of the House, the general rule as to which of them shall speak assigns the preference to him who was first up, to be determined by the Speaker of the House. In the application of this rule, however, there are certain other excepted cases in which one member has a right to proceed in preference to others and certain other excepted cases in which, by the indulgence of the House, though not as a matter of right, it is customary to assign the preference on other grounds. The excepted cases of the first kind occur, when the subject, to which a member rises to speak, is one of paramount importance, as a matter of privilege, or a question of order; in which cases he is entitled to be heard in preference to other members. These cases must not be confounded with those where a member merely rises to propose a motion which takes precedence of the motion originally made, in which case he is not entitled of course to preference over other members. The excepted cases of the latter kind are those of, first, the original mover of the proposition, on its being first debated; and, second, when the debate was adjourned. These classes of cases, though established with peculiar reference to the practice of the two houses of the British Parliament, embrace substantially the grounds upon which preferences are usually allowed in awarding the floor in our legislative assemblies, and will constitute the matter of the first section of this chapter, which will be concluded with a second section concerning the general deportment of members in speaking. There are also other grounds upon which preferences are allowed, irrespective of the peculiar character of the parties.

It will therefore be observed that Rule 55 is excepted almost in totidem verbis in the language of the distinguished parliamentarian from whom I have just read. Another thing. This list furnished to the Speaker or the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole of the persons who are to speak on the subject-matter under consideration has a tendency to depopulate your House. It makes the members who feel an interest in the subject-matter of debate but who failed to secure a place on the list think that they are but performing a silent part, and they therefore either turn their backs upon the Speaker or leave their seats, because by the action of the Speaker or the action of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole they have been virtually excluded from any participation in the debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask if the list is not open to every member of the House?

Mr. HOOKER. It is, if the names were put on the list, and we would then be recognized, I suppose, in the order in which they are placed. But the Speaker is very well aware of the fact that about twenty members in this House do nearly all the talking, and that over two-thirds of the members of the House are never heard at all.

The SPEAKER. The question generally arises when the committee is tired of debate, and when it is the desire of the committee or of the House to cut off debate it can be done.

Mr. HOOKER. Generally so; but what I desire is that the member who first catches the Speaker's eye shall be recognized. It is often very difficult for gentlemen on the extreme left to always catch the Speaker's eye. During the recent debate I know of my own knowledge that it was very difficult to catch the Speaker's eye.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be willing to submit the question to the House whether the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] has not frequently got the Speaker's eye. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOOKER. I have one further observation to make. I say that this rule of proceeding destroys the continuity of debate; it destroys virtually that investigation which debate is intended to effect. It prevents that clash of mind with mind which is necessary to elucidate the truth. Heartily sanctioning the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. MCLANE,] I hope the House will enact by positive action that its rules shall be enforced in reference to parliamentary debate on every question.

Mr. HAZELTON. If I understand the custom, if it be a custom, this list has been made up by members going to the Chair or to the Speaker's clerk and registering their names, and having them placed upon the list.

Now I think it is not so much this list as the abuse of the list that has given rise to this debate. I found that when I put my name there my number was 41, and now I am 56 or 57. The names are so put that the first shall be last and the last first. I find that nine names from way down to 50 put to 1, 2, 3, 4, &c.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no such knowledge. The Chair certainly neither put down nor added nor inserted the name of any member.

Mr. HAZELTON. The list shows it. I do not commend or uphold it. It is of that very abuse I am now speaking, and I insist upon a straightforward and honest construction of the rules.

Now, all we want is fair play; that is a jewel always. And those gentlemen who have had so good an opportunity before to be heard ought to be satisfied, even if they should now come behind some of the new members and the humble individuals my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] was talking about a little while ago. All I ask is fair play with the list.

Mr. SCALES. After listening to all this discussion I do not remember to have heard a single practical suggestion made as to a settlement of this matter. And we cannot make any rule with which all the members of the House would be satisfied unless we can make a rule that will give every member an opportunity to be heard who desires to speak. I have arisen simply to move that this whole subject be referred to the Committee on Rules, where it can be considered, matured, and reported to the House, and upon that I call the previous question.

Mr. FORT. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FORT. My inquiry is whether the rule or custom of keeping a list of members who wish to move on Monday for a suspension of the rules, if we are ever again to have a Monday, is included in this motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state for himself——

Mr. MCLANE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCLANE. A motion to adhere to the rules is not a matter which can be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has allowed this motion to be made really by unanimous consent, and it has been discussed. The subject-matter can be referred to the Committee on Rules, and if that is done of course the motion itself would drop.

Mr. SCALES. My motion was that the whole subject-matter be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FORT. Then I want to move an amendment.

Mr. COX. I did not make the motion to refer; the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] made it; but I think it should be adopted.

Mr. FORT. I desire to move an amendment, to except from the motion to refer the rule or custom of keeping a list for motions to suspend the rules on Mondays. I think that ought to remain as it is now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he himself likes the practice of keeping a list, because it relieves him from a great many personal controversies between members as to who shall be first recognized by the Chair. If the Chair has a list he has then something to go by, and in addition he has also an exact knowledge of who desires to speak. The Chair thinks that no real hardship has ever resulted from the practice of keeping a list.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to have the Committee on Rules report some regulation by which we can know what to depend upon in regard to these lists.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already said that he knows nothing about the insertion of names upon the list to which reference has been made. The Chair has given a great deal of reflection to this subject, and has often thought it would perhaps be well to adopt a suggestion which has been made to him. It is that members be recognized by States, and then the delegation from each State, or the Chair, could select the member from the State, so that every State might have an opportunity to be heard in the debate. But the subject is environed with many difficulties. It is one of the unpleasant features of the duties of the Chair to choose who shall be recognized as entitled to speak. This same controversy has continued at periods ever since the adoption of the rule in 1789.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make a remark more in the nature of a suggestion than anything else to the Committee on Rules, if this matter should be referred to them. It is that they inquire whether it would not better meet the case to provide that all the names which may be placed upon any list be written separately on slips or cards and placed in a box, and when the time comes to speak one of those names be drawn from that box. In that way all would have an equal chance—the chance of the lot—of obtaining the floor.

The SPEAKER. Some member might not be drawn; for instance, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] might not be drawn.

Mr. CONGER. "The gentleman from Michigan" has not his name on that list.

The SPEAKER. The Chair always desires to recognize the gentleman from Michigan when he can.

Mr. CONGER. Voluntarily, I hope?

Mr. NEWBERRY. The suggestion made by the Speaker is perhaps the very ground of the complaint which is made, that the Speaker does always recognize somebody that he perhaps ought not to. I do not refer to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] particularly, [laughter.] But the complaint is that the Speaker selects whom he chooses, and the rest must submit, as of course we all do.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] forgot that Mr. Marshall, of Kentucky, when he was in the House said that when the rule was in force of permitting the Speaker to recognize the one who first caught his eye, the fact was that the very last one who caught the Speaker's eye was the one who thought he ought to be recognized.

Mr. STEELE. If the list on the Speaker's table is to control it will not give an opportunity to modest men like the member from North Carolina who is now addressing the House, and the gentleman from the Kiskiminetas district of Pennsylvania.

A MEMBER. And the Conemaugh district.

Mr. STEELE. Yes, and the Conemaugh district, and other gentlemen who have shown by their conduct that they believe there is a great deal of wisdom in the old saying that it is well to "remain at Jericho until your beard is grown." As is seen by members, I have not much myself. [Laughter.]

The general parliamentary law ought to govern us. Very clearly there is no parliamentary law known anywhere which recognizes the practice prevailing here since I have been a member of this House. It is a miserable practice, one which, as my friend from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] says, is much more honored in the breach than in the observance.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] moves that the whole subject-matter be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to make a single suggestion. I suggest that the Committee on Rules consider also the question how two hundred and ninety-two members of this House can talk for an hour each in twenty-five hours. Perhaps the committee may devise some means by which that can be done.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will decide this question for itself without reference to any committee. The simple question is whether we are to adhere to our rules in one form or another, and I hope that no delay or red-tapism will be applied to this simple proposition to conform to the rules of the House, and that the House will decide the question for itself.

Mr. O'NEILL. I suppose that this discussion or conversation has arisen from the fact that we are about to take up in Committee of the Whole the legislative appropriation bill. Now I do not think there will be at all difficulty for gentlemen who have not already spoken upon the Army bill to get an opportunity to speak upon this bill. The great orators of the House who have spoken on the Army bill will of course give way to those members who have not yet been heard; and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole will not allow to members who have already spoken a priority over those who have not taken part in the debates. I think this is a solution of the whole difficulty: let those who have not spoken on the Army bill come in first on the legislative bill.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, is not this debate proceeding by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The proposition came in by unanimous consent, and is being discussed in consequence. The Chair will remark that he really thinks the House ought to decide this matter; but of course it can be decided upon a report from the Committee on Rules. The rule now in question was originally adopted in the First Congress, in 1789, and has continued in force from that day to this.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to say only a few words. I agree, Mr. Speaker, with a great deal that has been said by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] about the proceedings under the rule. I shall therefore vote to refer this question to the Committee on Rules, that they may consider whether the rule upon this subject should be modified or not, and if modified how. Let the subject be considered by that committee. Whether I should vote for a modification of the rule, I am not prepared to say. Since I first became a member of this House, in 1843, this subject of getting the floor has been a matter of complaint. The Speaker of the House and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole must exercise a discretion; and it is an arbitrary discretion. Where there are fifteen or twenty members all rising at once, it is impossible for the Speaker to say who first addressed the Chair. Throughout the term of my experience in this House, the discretion of the Speaker or the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole has determined this question.

Mr. MCLANE. That is the way I want it decided—by the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let the whole matter be referred to the Committee on Rules. Let that committee determine whether or not, after these many years of experience, it is better to make a change in the rule upon this subject. It may be that some better plan can be suggested. It may be that some members would prefer the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan, that the right of the floor should be decided by lottery. I am not in favor of that proposition; but let the committee hear suggestions from all sides and make their report. I hope the question will be taken and the matter referred to that committee, to be reported upon in connection with other matters now before them in relation to the proceedings of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] moves that the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire what modification, if any, is necessary to govern recognition in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and also in the House under the fifty-ninth rule.

Mr. HOOKER. Before the question is put on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, whom I understand to be in favor of the proposition as it came from the gentleman from Maryland, I desire to say that I have never yet understood the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole was not as much bound to observe the rules of the House as the Speaker is; and this is a motion simply to enforce the existing rule and to add to its force. The Committee on Rules, therefore, if this matter be referred to them will have no function to perform other than to report what the five members constituting that committee think upon the subject of the enforcement of this rule. They would not be able, I respectfully submit, to enlighten the House by any investigation of facts or by any knowledge they might convey by their report as to the modes and methods of procedure which have heretofore been in practice. This is a simple naked proposition to enforce the rules of the House as they now stand; and I think the House is as ready to act upon the question now as it will be when it shall have received protracted and elaborate consideration from the Committee on Rules. I submit that the House ought to take this matter into its own hands.

I have stood here, Mr. Speaker, Congress after Congress, and seen the power of the House virtually centralized in certain great committees, and I for one am tired of it. I want to see each member, as he rises on this floor to utter the voice of the constituency he represents, recognized in his right to be heard under the rules. Whatever may be said about the policy of the existing practice in order to expedite legislation, I sometimes think it would be better if legislation were not so hasty. We should not then have occasion so often to correct mistakes such as have been brought to the attention of the House this morning and such as were noticed in the last session of Congress. Let the powers of the House be divided among the great committees constituting it, giving to the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee of Ways and Means the prominence which the rules intended they should have, but not the exclusive, absolute control of all matters of legislation. Let those committees have, I say, the position and importance which legitimately and properly belong to them. Upon one of those committees is devolved the duty of looking after the ways and means for carrying on the Government. And that "ways and means," Mr. Speaker, is a significant term; it means the mode and method and manner of taxation by which the money of the people shall be taken from the pockets of the people for the purpose of being used in supporting the Government. The other committee very properly occupies this position in the House having the right to determine in what mode, in what way, and to what extent the money of the people, thus collected together by the devices of the legislation adopted by the Ways and Means Committee, shall be paid out in the support of the Government. But I say for the purpose of practical legislation your Military Committee, and your Naval Committee, and your Indian Committee, and every other committee of the House, ought not only to be intrusted with the duty of considering the questions in reference to the mode and management of the particular subjects referred to them, but they ought to consider as well the requisite appropriations belonging to the particular branch of the governmental service confided to them, leaving, however, the general appropriation bills to be considered by the Committee on Appropriations. I say this proposition is a plain and simple one, and that is the enforcement of the rule as to the method of debate; and the House is as ready to decide it now as when it shall be considered and reported back to the House from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. PRICE rose.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to inquire whether the House was not in the process of executing the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] when the debate sprang up, and whether it not now proceeding by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from North Carolina would be debatable, but he demanded the previous question upon it.

Mr. ATKINS. And the House was actually dividing when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] interrupted that division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is correct. The Chair, however, has been desirous of allowing the widest latitude of debate on this subject because it concerns the personal privileges of members in occupying the floor for debate on pending questions.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to make a suggestion to the House. The great trouble in this matter arises from the fact there are more gentlemen upon the floor than can get time to speak. When the list is made I suppose it is all right and proper, but the trouble is it is made out weeks before the bill comes before the committee and long before most of the members have known anything about it; and as my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] has suggested, such young and modest members as himself and myself by such an arrangement are overslaughed and we do not get our appropriate share of the floor. I suggest whether we cannot harmonize the matter in this way: limit the debate on the bill now in Committee of the Whole, because it involves very important questions; say that no speech shall be longer than twenty minutes; and instead of allowing members to speak an hour each, limiting each speech to twenty minutes will give a larger number of members the chance to be heard before the debate closes. If I am in order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now submit the question. He has allowed ample debate because the question relates to the privilege of members, and those who wish to speak on it ought to have the opportunity of being heard. Does the gentleman from North Carolina insist on the demand for the previous question?

Mr. SCALES. I do not.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER,] in discussing the proposition now before the House, has seen fit to refer to the privileges which the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations have on the floor. The question before the House is as to the enforcement of the rule in reference to the order of debate. The particular privileges given to those committees have been conferred by the rules of the House, and are not dependent upon custom. Therefore, all reference to those two committees in that regard is entirely outside of the question before the House. It has nothing to do with it.

Again, the gentleman says the only question is whether the rule shall be enforced or not. Now, sir, I submit that there is a good deal more than that naked question involved. For many years the operation of the rule under debate has been found objectionable, so objectionable indeed that this House has adopted a custom which has prevailed against the rule itself. That custom has been running through a period of years. It has been so long sanctioned that the rule itself, as against the custom, has in a measure become obsolete. It does not appear to me under the circumstances, therefore, that the Committee on Rules should consider the matter as to why the rule was abandoned, why this custom has obtained, and all the reasons which led to it, and then we could act on the report of that committee to the House. We should not dispose of this matter in the hasty manner proposed.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that no such restriction will be put on debate on the coming bill as has been suggested by my friend from Iowa. When it was proposed to limit debate on the Army bill I concurred in the opinion you then expressed, that time would be ultimately saved by allowing debate to run to its natural termination; and I hope now that the House without a formal vote, or rather that the members, will conclude that such will be the wiser course on the pending bill. The discussion had on the Army bill was pretty animated, and, judging by my correspondence and that portion of the correspondence of other gentlemen which I have seen, the temper on the part of the people of the country and the fears of the more timid of them have been aroused by the temper of the debate; and I believe it will be well to let discussion have free course, so that when all who desire to speak shall have been heard the country will see that members on this floor are not preparing for a coming rebellion or to take part in the suppression of one, and may thus be restored to a sound nervous condition. Can gentlemen speak on the important questions which will arise, such as the abolition of supervisors of elections, &c., with anything like a fair statement of premises and argument, in twenty minutes? No, sir.

And if there are only to be flashes of temper, only brilliant appeals to the passions and the fears of the people, why, sir, they can be as well condensed into ten minutes as into twenty minutes; and I should say if we are going to restrict the time that it be to ten minutes. But if there are to be statements of premises, argument, illustration, and conclusion given, I have no fear that an extended debate will not have great effect in tranquilizing the country.

We have nothing to do but to discuss these two bills and their riders. It is very evident that a majority of the House composed of gentlemen on both sides are determined that there shall be no Monday session in which to initiate legislation; in fact that all legislation is to be confined to these two bills.

Now, let us fight it out and let the country know how thoroughly Pickwickian is the cry of revolution on the one hand and the announcement on the other that bridges have been burned. [Applause.]

Mr. REAGAN. I shall sustain the motion made by the gentleman from Maryland, and trust that in sustaining it the practice of the House may receive in the respect referred to the construction which that gentleman places upon it. If the list which is made out is kept up I would have it only as suggestive to the presiding officer that gentlemen wish to speak upon the question. There are proprieties of debate that are denied by the arbitrary list. I understand now that this practice of having a list is regarded as imperative upon whoever may be presiding at the time the debate is to go on, and it is denied by members of the House and the Speaker or the person presiding in Committee of the Whole that he should depart from that list. But we know that when bills are reported to the House, though there may be two lists of members who are to speak, yet the proprieties of debate require the presiding officer to assign the floor in the first instance to the gentlemen who compose the committee for the discussion of the particular measure, those whose business it has been especially to inform themselves upon the subject-matter before the House or the committee. There may be other reasons to cause the presiding officer to put some member forward in a discussion, for the purpose of eliciting special information or because the particular member might be so situated with reference to the question before the House as to make it proper for him to discuss it.

We will get no rule either by determination of the House or by the action of the Committee on Rules which can give satisfaction to all the members of the House, which shall give to each member the privilege of speaking at any time when he desires to speak. That is an impossibility, and it is useless for us to attempt to overcome that difficulty. If, therefore, we determine to adhere to the rules of the House and allow the list to be made as a suggestion to the presiding officer of who is to speak, but with the distinct understanding that he is not confined in assigning the floor to the list, then we have, it seems to me, accomplished everything we can reasonably expect to accomplish on this subject.

But besides that, Mr. Speaker, I feel there has been ground of complaint in the way in which these lists have been made up. I know, sir, that upon the bill which is now before the House there were two lists made up—one made up by the gentleman who it was understood was to preside in the committee, and another made up as ordinarily by the Clerk at the Speaker's desk. If there is to be a list as a suggestion to the Speaker or the presiding officer in the Committee of the Whole, there should be a distinct and clear practice that that list shall at some particular time be open for members to put their names upon it, and it should never be made up until the time or about the time the discussion is to take place.

The SPEAKER. It is always open. The moment a subject is introduced to the attention of the House or reported from a committee, then gentlemen are in the habit of coming up and inserting their names in the list to speak on that subject. That has been the practice for years and years.

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection to that practice; but what I urge is that it ought not to be an arbitrary rule to control the discretion of the presiding officer.

Mr. SCALES. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Several members called for the regular order.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask the Chair what is the precise question?

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the proposition that the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire what alteration, if any, there should be in Rule 59, touching the recognition of members to speak by the Speaker of the House and the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MITCHELL rose.

The SPEAKER. The main question having been ordered the question is not debatable.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not rise to debate. I wish to ask the Speaker how we shall stand if this resolution is adopted? Shall we act under the rule laid down in the Manual, or will the custom which has been under discussion to-day still be followed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that Rule 59 will be observed, the list at the same time being kept in view.

Mr. PHISTER. It is a matter of some importance at what time the committee shall report.

The SPEAKER. They have the right to report at any time.

Mr. HOOKER. That is the rule, but they never report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks they will. They will report if he has any influence with the committee.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolution, there were—ayes 77, noes 81.

Mr. SCALES. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCALES and Mr. MCLANE were appointed.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask that the resolution be reported.

The SPEAKER. It has not been reduced to writing. It is, that the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire what change, if any, is advisable as to Rule 59, which relates to the recognition of members to speak in the House and also in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 80.

So the resolution was adopted.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. ATKINS.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MULDROW. I desire before that motion is put to speak to a personal explanation.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] in the early part of to-day's proceedings referred to a letter which he had received from the editor of the Okolona States, and in that connection he said, as I understood, that his recollection of the statement I made in regard to the editors of that paper on last Tuesday was that they represented no respectable element of the Mississippi democracy. What I did say at that time, Mr. Speaker, as appears from the RECORD, was that that paper did not represent the sentiment of the democracy of Mississippi. It was not my desire to cast a personal reflection on Colonel Harper. I desire to say that he is regarded as an extremist in politics there, and that his paper is no proper exponent of the Mississippi democracy.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. Before submitting the motion that the House——

YELLOW FEVER.

Mr. KING. Before the gentleman from Tennessee submits his motion, I desire to ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy of the United States be requested to furnish this House with all available information regarding the breaking out of yellow fever on the United States ship Plymouth, and what sanitary measures, if any, had been carried out to prevent the breaking out and spread of said disease on board of said ship.

Mr. CONGER. I hope that there will be no objection to that; that is a matter of necessity.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. Before submitting the motion that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the legislative, executive, and judicial bill, I desire to state that a good many gentlemen on both sides of the House have requested me to report this bill upon the basis of the conference reports of the two Houses as nearly as possible. I will state to the House that the entire money part of the bill—the appropriations—were agreed to by the conference committees of the two Houses, or very nearly so; there are several subjects, however, upon which we did not agree; and in respect to those and these parts upon which we do not agree, the bill conforms to the bill as it passed the House; but in regard to all other particulars, where the conference did agree, the bill conforms to the conference report. I deemed it proper to make this statement to the House.

Mr. Speaker, in conducting this bill I shall not attempt to apply the "gag" even if I had the power to do it. I am very conscious of the fact that no one man rules this House, not even the Speaker. We are governed by the rules, which the House prescribes for its own government, but I thought I would suggest that, before going into Committee of the Whole this morning, perhaps it would be proper to dispense with general debate until we reach the amendments, which are generally styled political amendments; go through with the entire bill, the appropriations by paragraphs, under the five-minute rule, and when we get in Committee of the Whole to return to these political amendments if we have completed the balance of the bill.

Mr. COX. I would suggest to the gentleman that he dispense with the formal reading of the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I shall make that motion when we are in Committee of the Whole; that would be the proper time, but this is the time for the House to fix such limitation to general debate as it sees proper, and until we reach this clause of the bill, so far as I am concerned, I shall make no suggestion to the limitation of debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman that these objectionable sections might be passed over, for general debate, and that we go on with all the money part of the bill, coming under the five-minute rule. I think that would be agreeable to this side of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not understand the proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. I agree to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ATKINS. I would suggest that we have a distinct understanding that there shall be no general debate on the bill, except on that part relating to the supervisors, the test oath, and the deputy marshals.

Mr. GARFIELD. We will agree to that.

The SPEAKER. The question, as the Chair understands it, is this, and he desires to be corrected if he be wrong: the bill at first in Committee of the Whole shall be proceeded with under the five-minute rule until the Committee of the Whole shall come to that part of the bill mentioned, upon which general debate is wished, and that then general debate shall be under the hour rule.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman, in behalf of the new members of the House who frequently requested me to do it, to call up a resolution about the distribution of documents, and I ask that the resolution be acted upon now.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not call up the resolution for my own benefit; it is for new members.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to make a suggestion before the motion is put, which is that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. I hope before the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole, it will instruct the presiding officer of that committee, whoever he may chance to be, to disregard the list hitherto prepared with reference to a recognition of members on this floor, and that if a list is to be adhered to we shall have a fresh beginning and a fair deal.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope it is not necessary to make such a suggestion as that. The presiding officer of the Committee of the Whole has not yet been announced, and to assume that anybody who may be announced will come here with an old list, or rather with a list made up beforehand, will be a violent assumption which I presume nobody will find any necessity of making.

Mr. HOOKER. I am credibly informed that there is such a list already made; and I am quite as much astonished at it as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] may be.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have never heard of anything of that sort. I want to say just this, and it is the only suggestion I have to make on the subject; to say that no list shall be had would be, I think, oppressive to the presiding officer of the Committee of the Whole, because he ought to have such a thing in order to get at the wishes of the members of the House. Now, to say that a cast-iron order of debate shall be followed without regard to the discretion of the presiding officer is another most manifest absurdity.

The presiding officer in this House, as in all deliberative bodies, is bound to have some regard to the general propriety of affairs. If, for instance, twenty-five men rise at once and claim the floor, the presiding officer is bound to designate the one to be heard according to his discretion. If some one man has been referred to, or the district or State of any man has been referred to, it would manifestly be improper to keep him off the floor for ten hours or more, instead of allowing him at that moment when it is fitting he should reply to have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. HOOKER. And yet the gentleman from Ohio will allow me to say that that is just exactly what was done when we were considering the Army appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot believe that any such course will be followed by the person who may be selected to preside in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ATKINS. I must insist upon my motion that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the legislative appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. With the understanding that the bill shall be considered under the five-minute rule until that portion of it is reached upon which general debate is desired.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the Clerk proceeds to report the bill——

[Several members came up to the Clerk's desk, apparently for the purpose of having their names placed upon the list of persons to speak upon the bill.]

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know if I am right in the inference which I draw that there is a rush upon the present Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to have some sort of understanding about being recognized by him?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires the committee to be in order.

[After a pause.] The present occupant of the chair is advised by the Speaker's clerk that there is here a list embracing the names of some seventy-odd members of this committee. The Chair also is advised of the action taken recently by the House in referring to the Committee on Rules this matter or practice of recognizing members according as their names appear upon the list.

The present occupant of the chair has had nothing to do with the list which has been made, nor has it ever been seen by him. He desires to deal with exact fairness. Acting in the light of the discussion and the action had by the House but a few moments ago, the Chair deems it but fair and proper to recognize such custom as has been in existence for so many years in this House. At the same time he considers it only fair to state to the members of this committee that no list will be recognized by the present occupant of the chair save that which shall be made after his assuming the duties of Chairman of this Committee of the Whole. The list will be recognized by the Chair, as it may be made up from this time, so far as it may be done without dealing unfairly with any one in the conduct of this debate. The Chair, of course, desires it understood that in the conduct of the debate upon the bill now pending before the Committee of the Whole he will endeavor to recognize and accord equal time and opportunity to each side of the House.

[Many members now came up to the Clerk's desk to have their names placed upon the list.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to inquire how this application is to be made for a place upon this list?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize no one until members are seated.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize no member for any purpose until members shall have taken their seats. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that members take their seats; and members in front of the Clerk's desk will retire to their seats.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the Chair recognize the list as it is now being made up?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the list as the Speaker's clerk shall furnish it to him.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. I hope the Chair will maintain order while I propose my point of order, that is, if he can.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] as first entitled to the floor.

Mr. CARLISLE. I understood that the House by its vote this morning referred this whole subject to the Committee on Rules. I suppose what has taken place, and is now taking place, in Committee of the Whole this morning will be subject to change by the action of the Committee on Rules, if that action should be ratified by the House, before we reach the general debate on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair would not hesitate to be guided by any report to be made by the Committee on Rules on this subject if adopted by the House. The Clerk will now report the title of the bill.

Mr. FRYE. I would like to ask the Chair a question. Did I understand the Chair to hold that it is an iron rule that every man whose name is on that list is to be recognized in the order in which the names appear? Was that the statement of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not make any such statement. The Chair stated that under the action taken by the House this morning, and in the absence of any further action, the Chair would not be justified in disregarding a practice which has prevailed for so many years; and that a new list made after this bill was brought into Committee of the Whole for consideration would be accepted by the Chair for his guidance so far as practicable, without working injustice, and while securing the proper alternation between the two sides of the House.

Mr. FRYE. Then the ruling of the Chair was that the practice should be simply as heretofore?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now proceed to read the bill by clauses for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one chief engineer, $1,700; two assistant engineers, $1,200 each; and one laborer, $820; five firemen, at $900 each. And all engineers and others who are engaged in heating and ventilating the House shall be subject to the orders, and in all respects under the direction, of the Architect of the Capitol, subject to the control of the Speaker; and no removal or appointment shall be made except with his approval.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the clause in regard to two assistant engineers and one laborer, so as to read as follows:

Three assistant engineers, $1,200 each; and two laborers, $820 each.

The object of this amendment is to give us three assistant engineers in the heating and ventilating department of this House, and one additional laborer. The Committee on Heating and Ventilation of the House made a report that this additional force was necessary.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. ATKINS. In view of the amendment just adopted, I move to amend the paragraph embraced in lines 141 to 144, so as to read as follows:

For compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary, in the service of the House of Representatives, $197,015.20, namely.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For superintendent of the folding-room, $2,000; three clerks in the folding-room, one at $1,800, and two at $1,200 each; superintendent of the document-room, $2,000; chief assistant in the document-room, at $2,000; document file clerk, $1,400.

Mr. FORT. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph just read the following:

For printing or stamping envelopes or wrappers for speeches or other documents, $100.

Allow me to explain why this amendment is necessary. Members of the House frequently subscribe for a great many different speeches by various gentlemen on a variety of subjects. When these speeches are brought to us in wrappers, it is impossible for us to tell the author and subject of any speech without tearing the wrapper. The superintendent of the folding-room tells me that at a small expense every envelope can be stamped with the subject of the speech and the name of the member making it.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to the amendment. I appreciate its propriety, but I suggest to the gentleman that, in view of the extra amount of labor likely to be thrown upon the folding-room, $100 will not be sufficient.

Mr. FORT. I modify the amendment by making the amount $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. ATKINS. I think that in making the amount $500 the gentleman has probably overreached the mark.

Mr. FORT. Then I will say "$300, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. ATKINS. Very well.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to inquire whether this stamp with the member's name is to be in lieu of the written superscription?

Mr. FORT. The object is that each envelope containing a speech shall be stamped with the subject of the speech and the name of the member making it. For instance, "Speech of Mr. SPRINGER, of Illinois, on finance."

Mr. SPRINGER. Is this intended to take the place of the written frank?

Mr. FORT. No, sir; it is simply an addition to the present printed matter.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not understand that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] covers so much as he alludes to in his remarks. I doubt whether it will secure the action he speaks of.

Mr. FORT. I think it will. The superintendent of the folding-room will have the envelopes printed in this manner if we provide the necessary means.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For twenty-one clerks to committees, at $6 per day during the session, $26,712.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend the paragraph just read so as to read:

For twenty-four clerks to committees, at $6 per day during the session, $30,543.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For labor in folding books, speeches, and pamphlets, the following employés are hereby authorized to be appointed by the superintendent of the folding-room, namely: One foreman, $1,500; sixteen laborers, $11,520; one messenger, $1,200; one page, $600; one laborer; in all, $15,480.

Mr. CRAVENS. I move to amend by inserting before the words "one page" the words "one folder in the sealing-room, $1,200."

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a point of order. I submit there is no law authorizing this appropriation.

Mr. CRAVENS. I will state that this amendment is in the exact language of the last annual appropriation act. Moreover, I submit that there is no law obligatory upon this House so as to prevent it from employing whom it pleases.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CRAVENS] desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. CRAVENS. I have said all I desire to say.

The CHAIRMAN. From the assurance given by the gentleman from Tennessee the Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. CLYMER. I move, in lines 265 and 266, to strike out "sixteen laborers" and to insert "twenty laborers."

Mr. ATKINS. I think it will be necessary to make that increase in the folding-room of the House.

Mr. CLYMER. The superintendent of the folding-room informed me the other day that from the amount of documents coming in upon him and likely to come in during the next month and at the beginning of the next fiscal year the present amount of laborers would be insufficient. Now, if the committee agrees to this amendment, I will move to include, instead of $11,520, the proper appropriation to cover the increase.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 6.

The CHAIRMAN. If no further count be demanded the amendment will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HUNTON. I now move to insert "$14,440" instead of "$11,520."

Mr. ATKINS. I trust that the House will not make a discrimination in the employés of the folding-room.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Is not the intention in this bill to harmonize the pay of the new employés with the old, and would the amendment of my colleague accomplish that result?

Mr. HUNTON. It is perfectly right.

Mr. ATKINS. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that after consideration I agree the amendment is correct.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAMFORD. Mr. Chairman, there were votes in the negative which were not counted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had decided the amendment agreed to. If there be no objection, the Chair will again put the question to the committee.

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For hire of horses and mail-wagons for carrying the mails, $5,500.
For furniture, and repairs of the same, $10,000.

Mr. FORT. The Clerk has just read for hire of mail-wagons, $5,500; and for repairs of the same, $10,000. Now, does that mean repairs of mail-wagons?

Mr. CONGER. No; it means for furniture.

Mr. FORT. Furniture of mail-wagons or what? If it is for furniture for mail-wagons it seems to be a most extravagant appropriation.

Mr. ATKINS. It means for furniture for the House, and is the usual form in which the appropriation has been heretofore made.

Mr. FORT. Is it for furniture for the House of Representatives?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir; for furniture for the House of Representatives and for repair of furniture. It is the usual appropriation.

Mr. FORT. Then, to make it clear, I move to include "for repairs of furniture at the Capitol."

Mr. ATKINS. This is not for furniture and repairs of furniture for the Capitol, but for the House of Representatives.

Mr. BAKER. This is for the necessary furniture and repairs of furniture for the House of Representatives; for that portion of the Capitol under the jurisdiction of the House; and there is no necessity for changing the phraseology of the bill. By referring back to page 6 the gentleman from Illinois will see that all these appropriations refer to the House of Representatives, and the words "for furniture and repairs of the same" refer back to the House of Representatives. The appropriation here is for furniture and for repairs of the same for the House of Representatives. It is usual and has been embraced in the bill for a long series of years.

Mr. FORT. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For newspapers and stationery for members of the House of Representatives, officers of the House, and committees of the House, including $6,000 for stationery for the use of the committees and officers of the House, $43,300.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move to strike that out. It includes an item for newspapers and stationery for members. I should like to know what it means.

Mr. ATKINS. The only way in which I can reply to the gentleman is by reading the language of the appropriation. It is for newspapers and stationery for members of the House of Representatives, officers of the House, and committees of the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. I modify my motion, then, and move to strike out "$43,300," leaving "$6,000," which is the amount for stationery for committees.

Mr. ATKINS. This includes $125, Mr. Chairman, usually voted for years and years past under the law to every member of the House and every member of the Senate to furnish them with stationery and to pay for newspapers, and although it does not say so it is intended, since the franking privilege has been taken away, to cover the postage of members. I expect after the gentleman has been in Congress, as I hope he will be, for several years he will find this $125, which is intended to cover these little expenses, will not more than do so. That is my judgment. After careful consideration of the subject it has been found to amount to about $125 to each member and Senator. I will say to the gentleman that some Senators have stated their expenses for these items amount to a much larger sum. It has been agreed, however, that $125 will be a fair average for Senators and members of the House. I care nothing about it so far as I am concerned.

Mr. McMILLIN's amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following paragraph:

For twenty-eight pages, while actually employed, (including one riding-page and one telegraph-page,) at $2.50 per day each, and for hire of horses, ($500,) $15,340.

Mr. STEPHENS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 292 strike out "twenty-eight" and insert "twenty-nine."

Mr. ATKINS. What is the object of the amendment?

Mr. STEPHENS. The number twenty-nine has been agreed to by Congress. One page was added by a special resolution.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well; I will not object.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS. Now fix the amount.

Mr. ATKINS. The total will be attended to, by consent.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following, under the head "Public Printer:"

For contingent expenses of his office, namely: For stationery, postage, advertising, traveling expenses, horses and wagons, and miscellaneous items, $2,000.

Mr. FINLEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of the paragraph which has just been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 312 add the following:
The Public Printer shall in his report to Congress include an itemized statement of the expenditure of said sum.

Mr. FINLEY. I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will agree to that.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following paragraph:

Commissioner of Customs:
For Commissioner of Customs, $4,000; deputy commissioner, $2,250; two chiefs of division, at $2,100 each; two clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; ten clerks of class 2; nine clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; one assistant messenger; and one laborer; in all, $49,630.

Mr. DIBRELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 510 add the following:
And that hereafter no collector at any port of entry or district shall be allowed a salary greater than the receipts at said port of entry, nor shall the expenses of collecting at any port exceed the gross receipts of the same.

Mr. DIBRELL. The adoption of that amendment will save annually about $200,000. There are various ports of entry in the country that collect four dollars, fifty dollars, or a hundred dollars where the expenses are over a thousand dollars. At the port of Galveston, Texas, there are collected $70,000 of customs at an expense of $130,000. This amendment proposes to bring the expenditures at each port within the receipts.

Mr. ATKINS. I sympathize with my colleague [Mr. DIBRELL] in his desire for economy in this matter, and I have thought of this frequently myself. But, sir, I am not prepared to say that it is a wise amendment, for this reason: there are a great many ports where very little is collected, it is true, and the expenses of collection exceed the amounts collected; but, sir, it is important that those ports should have collectors and persons to watch the smuggling vessels as they come in with goods, otherwise the Government would be cheated out of a great deal of its customs dues.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask my friend from Tennessee if this amendment has not been offered several times in past years, and whether it has not been uniformly rejected for the reason which has just been stated.

Mr. DIBRELL. The amendment was offered last year and the point of order was made that a bill to the same effect was pending before the House, and it was ruled out on that ground.

Mr. ATKINS. As the gentleman from Georgia states, this matter was more or less considered by the Committee on Appropriations, and a communication was addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury inviting his opinion as to the propriety of the substance of the amendment which the gentleman from Tennessee has offered; and the Secretary gave his opinion that it would be unwise; that while it seemed to be wrong in itself to pay out at a port of entry more money for the collection of revenues than the Government derived, yet at the same time it was necessary that officers be paid in order to watch the smuggling vessels which come from other ports into our ports and bring in goods and pay no duty. That is the whole of it. The House can dispose of the amendment as it thinks proper.

Mr. REAGAN. While I am satisfied that there are custom-houses which ought to be abolished because they are useless, yet the rule that they shall pay their own expenses will not operate well for this reason: the imports of the United States are largely received in a very few cities. The principal portion of our imports comes into New York; and yet the coastwise trade into other ports that pay but little import dues is very large. I do not know, for instance, that the office at Galveston is conducted with economy. I do not know how that is. The amount of receipts at that port from customs was mentioned by the gentleman from Tennessee, but perhaps he did not extend his inquiries so far as to ascertain that the commerce of that city, including its coastwise commerce, is over $30,000,000.

Mr. DIBRELL. I do not think it is necessary to expend a hundred and thirty thousand dollars to pay a lot of office-holders.

Mr. REAGAN. I think the gentleman might have selected a number of other places which might have better illustrated what he had in view.

Mr. DIBRELL. There is one office in Maine which collects four and a half dollars and costs $1,400.

Mr. FORT. I think this amendment is in the right direction but I do not know whether it should pass in its present form or not. It has always occurred to me where ports of entry are in the interior and not on the frontier that the Government has found it necessary to pay out more money than they collect. I believe there are several ports of entry in Missouri and perhaps some in the State I live in which are a thousand miles from the boundary line and which collect no duties; not even enough to pay their postage. The city of Quincy is a port of entry in my State. There are many ports of entry in the interior that collect nothing. The object of having these ports, I understand, is to prevent smuggling; but how they can do any good in that way I have not been able to see. How the Government should persist in maintaining these ports of entry in the interior and keeping officers there at great expense, I cannot understand. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is worthy of consideration, and that, if found to be practicable, it should be adopted.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] is mistaken when he speaks about ports of entry in the interior of the country. There may be some ports of entry on some of the most important rivers of the country.

Mr. FORT. I presume there is one at Saint Paul.

Mr. DUNNELL. Undoubtedly, for that is the only port of entry in the State.

Mr. DIBRELL. The gentleman from Illinois is right. There are two on the Missouri at which about $400 is paid but where we do not realize a cent of revenue.

Mr. DUNNELL. This whole question has been brought before the Committee on Commerce, and while it was plausible that officers may be abolished where the pay was less than the receipts, yet when the whole question was examined we saw how important it was that a just and correct enforcement of the revenue laws should be made, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. REED. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment which has been offered is founded on a miscalculation of the duties of a collector of customs. If I understand aright the gentleman who introduced it made reference to some customs officers in Maine where larger payments are paid than the gross receipts of the office. I have no doubt that that is true in the instances which the gentleman mentioned, and true in many other instances, but the duties of the customs officers are not confined to receiving duties upon importations alone. The duties of a custom-house officer include the keeping out of goods that do not pay the duty, and on a long sea-coast like that of Maine there will have to be a great many officers stationed along the coast to a very great extent to keep out imports that do not pay the duty.

The Secretary of the Treasury has sent agents there who have repeatedly traversed the coast of Maine seeking an opportunity to reduce the expenses; and there are cases in the State of Maine in which the expenses have been largely reduced, and where, if the custom-houses were abolished, the revenue would be defrauded to an amount beyond the saving now suggested. It is said that there are too many ports of entry and too many collectors. That may be; and if the Secretary of the Treasury were allowed the privilege of consolidating them and preventing this whole evil I would be ready to vote for it, but I doubt very much if it would result in any decrease of expenditures. I hope the House will remember that there is a second part of the duties of a custom-house officer, and I hope the House will not cut off officers who are absolutely necessary to the Government.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 25, noes 63.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

Second Auditor:

For Second Auditor, $3,600; deputy auditor, $2,250; five chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; six clerks of class 4; twenty-five clerks of class 3; fifty-five clerks of class 2; thirty-five clerks of class 1; eight clerks, at $1,000 each; two assistant messengers, and eight laborers; in all, $200,370.

Mr. NEAL. I move to amend that clause by striking out the word "eight," in line 525, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "eighteen;" so that it will read "eighteen clerks at $1,000 each."

My object in offering this amendment is this: there are scores of applications from those who served in the Mexican war, and in order to enable the Second Auditor of the Treasury to dispose of these claims promptly and satisfy the claims of those who fought in that war, it is necessary that he should have an increase of clerical force.

I presume that there is not a member of this House on either side of it who has not received some letters from soldiers who fought in that war, and asking how they should receive the compensation voted to them. It is impossible that they should do this unless the force is increased.

Although there might not be a great many of these claims, yet every man who was in the war and has received information that he is entitled to the extra pay writes to the Second Auditor for information. This requires an examination to be made on the subject of whether he is or is not entitled to the money, and also the addressing of a letter to him showing him just what his rights are. This will save him from the claim agents, who are like vultures in this country, using all their endeavors to get a portion of their claims, and in order that they might get a large portion of the money which has been voted by the last Congress.

Mr. ATKINS. I dislike very much to oppose any necessary appropriations or any increase in the clerical force of the Department, but we appropriate in this bill all that was asked for; and if the gentlemen have information in regard to this bureau, it seems to me that it would be proper that they should have laid that information before the Committee on Appropriations when the bill was made up. How is the Committee on Appropriations otherwise to ascertain what is required? We have given the estimates, and I repeat, how is the Committee on Appropriations to ascertain what is the amount that is necessary to discharge the duties of this bureau unless the estimate is laid before the Committee on Appropriations?

Now I have no doubt that the gentlemen who received this information belong to the party that would be glad to have an increase in the clerical force of this bureau. There is this man or the other who would like to get an office; and there is a move along the whole line in favor of an increase in the clerical force of this office.

I hope that this House at this extra session will not now undertake to override the investigation and the critical examination of this subject made at the last session of Congress by the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee of the Whole. If so, then we will have many applications for increase of clerical force. I have had since it has been known that I was in charge of this bill verbal applications in a dozen instances, to which I have in general turned a deaf ear.

There are some amendments which I shall move at the proper time, and for which I will give good and sufficient reasons if demanded by the committee. But I trust this committee will decline to go into this large increase of the clerical force, so large an increase as proposed by the gentleman, especially when we have given all the Departments what they asked for. We have given to this bureau every single clerk of class 1 which was asked for, and the entire amount to a dollar which was asked for. I hope that in the early part of this bill the example will not be set of increasing this force, and that we will not drift away from our moorings. I had hoped the House would confine itself to the bill as agreed upon by the committees of conference of the two Houses at the last session, and that we would not enlarge these appropriations.

The question was taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. NEAL; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following:

For the force employed in redeeming the national currency, namely: For superintendent, $3,500; two principal tellers and one principal bookkeeper, at $2,500 each; one assistant bookkeeper, $2,400; and two assistant tellers, at $2,000 each; two clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; four clerks of class 2; thirty-six clerks of class 1; thirteen clerks, at $1,000 each; twenty-six clerks at $900 each; one messenger; four assistant messengers; and two employés, at $432 each; in all, $117,184.

Mr. BAILEY. I move to amend by striking out of line 581 "$2,500" and inserting "$3,000;" so that it will read "two tellers, at $3,000 each." I do this because I believe it is perfectly understood by the members of this committee——

Mr. ATKINS. I object to going back; we have passed that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. MILLS.) The amendment is not in order.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the gentleman will not make a point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. I do make it.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the chairman of this committee decide that at the end of a section an amendment cannot be offered by a member of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment can be offered to a paragraph when it has been read, but after it has been passed and another paragraph read it is not in order to offer an amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask for information; is not this at the end of the paragraph?

Mr. ATKINS. It is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the bill has extended to line 605, a paragraph succeeding the one which the gentleman proposes to amend.

Mr. BAILEY. The reading has extended to the end of the paragraph relating to the treasurer. I supposed it would not be proper to interrupt the reading of the Clerk until the end of that paragraph had been reached.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. As each paragraph is read, if no amendment is offered the paragraph is regarded as adopted. The Chair rules that the proposed amendment is not now in order.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to ask the Chair one question for information. I desire to know whether a member of this committee on the floor of the House, if he be one not entirely conversant with all the rules of the House, if he be a modest man, as has been said by some gentleman; if he be one who did not get into the rush and whirlpool to put his name down on the list of those who are to be allowed to speak—I desire to inquire if he is to be deprived of his representative privilege in a respectful manner and at a proper time to move an amendment? I desire to know if we are to be governed by the ticks of the clock in offering amendments which we believe to be just and proper? Are we to be prohibited by a technical objection that it is not at the end of one line or of a second line?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is prohibited by the rules of the House. The rules prescribe that whenever a paragraph is read for amendment, the amendment can then be offered.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to have that rule reported which does not allow me to offer this amendment when the reading has reached the end of this section or paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided the question. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. BRIGHT. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BAILEY] that he can obviate the difficulty by asking unanimous consent.

Mr. ATKINS. I have made objection, not through any discourtesy to the gentleman.

Mr. BAILEY. I know that.

Mr. ATKINS. I would make the same point of order on any other member upon this floor, on even the best personal friend I have on the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. I only desire to know what the rule is, that I may be guided by it in the future.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope, unless the gentleman appeals from the decision of the Chair, that we will proceed in order.

Mr. BAILEY. May I not be informed of the rule?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been the universal practice of the House ever since the present occupant of the chair has been a member of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the Chair to say that I was to be governed by the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman appeal?

Mr. BAILEY. I ask, for information, what is that rule of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not able to give the gentleman all the information perhaps he wants on that subject. The gentleman can get information from the House if he appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. KEIFER. I think that the rule referred to applies to a section rather than to a paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there an appeal from the decision of the Chair? [After a pause.] If not, the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries and expenses of agents and surveyors, for fees and expenses of gaugers, for salaries of storekeepers, and for miscellaneous expenses, $1,500,000; and hereafter the compensation of gaugers shall not exceed $5 per day while actually employed.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move to amend by adding to the paragraph just read the following:

And the salaries of storekeepers shall not exceed $50 per month.

I understand that the present pay of these officers is $100 per month, and they are not engaged one-fourth of the time. Many of the small distilleries do not make revenue enough to pay the storekeepers and gaugers.

Mr. McCOOK. Do the distillers pay the storekeepers?

Mr. DIBRELL. No, sir; the Government pays them.

Mr. McCOOK. Is not an assessment levied upon the distillers to pay these officers?

Mr. DIBRELL. A tax of ninety cents per gallon is levied upon spirits; and the Government pays the salaries of storekeepers, gaugers, &c.

Mr. McCOOK. Is not provision made that distillers shall pay a per diem to the storekeepers?

Mr. DIBRELL. The pending paragraph reads:

For fees and expenses of gaugers, for salaries of storekeepers, &c.

In this bill we appropriate for the payment of the salaries of these storekeepers.

Mr. KELLEY. When the rate of tax was increased from seventy cents to ninety cents the Government assumed the payment of these officers.

The amendment of Mr. DIBRELL was agreed to.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to amend in the last clause of this paragraph by striking out "five" and inserting "three;" so as to read:

Hereafter the compensation of gaugers shall not exceed $3 per day while actually employed.

From my observation of the duties performed by these gaugers (and I live in a county containing quite a number of distilleries) I think that $3 per day is quite sufficient compensation.

Mr. McCOOK. Is not this amendment subject to a point of order, the same point made a few moments ago upon my colleague, [Mr. BAILEY?]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a point of order?

Mr. McCOOK. No, sir; I will not make any point.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman from New York to make a point of order?

Mr. McCOOK. No, sir.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then I make a point of order, if the amendment is subject to such a point. I doubt whether it is; but I will take the opinion of the Chair on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not think the amendment subject to a point of order, although I make it at the suggestion of a number of gentlemen about me.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I suppose it is that this paragraph had been passed before the amendment was offered.

Mr. ATKINS. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph has not been passed.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman, this subject was gone over with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue by a subcommittee of which Mr. Durham, lately a member from Kentucky, and myself were the majority, and Mr. Foster, of Ohio, the representative of the republicans. Upon inquiry being put the Commissioner as to the propriety of reducing the per diem of gaugers, he expressed the opinion that $5 a day was little enough in order to secure the right sort of men for this duty. The position is one in which a man may shirk his duty to the injury of the Government; and the Commissioner thought that $5 per day was little enough to enable the Government to get the right kind of men. He made a good many arguments to convince the committee that the per diem should remain at $5. I care nothing about the matter so far as I am concerned.

Mr. DIBRELL. Has the gentleman ever seen the head of any Department that was willing to have the salary of any officer reduced?

Mr. ATKINS. My colleague must not put such a question as that to me. I have been putting that question myself.

Mr. DIBRELL. Do not two dollars of the five go to campaign purposes—to help carry the elections?

Mr. ATKINS. I will let republicans answer that question. If the gentleman will convince me that any portion of this money goes to campaign purposes, I shall be in favor of reducing it.

Mr. DIBRELL. If the gentleman has ever seen a gauger who was not active in campaigning, I have not.

Mr. FORT. Perhaps the whisky itself is used for campaign purposes. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Five dollars a day is little enough for a competent gauger. The amount ought to be increased instead of diminished, if any change is made. The duties of the office are important. By the incompetency or dishonesty of a gauger the Government may lose ten times or one hundred times the amount of the salary.

Mr. DIBRELL. The salary does not make the man honest.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I understand that; but the gentleman must know that, in reference to the employment of individuals in private life or by the Government, it is prudent to pay reasonable ordinary compensation for the discharge of important duties requiring skill and fidelity. You thus remove the temptation to become dishonest. If the gentleman were carrying on for himself a business requiring this kind of service, he would no more think of employing a man at $3 a day for this duty than he would do any other improbable thing; because he would say that it was not wise to subject an employé in such a responsible position to the constant temptation to carelessness or dishonesty. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I trust the amendment will not be adopted. During the Forty-fourth Congress this whole subject of salaries was gone into and large reductions made. In the Forty-fifth Congress also these questions received careful consideration. This is an important branch of the public service; and it seems to me that before the House undertakes to make a change in a matter of this sort, it should be carefully considered by a committee and reported upon for the information of the House. During the last Congress this subject was considered by a committee whose report was accepted by the House. I trust we are not going to depart from the deliberate action of the House upon a matter of this kind without some good reason. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] has already stated that the action already had on this subject was not hastily taken. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue was called and consulted, and after consultation with him the gentleman having charge of this matter under direction of the House reported this amount. I hope we will have no hasty overruling of the action of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. When the House shall come to be organized, to have its committees, if these salaries are too large, then will be the time for us to undertake to correct them. But I insist, sir, we should not now undertake it. I trust the House will vote down all amendments in antagonism to the action of the last House, unless it is plain and clear there is some imperative necessity for adopting them.

Mr. COFFROTH. I wish to reply to my friend from Georgia by stating that the House has already adopted the amendment fixing the salary of storekeepers at $50 a month. Now, to fix the salaries of gaugers at $3 a day in my judgment is sufficient. I say you can get competent men all over the Union to do the duties now performed by gaugers at $3 a day. You can get the best young men in the country, young men of education, men of integrity, who will gladly accept $3 a day to perform the duties required of these gaugers. Sometimes their duties do not occupy them more than half an hour or an hour a day. Then they go to some other distillery, and so run the month out, getting $150 a month.

Mr. BAILEY. I move pro forma to strike out the last word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the $50 a month paid to storekeepers is their stated fixed salary; they get it every day and every week and every month in the year. But it is not so with gaugers. There are comparatively but few gaugers in any suburban district of the United States who make more than $600 a year from the employment of their office. In fact, I know in my own district there are two gaugers, and by the order of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue they are required to go on duty alternately. There is really only business for one, but the Department insists on the employment of two gaugers, so that one is employed for one month and the other for another month, each being on duty only half of the time.

Now these men get $5 a day; they have to be skilled men, and I venture to say there are members in this committee, myself for one, who are not competent to do the business of these men without special training. It requires a man of education, it requires a man of some special training in order to be a competent gauger; and while I do not believe it is the true or highest art of government to practice too rigid economy in reference to the pay of its officers, while I believe in reform and retrenchment and all that sort of thing, I do nevertheless believe that this country is able to pay and the Government is able to pay to these men just what they are worth. I believe a merchant pays for his goods what they are worth. I believe a banker when he employs a clerk pays to that man what he is worth. I do not believe, for one, that the people of the country pay to Congressmen what they are worth; and I do not believe we should raise or attempt to raise this cry of reform upon these poor gaugers around the country who do not get enough per day to support themselves and families respectably. As my friend from Illinois has said, you do not pay these men sufficiently. Not to do so is to induce them, nay almost compel them, to become dishonest. We cannot afford to do it, because I believe we will find that in the end we will economize by paying proper and sufficient salaries. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The formal amendment was withdrawn.

The question recurred on Mr. COFFROTH'S amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 72.

Mr. COFFROTH demanded tellers.

Mr. DIBRELL. No quorum has voted, and the gentleman is entitled to tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BAILEY and Mr. COFFROTH were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 87.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the second and third sections of the act entitled "An act to organize the Life-Saving Service," approved June 18, 1878, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether that repealing clause was in the bill as acted on by the House at the last session.

Mr. ATKINS. It was.

Mr. DUNNELL. I did not recall it.

The Clerk read as follows:

INDEPENDENT TREASURY.

Office of the assistant treasurer at New York:

For assistant treasurer, $8,000; for deputy assistant treasurer, $3,600; cashier and chief clerk, $4,000; chief of coin division, $3,600; chief of note-paying division, $3,000; chief of note-receiving division, $2,800; chief of check division, $2,800; chief of registered-interest division, $2,600; chief of coupon-interest division, $2,400; chief of bond division, $2,250; chief of canceled-check and record division, $2,000; two clerks, at $2,250 each; six clerks, at $2,100 each; ten clerks, at $2,000 each; nine clerks, at $1,800 each; four clerks, at $1,700 each; five clerks, at $1,600 each; two clerks, at $1,500 each; ten clerks, at $1,400 each; three clerks, at $1,200 each; five messengers, at $1,300 each; one messenger, $1,200; keeper of building, $1,800; chief detective, $1,800; two assistant detectives, at $1,400 each; three hall-men, at $1,000 each; six watchmen, at $720 each; one engineer, $1,000; one porter, $900; in all, $149,070.

Mr. ATKINS. I move on page 33, line 802, after the word "dollars," to insert "minor-coins clerk, $2,400," and in lines 822 and 823, page 34, to strike out "forty-nine thousand," and in lieu thereof to insert "fifty-one thousand four hundred." I will state for the information of the House that this clerk was estimated for in the Book of Estimates, but the Committee on Appropriations did not make an appropriation for it, nor did the House. The assistant treasurer at New York writes that it is utterly impossible to get along with the force he has in counting the minor coins and fractional currency that are daily coming into the assistant treasury, and it is for that purpose that this additional clerk is asked.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following paragraph:

Assay office at Charlotte, North Carolina:

For salary of assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $1,500; and the assayer is hereby authorized in case of necessity to employ a clerk at not exceeding $1,000 per annum; for labor and other expenses, $750; in all, $3,250.

Mr. FORT. I offer as an amendment what I send to the desk, to come in at the close of the portion of the bill making appropriations for the Treasury Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter when legal-tender Treasury notes are reissued, they shall be so reissued in the same denominations as originally issued.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that the amendment changes the law and is not in the interest of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman from Illinois design his amendment to come in?

Mr. FORT. After line 1078; at the close of that part of the bill which refers to the Treasury. I do not know that it applies to any particular part of the Treasury Department and therefore it is in order here.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to appropriations for an assay office at Charlotte, North Carolina, and furthermore, that it is a change of the law and not in the interest of economy.

Mr. FORT. I do not offer this as an amendment relating to an assay office, but as a separate section. It certainly relates to the Department of the Treasury, and as such would be in order at any part of the bill that relates to the Treasury Department. If the gentleman from Ohio objects to the language of the amendment I can modify it, so that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be required when legal-tender notes are reissued to reissue them in the same denominations in which they were originally issued.

It is well known that a very large part of the legal-tender currency of this country has been put into bills of $5,000 and $10,000. [Laughter.] Yes, sir, such is the fact; and no citizen of the United States, except a very few, like my distinguished friend before me, [Mr. CHITTENDEN,] is able to hold or handle bills of that denomination.

Mr. ATKINS. I concur with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT.] I do not think the point of order lies against the amendment. It relates to the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury. All these paragraphs which we have been going over make appropriations for duties which are performed by the Secretary of the Treasury and his officers and employés under him. This particular paragraph relates to the expenses of the mint at Charlotte. It does not require much stretch of the imagination to get from gold to silver, and from silver to greenbacks. Therefore I think we might admit the amendment. I say this in all seriousness.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GARFIELD. It appears to me to be an unheard-of thing to connect an appropriation of money for the support of an assay office with the law as to the kind of public obligation the Government should issue; and furthermore, as I have said, the amendment is a change of the law and certainly is not in the interest of economy. The complaint against which my friend from Illinois directs his amendment is that the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of issuing small bills in place of worn-out bills, issues large ones up to five-thousand-dollar and ten-thousand-dollar notes. It certainly is easier to print $5,000 in one note than in five thousand notes. It is therefore against economy, if that is the point we are to look at, to compel the Secretary to print small notes when he might print much cheaper in one big one; so that if we are really under the rule that the legislation must be in the interest of economy upon its face, I say this is not in the interest of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Ohio if there is any existing law that authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue at his discretion notes of a different denomination from those taken up?

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no special law as to that except that the Secretary is by law authorized to issue notes to replace those torn and mutilated. He is prohibited from canceling and utterly destroying these votes when mutilated and can only cancel them on issuing others. The law is silent as to the denominations.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the law allows the Secretary the discretion of determining in what denominations the notes shall be issued.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir; and this amendment would introduce a law which creates a new limitation that does not now exist.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not desire to hear further argument. He sustains the point of order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following paragraph:

Territory of Dakota:

For salaries of governor, chief-justice, and two associate judges, at $2,600 each; and secretary, $1,800, $12,200.

Mr. ATKINS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1092, strike out the word "two," where it first occurs, and insert the word "three;" and in line 1094, strike out $12,200 and insert $14,800. So that it will read:

For salaries of governor, chief-justice, and three associate judges, at $2,600 each, and secretary at $1,800, $14,800.

Last session, it will be remembered, an act was passed creating an additional judge for Dakota Territory. This is simply to supply his salary for the next fiscal year.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 69, noes 14.

Mr. COFFROTH. I make the point of order that a quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. ATKINS, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. COFFROTH.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I do not think the committee understands the question. Let it be again stated.

Mr. COFFROTH. I withdraw the call for tellers. I made it under a misapprehension.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

Territory of Wyoming:

For salaries of governor, chief-justice, and two associate judges, at $2,600 each; and secretary, at $1,800, $12,200.

For legislative expenses, namely: For per diem of members, $6,400; for mileage, $2,200; for printing the laws and journals, and other necessary printing of like nature, $2,500: Provided, That not more than $500 of said amount shall be expended for any kind of printing herein authorized until the laws passed by the Legislative Assembly shall have been printed and bound; for incidental expenses of the Legislative Assembly, (including not more than $1,000 for the secretary's office,) $2,000; for per diem of officers and others, $2,200; for extra per diem of the president of the council and the speaker of the house, $160; in all, $15,460.

Mr. DOWNEY. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1177, strike out the word "six" and insert "nine;" strike out the word "four" and insert the word "six."
In line 1180, strike out the word "provided."
Strike out lines 1181, 1182, 1183, and part of line 1184, including the word "bound."
Strike out the words in line 1185 after the word "assembly."
Strike out line 1186.
In line 1187, after the word "thousand" insert the words "five hundred."
In line 1190, strike out the word "fifteen" and insert "eighteen."
In line 1190, strike out the word "four" and insert "seven."

I have understood that this question has been passed on repeatedly by Congress, but our people in the Territory of Wyoming believe that $4 a day for members of the Legislature is not sufficient compensation. In obedience to their wishes, I have the honor to offer this amendment which would raise the per diem from $4 a day to $6 a day.

The other portion of the amendment is in regard to the office of secretary, limiting and placing the restriction in reference to printing. I understand that that restriction was placed in there at the instance of the gentleman who had the honor to represent the Territory of Wyoming until recently. We now have a new secretary of the Territory, and I presume the restriction ought not to be in the bill; and at the solicitation of the present secretary of the Territory I have introduced that portion of the amendment which relates to that part of the bill. I believe myself that the amendment ought to be adopted, and that the members of the Legislature instead of receiving $6 a day, as I propose, should receive $8 a day.

Mr. ATKINS. I trust that the committee will not adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming. There is no more reason why a discrimination should be made in favor of the Territory of Wyoming than in favor of any other Territory. Members of the Legislatures of the Territories formerly got $6 a day, but it will be remembered that we cut them down to $4 a day in all the Territories.

I see no reason why we should now retrace our steps. I think that the amount per diem had better remain at $4 a day.

In regard to the other feature of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming, I desire to state that it was put in the bill at the instance of the able gentleman who represented that Territory in the last Congress, Mr. Corlett. He wanted the money appropriated for printing to be applied to the publication of the laws before any outside printing should be done, and I hope the amendment offered will not be adopted.

The vote was taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

In the office of the Commissary-General:
One chief clerk, at $2,000; one clerk of class 4; three clerks of class 3; four clerks of class 2; ten clerks of class 1; two clerks, at $1,000 each; one assistant messenger; two laborers; and two watchmen; in all, $31,680. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to detail as many supernumerary officers of the Army as may be necessary to investigate claims not heretofore examined by the Commissary-General for allowance.

Mr. HOUK. I offer the following amendment:

In line 1252, page 52, strike out the word "supernumerary," and in line 1253, page 52, after the word "claims," insert the words "now pending, or which may be hereafter presented;" and after the word "allowance," in line 1254, on page 52, insert the words "under act of July 4, 1864, for which purpose there shall be appropriated the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for said investigation."

I desire to say in explanation of that amendment that the bill which has been approved by the Committee on Appropriations provides that supernumerary officers of the Army shall be detailed to examine claims in the office of the Commissary-General of the Army.

The bill was prepared when it was thought that the Army would be reorganized, and that there would be supernumerary Army officers. That reorganization has not taken place, and is not likely to take place, and therefore I move to strike out the word "supernumerary." In regard to the merits of the amendment, I would suggest that under the act of July 4, 1864, a large number of claims passed before the Commissary department, some of them just no doubt, a good many of them perhaps unjust, but up to the present time no means have been provided by which to employ agents to investigate the justice of the claims, and therefore they are pending unsettled and not unapproved in the office.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to retain the floor for the purpose of making a point of order upon this amendment.

Mr. HOUK. I have said about all I desire to say. I would only add that it is highly important to the business of the Commissary department that these claims should be disposed of, either allowed or rejected, and that the appropriation is necessary to enable the Commissary-General to investigate the claims pending in his department, as the law which passed the House a few years ago authorized the Quartermaster-General to investigate claims in his department.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order upon that amendment that it increases expenditures and proposes new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman state that there is no law covering such an appropriation as that contemplated in this amendment?

Mr. HOUK. It does not change existing law. It provides simply for the absence of any legislation on that subject, and the Committee on Appropriations in perfecting the bill seem to have taken the same view, and they have provided in the bill as reported that these claims shall be investigated, but they have not provided that there shall be any funds to perfect the investigation.

Mr. ATKINS. I submit that the amendment proposes new legislation and increases the expense by $15,000.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. BLACKBURN.) In the judgment of the Chair the amendment certainly proposes an appropriation not authorized by law. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to inquire of the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. ATKINS] what he understands to be meant by the word "supernumerary" preceding the words "officers of the Army?"

Mr. DIBRELL. I have an amendment to move which will perfect this paragraph.

Mr. HUNTON. I was going to move to strike out the word "supernumerary."

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to that. This provision was offered at the last session by my colleague [Mr. DIBRELL] as an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move to amend the paragraph by inserting after the words "officers of the Army" the words "or officers not on duty with the Army."

Mr. HOUK. If in order I will accept that amendment.

Mr. DIBRELL. When this provision was adopted last session, it was supposed that a reorganization of the Army would take place, and that there would be a large number of supernumerary officers for three years. I propose to amend the paragraph by inserting the words "officers not on duty with the Army."

Mr. HUNTON. It strikes me that the object of this provision would be better reached by merely striking out the word "supernumerary" and leaving to the discretion of the Secretary of War to detail such officers of the Army as he may think proper.

Mr. DIBRELL. Very well; I will accept that and withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. Then I move to strike out the word "supernumerary."

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

For contingent expenses, namely, rent of building, repairs, and miscellaneous items, $5,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by inserting after the words "rent of building" "$2,500," and after the words "repairs and miscellaneous items" "$2,500; in all." This is to divide the appropriation into two sums of $2,500 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

In the Office of the Surgeon-General:
For contingent expenses, namely, blank-books, stationery, rent, fuel, gas, furniture, repairs, and incidentals, $6,500.

Mr. WAIT. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ATKINS] if the force now in the Surgeon-General's Office is ample to supply information which is desired?

Mr. ATKINS. In answer to the gentleman I will say that I have not heard a word of complaint.

Mr. WAIT. At the last session it was said that information could not be obtained in proper time.

Mr. ATKINS. I think the Surgeon-General is perfectly satisfied with the force he has.

Mr. WAIT. I know this, that last session we could not get information in regard to pensioners until the lapse of several months.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the gentleman propose an amendment?

Mr. WAIT. I asked the gentleman a question for information.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following:

Navy Department:
For compensation of the Secretary of the Navy, $8,000; for compensation of the chief clerk of the Navy Department, $2,500; one disbursing clerk, $2,000; four clerks of class 4; three clerks of class 3; one stenographer, $1,600; one clerk of class 2; four clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; two messengers; and for two laborers; in all, $38,300.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "one clerk of class two" and inserting in lieu thereof "two clerks of class two."

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to say——

Mr. WHITTHORNE. You do not object to that?

Mr. ATKINS. I do. I will state to the committee that only one clerk of class two was estimated for, and we have given that.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Just one word, that the committee may understand. The Navy Department is now being transferred from the old building to the new. It is within the knowledge of most members on this floor that not very long since the records of that Department were disturbed by a fire. In removing from the old building to the new, and in arranging the records so that hereafter there shall be proper dispatch in the transaction of public business, this increase of force is deemed absolutely necessary; it is demanded by the Secretary of the Navy in view of the public interest.

Mr. ATKINS. Why is a clerk of class 2 needed more than a clerk of class 1, or of class 4, or a laborer, to remove these papers?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It is simply to apportion properly the work which is being done.

Mr. ATKINS. It is very strange the Secretary of the Navy did not estimate for this clerk.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It was not known at the time the estimates were made that the records of the Department would be transferred from one building to the other. I trust the committee will concur in the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I trust it will not.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following:

For one superintendent of the building occupied by the Navy Department ($250) and for five watchmen and two laborers; in all, $5,170.

For incidental labor, fuel, lights, and miscellaneous items for said building, $5,000.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CHITTENDEN, until Tuesday next;

To Mr. HEILMAN, until the 15th instant;

To Mr. SMITH, of Georgia, for six days; and

To Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, until Monday next.

FOLDING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. CHALMERS. I am informed by the clerk of the folding-room that there is great difficulty in getting rid of the immense mass of speeches now there to be folded. I desire to ask permission that he be authorized to employ an additional number of operatives to be paid by the piece.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better present a resolution upon that subject; and that would have to go to the Committee of Accounts under the rules.

Mr. ATKINS. Do that to-morrow morning.

Mr. CHALMERS. Very well.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CULBERSON: The petition of Marcos Radich, for payment of vouchers for rent of property in Texas used by the United States Army—to the Committee of Claims, when appointed.

By Mr. DE LA MATYR: The petition of citizens of Jay County, Indiana, for the passage of the Reagan interstate-commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

By Mr. ERRETT: The petition of 66 ladies of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, for the enforcement of the laws against polygamy—to the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed.

Also, the petition of 131 ladies of the thirty-second ward, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, of similar import—to the same committee, when appointed.

By Mr. HASKELL: The petition of citizens of Douglas County, Kansas, for the passage of the Reagan interstate-commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

By Mr. JAMES: The petition of Lydia E. Buckley, that her name be restored to the pension-roll—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, when appointed.

Also, the petition of Eliza Berry, for a pension—to the same committee, when appointed.

By Mr. JONES: The petition of Peter Eldridge, for an increase of pension—to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, when appointed.

Also, the petition of Andrew Jones, for bounty on account of service in the United States Navy—to the Committee of Claims, when appointed.

By Mr. KEIFER: The petition of members of Rush Creek Grange, Logan County, Ohio, for the passage of the Reagan interstate-commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

By Mr. McCOOK: The petition of George C. Jenks, of New York City, for compensation for the use by the United States Post-Office Department of a patent letter-box—to the Committee on Patents, when appointed.

By Mr. REAGAN: The petition of Spring Run Grange, Whitley County, Indiana, for the passage of the Reagan interstate-commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

By Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois: Resolution of the Legislature of Illinois, favoring appropriations for the protection of the navigation of the Mississippi River in Madison and Saint Clair Counties, Illinois—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

By Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois: The petition of citizens of Illinois, for the improvement of the Ohio River at Hurricane Island—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

Also, the petition of 629 citizens of Illinois, that a pension or other relief be granted John B. Tucker—to the Committee on Military Affairs, when appointed.

By Mr. WARNER: The petition of James McSwords, that bounties be granted those who served less than two years in the Army—to the same committee, when appointed.

By Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee: The petition of Hayden & Co., of Memphis, Tennessee, to be refunded taxes illegally paid by them on cotton—to the Committee of Claims, when appointed.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 9, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting for the information of the Senate a copy of a letter forwarded by him to the Speaker of the House of Representatives showing the necessity for an increase of the clerical force in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Hannah L. Stearns, of Castine, Hancock County, Maine, praying for the passage of a law granting her a pension on account of services rendered by her late husband, Benjamin F. Stearns, as a teamster in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MAXEY presented the petition of T. E. Nixon and others, members of Mount Zion Grange, No. 806, of Lamar County, Texas, praying for the passage of a law regulating interstate commerce, and prohibiting unjust discriminations by common carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Mrs. Ann Barnes, of Fort Stockton, Texas, praying for the passage of a law authorizing the refunding to her of certain money alleged to have been unlawfully taken from her husband during the late war; which was referred to the Committe on Claims.

PRINTING OF THE CENSUS ACT.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report with a favorable recommendation the following resolution, asking, however, unanimous consent to make a clerical correction:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,000 additional copies of public act No. 98, an act to provide for the tenth and subsequent censuses, said copies to be delivered to the Senate document-room.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask leave to insert after the word "for" the word "taking," so as to read "for taking the tenth and subsequent censuses."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That clerical correction will be made as suggested.

The resolution was agreed to.

PORTRAIT OF JOSEPH HENRY.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 17) authorizing the printing of a portrait of the late Joseph Henry, to accompany the memorial volume heretofore ordered, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It appropriates $500 for the printing of the portrait of Professor Joseph Henry, to accompany the memorial volume already ordered by Congress.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 382) granting a pension to Ellen W. P. Carter; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 383) for the benefit of the public schools in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GORDON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 384) to aid the Great Southern Railway Company (consolidated) to construct a line of railway in the States of Georgia and Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 385) granting a pension to Ivory H. Pike; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ROLLINS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 386) to confer upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia the powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8 (water service) of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MAXEY, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers in the case of Marcus Radich, of Texas, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL. By request I ask for the following order:

Ordered, That the papers in the claim of Turner Merritt be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The order was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SLATER, it was Ordered, That the memorial and accompanying papers of the Cherokee delegation, relating to the claim of Lewis Downing and others, be taken from the files of the Secretary of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OFFICERS ON THE FLOOR OF CONGRESS.

Mr. WHYTE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,000 additional copies of Senate bill No. 227, to provide that the principal officers of each of the Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives, said copies to be delivered to the Senate document-room.

NEWSPAPER POSTAGE.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General is directed to furnish for the information of the Senate his reasons for barring the Citizen Soldier, a newspaper published in Washington, District of Columbia, from transmission through the mails at the same rates of postage accorded to other newspapers. And further to state why he permits to the mails at pound rates of postage one journal and excludes another of the same class from like privilege; furnishing with this statement the names of such newspapers as have heretofore enjoyed these rates of postage but are now denied them through recent rulings of his Department.

ELECTION EXPENSES IN FLORIDA.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate a detailed statement of the expenses of the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern district of Florida from the year 1870 to the present time, and including the amounts paid to the district attorneys of the United States and the marshals of the northern district of Florida with a copy of the said accounts as rendered and the amounts paid to the said marshals and district attorneys on account of fees and services rendered by deputy marshals and supervisors for services connected with the elections in the State of Florida.

DEPARTMENT OFFICERS ON THE FLOOR OF CONGRESS.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,000 additional copies of Senate bill No. 227, to provide that the principal officers of each of the Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives.

SENATOR FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further business for the morning hour? If not, the Senate resumes the consideration of its unfinished business, being the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections declaring "that Hon. Charles H. Bell is not entitled to a seat as a Senator by virtue of the appointment by the executive of New Hampshire." The pending question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to strike out the word "not" before the word "entitled," on which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Delaware yields to me. About five minutes of time is all that I wish.

I had intended, Mr. President, to discuss this question at some length, but everything has been said on the merits of the question that it is capable of. The whole question is in a narrow compass; and the view of the Constitution which has been presented by different gentlemen who have discussed the subject, especially by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] and last by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] in my judgment presents the proper construction of that instrument. I do not believe that the vacancy mentioned in that clause of the Constitution is anything else than a portion of the six years' term where there is no person qualified to discharge the functions of the office. The principle asserted in the Lanman decision is that the Legislature of a State shall provide for all vacancies which must occur at stated and known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the governor's power under the Constitution; that where opportunity is given to the Legislature to choose a Senator the governor cannot appoint. A vacancy within the meaning of the constitutional provision does not arise by the failure of a Legislature to elect; nor can we so construe it because the constitutional convention of New Hampshire has so provided in its constitution that the last Legislature that was elected in November cannot meet until the ensuing summer. I believe in the construction of the law of 1866 which was given here yesterday by the Senator from Wisconsin.

I rose, however, to consider a little the precedents of this body which have not been stated at any length. There is no doubt that prior to 1825 the Senate did admit any person who was appointed where the Legislature had not elected, whether the vacancy occurred at the expiration of a regular term or during the term. The first case was Tracy's case, and that was decided in high party times, thirteen Federalists voting one way and ten national republicans the other. Every other case between that and Lanman's case passed sub silentio.

In 1825, upon the presentation of Mr. Lanman's credentials, the Senate of the United States made a halt. They considered that question fully, debating it for three days. It is unfortunate that we have not the debates of that period. It is clear that there were two views of the meaning of this constitutional provision then and there, because we have the vote on that case. I think that Mr. Benton's statement of what was then decided ought to be received with more credit than that of almost any other writer upon the subject because he was a Senator at the time; he voted upon the proposition and he therefore ought to be a good judge of the question involved and settled; and he does state to us what was decided at that time.

As I said before there were two views of the constitutional meaning. The decision in Lanman's case was reached by a vote of twenty-three against his admission to a vote of eighteen for his admission. Two of the gentlemen voting upon that occasion have been since Presidents of the United States. But Mr. Benton states what was decided. He says that Mr. Tazewell was the principal speaker upon the subject:

"Happen" was held by Mr. Tazewell to be the governing word in this provision, and it always implied a contingency, and an unexpected one. It could not apply to a foreseen event bound to occur at a fixed period. Here the vacancy was foreseen; there was no contingency in it. It was regular and certain.

It was decided that way. I do not say that in the opinion of the gentlemen then composing the Senate there were not two interpretations of the meaning of this provision, although to my mind it seems very clear that the conclusion which was reached at that time was the true interpretation. That interpretation has been followed ever since. There has been no debate in the Senate from that time to this in which that interpretation has not been followed.

In 1837 the case of Mr. Sevier arose. The Senate admitted Mr. Sevier upon a ground which I think was not tenable, that the Legislature could not have known that the vacancy would arise by the expiration of Mr. Sevier's term. They were bound to know, I am inclined to think, that there would be a vacancy. Mr. Grundy says in in his report, expressly, that it is not intended to overrule the decision in the case of Lanman, but that the Legislature not being in session and it not being known whether Mr. Sevier would draw the long or short term, it took him without the principle there asserted. But I do not think that was correct reasoning, because if the provision in the Constitution simply referred to vacancies occurring during the running of a regular term, the facts in regard to the Sevier case did not take it out of the operation of the clause.

I think that the decision in Lanman's case, as I understand it, gives the true interpretation of the Constitution, that when the Legislature had the opportunity of providing a Senator but failed, the governor cannot appoint. That is one way of arriving at what the framers of the Constitution meant. The Legislature always has an opportunity of providing for the expiration of a regular term, and if a State chooses by a change of its constitution to put it out of the power of its last Legislature to elect a Senator it is their fault; they could have provided for the election, but they themselves have chosen to act in that manner. But what is the meaning of the Constitution? It does not cover what one State may do by way of estopping itself from the election of a Senator.

In relation to the Sevier case, I desire to read from the report of Mr. Grundy. I do not know whether it has been read in this debate or not. Mr. Grundy, in his report from the Judiciary Committee on that case, said:

At the last session of Congress the State of Arkansas was admitted into the Union, and the Legislature of that State, in the month of October, 1836, elected Ambrose H. Sevier and William S. Fulton Senators to represent the State in the Senate of the United States. It also appears that, upon the allotment of the said Arkansas Senators to their respective classes, as required by the third section of the first article of the Constitution, the said Ambrose H. Sevier was placed in the class of Senators whose term of service expired on the 3d day of March, 1837, and that the Legislature of Arkansas have had no opportunity of filling the vacancy, not having been in session since the fact that the vacancy would occur could have been known in that State. The governor of the State of Arkansas, on the 17th day of January last, commissioned the said Sevier as Senator to fill the vacancy which would take place on the 3d of March. Upon this state of the case the question is presented whether the said Ambrose H. Sevier is entitled to his seat under the appointment made by the executive of the State of Arkansas. In looking into the practice of the Senate upon the subject of executive appointments no case like the present has been found. Several cases have occurred in which the executives of different States, in anticipation of the expiration of the regular term of service, have appointed Senators, (the Legislatures not being in session,) and in all of these cases the Senators thus appointed were admitted to their seats; until the called session of the Senate in March, 1825, when Mr. Lanman, of Connecticut, whose term of service expired on the 3d of March, 1825, produced his credentials from the governor of Connecticut, and the Senate decided he was not entitled to his seat by a vote of 23 to 18.

The decision seems to have been generally acquiesced in since that time; nor is it intended by the committee to call its correctness in question. The principle asserted in that case is that the Legislature of a State, by making elections themselves, shall provide for all vacancies which must occur at stated and known periods, and that the expiration of a regular term of service is not such a contingency as is embraced in the second section of the first article of the Constitution.

Can it be said that the Sevier case overruled the Lanman case upon that report? Clearly not, because the author of the report distinctly states what was decided in the Lanman case and reaffirms it. I may be permitted to remark that Sevier was not admitted without question. As I understand it, Mr. Webster did not take that view of the case at all.

The next time this subject was discussed was in 1852, in the Dixon case from Kentucky. The question there discussed of course was not the same question that is now here. Mr. Clay had resigned in the winter of 1851-'52, his resignation to take effect on the 1st day of September following. The Legislature of Kentucky was in session at the time and elected Mr. Dixon to fill that vacancy; but before the 1st of September came Mr. Clay died, I think in June, 1852, and the vacancy between that time and September was filled by the appointment of Mr. Merriwether, and the commission of the governor of Kentucky distinctly stated that he was to hold until the 1st day of September following. Mr. Dixon presented himself to claim his seat at the opening of the session in the December following. The objection was raised at once that he was not entitled to a seat, the place being filled by the governor's appointment "until the next meeting of the Legislature;" and the whole question in relation to the manner of filling vacancies in the Senate was discussed. There were two opinions as to whether the seat of Mr. Clay could be actually filled by the Legislature of Kentucky until the September following, when his resignation was to take effect. That subject was debated at great length, running through many pages of the Congressional Globe of 1852; but in all that discussion there was no disagreement upon what was decided in Lanman's case. There was no disagreement upon that subject at all. Necessarily the discussion in that case, as in every other, took a pretty wide range before the Senate. It is not confined, as it would be in a court of law, to the particular point. Many of the Senators expressed their views upon the subject at length, and I propose to read from what was said by three or four of them at the time. Mr. Underwood, who was one of the ablest lawyers we ever had west of the Alleghany Mountains, a judge for many years of the supreme court of Kentucky, then a Senator from Kentucky, made one of the most elaborate arguments in favor of his colleague, Mr. Dixon, in which he said:

What is a vacancy? * * * It is leaving a portion of the term of six years, during which portion of time there is no officer, no person elected or appointed by the constitutional authorities to fill or exercise the functions of the office; that is a vacancy.

* * * * * * *

I will not detain the Senate by referring at length to other cases; but here is Anderson's case, and Williams's case, and, I believe, one or two others to which I might refer, to show that the rule formerly was, that the executive might appoint to fill the regular occurrence of vacancies in the regular terms of the Senate. But that rule was set aside in Lanman's case in 1825, and since that time the decision in it has been acquiesced in; but in Sevier's case they did not acquiesce in the rule, because of the fact that the Legislature could not have known what class Mr. Sevier would draw.

Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, discussed this subject at considerable length:

In the case of Mr. Lanman—

Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts, said—the Legislature which last met in Connecticut, before a constitutional vacancy was to happen, omitted to appoint a Senator. The governor, supposing he had power to do it, made an appointment. The credentials of his appointee were presented here, and the Senate took the subject into their deliberation, and decided that the executive had no authority to appoint in such a case; and why? Because the Legislature had had an opportunity to exercise the power with which they were clothed and they had omitted to do it; and the contingency which vested the executive with power to supply a vacancy had not occurred. This vacancy was not a contingency which the Legislature could not foresee and provide for.

* * * * * * *

It is a well-established usage, which has been exercised throughout the history of the Government; and I think it is equally clear that it is the duty of the Legislature, in any case where they know a vacancy is to exist, to make the appointment seasonably; and it results from the decision in the case of Lanman, that if they fail to exercise that power when they have had an opportunity to do it the seat then becomes vacant, and the executive has no right to fill it.

* * * * * * *

The Legislature had had the opportunity to fill the vacancy, they knew of the existence of a constitutional expiration of a term and consequently a vacancy, and having had that opportunity, it was their duty to fill it, and therefore the executive could not afterward fill the place.

Mr. Douglas took the same view of it, and General Cass also. The latter said:

The third clause of the first article of the Constitution provides for the composition of the Senate, by fixing the term of service and the mode of selecting the Senators, permanent and temporary. It declares that "if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." The regular terms of the Senators are for six years, and the "vacancies" herein provided for are the unexpired portion of such terms, which are to be "filled" by the Legislature when it can act, and when it cannot act, to be copied by temporary executive appointments. If, therefore, a Senator resign, or his seat is otherwise vacated except by the expiration of his term, the "vacancy" is for his original period of service to be temporarily appointed to by the governor, or "filled" by the Legislature.

Mr. Mason said a few words as to the precedents:

Until Lanman's case, according to my recollection, it was considered by the Senate, or rather it was decided by the Senate, manifestly without consideration, that it was competent for the State executive, when a term expired in the recess of the Legislature, to treat that as a vacancy and to fill it accordingly. Such a practice was common until the decision in Lanman's case. I confess that on looking at the Constitution my first impression was that the practice was correct, but on examining the Constitution and weighing it carefully and deliberately I cannot entertain a doubt that the decision of Lanman's case was correct, and that when a term expires by constitutional limitation it is not a "vacancy" which the executive can fill. Yet the decision in that case set aside all the former precedents and established a new and correct rule.

In the debate of 1854 it was treated in the same way upon Mr. Phelps's case. There a question was again submitted to the Senate as to the extent of the power of appointment confided to the State executives in regard to vacancies in this body. The question was then presented, as it is now, whether it is proper and right to overrule what had been done since 1825, and the views of the great men who have been our predecessors in this body, and resort to the rule which was adopted in Tracy's case and followed until 1825. In a court of law if the latter decision had been a wrong one, overruling the fomer decision, it would have been followed and obeyed no matter what might have been the opinion of the dissenting judges in the case. So here.

This is all that I propose to say.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Mr. President, I did not intend to take any part in this discussion; but the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] who is a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and who prepared and submitted the views of the minority, is absent. For that reason I have thought perhaps it was incumbent on me to say a word in regard to the reasons which influenced the minority in coming to the conclusion which they did upon this case.

Fortunately, there is no dispute in regard to the facts of this case. Questions which have heretofore arisen in regard to the right of Senators to seats on this floor have frequently presented difficult matters of fact for discussion. I will state the facts in this case, in brief. The term for which Mr. Wadleigh was elected as a Senator from New Hampshire expired by limitation on the 3d day of March last. On the 13th day of March, ten days after the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term, the executive of that State appointed the claimant, Mr. Bell, a Senator in Congress to succeed Mr. Wadleigh, and to retain his seat until the next meeting of the Legislature of that State. There was no Legislature in session at the time Mr. Wadleigh's term expired, nor has any Legislature been in session in that State since that time. On the 4th day of March the President issued a proclamation convening Congress in extra session. On the 18th of March, the first day of the extra session, the credentials of Mr. Bell were presented. He was present and ready to take the oath. Objection was made, and his credentials went to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

In 1877 a constitutional convention was held in New Hampshire. The convention framed and agreed upon a constitution. That constitution was regularly submitted to the people and adopted by them. Under the old constitution, which I think was in force in that State from the year 1792, the Legislature was elected in March of each year, and its term of office commenced in the succeeding June. In March, 1878, according to the provisions of the old constitution, a Legislature was elected in New Hampshire. The term of service of that Legislature commenced in June, 1878, and will continue until June, 1879. Another Legislature was elected in November, 1878, under the provisions of the new constitution. The term of service of this Legislature will commence in June, 1879, and will continue for two years next thereafter. This state of facts existed in 1878 at the time the Legislature elected under the old constitution was about to assemble. The question arose in that State, which of these Legislatures can legally elect a Senator to succeed Mr. Wadleigh. The opinion of lawyers in that State was sought, and as in most other cases the opinions differed. Thereupon the opinions of distinguished counsel in this city were sought, and again the opinions of distinguished legal gentlemen differed. For the purpose of obtaining at least a legislative opinion in regard to the question, in May, 1878, at the request of some citizens of that State, I introduced in this body a bill. The bill is entitled "A bill to declare the true intent and meaning of title 2, chapter 1, section 14, of the Revised Statutes." That section is a portion of the act of 1866, which has so frequently been referred to during the progress of this discussion. The bill reads as follows:

That the true intent and meaning of title 2, chapter 1, section 14, of the Revised Statutes is declared to be such that the present Legislature of the State of New Hampshire may lawfully elect a Senator of the United States for the term commencing on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1878.

This bill was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, was considered by that committee, and on the 2d day of June following the introduction of the bill it was reported back from that committee by the Senator from Minnesota who sits on my left, [Mr. MCMILLAN,] then a member of that committee. The report of the Senator from Minnesota was in writing, and was concurred in by the whole committee. The report discusses elaborately and ably the construction of the act of 1866, and concludes with this opinion:

We think, therefore, that an election in strict pursuance of the act of Congress of 1866 which shall take place in 1879 will be valid, and that there is no provision of law which warrants an election by the present Legislature of the State.

For these reasons your committee report adversely to this bill, and recommend that it be indefinitely postponed.

Thereupon without any discussion the bill was indefinitely postponed; but that was not the last of the attempt to get the State of

New Hampshire out of the unfortunate position in which she found herself at that time in regard to the election of a Senator to succeed Mr. Wadleigh.

A bill passed the House of Representatives which authorized the State of West Virginia to choose members of the lower House of Congress in October, instead of November. That bill in the regular course of business came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Two amendments were recommended by that committee. One provided for the election of Representatives to the lower House of Congress in the State of North Carolina, and the other sought to provide for this New Hampshire case. The amendment in reference to the New Hampshire case was section 4 of the bill as reported, and it reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That the present Legislature of the State of New Hampshire may, if it shall so elect, at any time after the passage of this act, and during its session commencing on the first Wednesday of June, A. D. 1878, begin the election of and elect a Senator to represent said State in the Senate of the United States for the term of six years, beginning March 4, 1879; said election of Senator to be conducted according to the laws now in force, except so far as the same relate to the time of making such election.

It was upon the adoption of this amendment that the discussion referred to yesterday by my colleague [Mr. CARPENTER] occurred. This amendment was adopted by the Senate. The amendment in reference to the election of Representatives to the lower House from the State of North Carolina was also adopted. The bill as thus amended by the Senate went back to the House of Representatives for concurrence in those amendments. The House concurred in the amendment in reference to the election of Representatives from the State of North Carolina, but refused to concur in the amendment providing for the election of a Senator by the then Legislature of New Hampshire.

I think now my colleague will admit that the effort made to get the State of New Hampshire out of the position in which she then was in reference to the election of a Senator was not a mere trick. The Senate added to a bill that came from the House an amendment which authorized in express terms the then Legislature to elect a Senator.

Mr. INGALLS. May I interrupt the Senator a moment there to ask him if the Committee on Privileges and Elections did not on the same or a subsequent day report that the Legislature of New Hampshire elected in March, 1878, could not elect a Senator, and if the Senate did not adopt that report?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator was absent when I commenced my remarks. I have already referred to that. The report was made from the committee by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.]

Mr. INGALLS. I was out of the Chamber and did not hear that.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The report was made upon a bill introduced by myself on the 31st of May.

But, Mr. President, this is not the first time that the construction of the act of 1866 has arisen in this body. It arose in 1871 in the Blodgett and Norwood case from the State of Georgia. The facts of that case were these: Blodgett claimed to have been elected in 1870 by a Legislature chosen in 1868; Norwood claimed to have been elected in 1871 by a Legislature chosen in December, 1871. There was no question made in regard to the legality of either Legislature. There was no question made in regard to the mere regularity of the election of either Mr. Blodgett or Mr. Norwood. The credentials of each were presented to the Senate; they were regular in form, and the only question there was in the case was a question arising from the construction of the act of 1866. The credentials of both these claimants were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and on the 18th day of December, 1871, "Mr. CARPENTER," then a member of that committee, made a report to the Senate. I will ask the leave of the Senate to read a portion of this report. After stating the case the report proceeds:

The Constitution, article 1, section 3, provides that Senators shall be chosen by the Legislatures of the respective States. Section 4 of the same article provides: "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The first clause of this section commits to the Legislatures of the States primarily, the whole subject of electing Senators and Representatives, and authorizes them to make such regulations upon the subject as they may deem proper. The phrase "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives" embraces the whole subject of election of Senators, except that the election must be made by the Legislature of the State, as provided in the third section. The Legislature may therefore provide that a Senator shall be elected by the Legislature to be chosen next before the expiration of a term or next after its commencement. The second clause quoted from the fourth section confers upon Congress the same power and absolute control over the subject, to be exercised in the discretion of Congress, except that Congress cannot fix a place for holding the election different from that fixed by the State Legislature.

In the exercise of this undoubted constitutional power Congress passed an act regulating the election of Senators, approved July 25, 1866, (14 Stat. at Large, page 243,) which provides:

"The Legislature of each State which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected to represent said State in Congress shall, on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization thereof, proceed to elect a Senator in Congress in place of such Senator so going out of office."

Foster Blodgett claims to have been elected on the 15th day of February, A. D. 1870, by the Legislature then existing and in session. He received the requisite number of votes, and his credentials are in due form. The question therefore is whether it was competent for that Legislature to elect a Senator to serve during the term before mentioned. If this question can be answered in the affirmative, Mr. Blodgett is entitled to the seat; if not his pretended election was an absolute nullity. The answer to this question depends upon the true construction of the act of Congress before quoted. It is claimed by Mr. Blodgett that chosen and elected mean different things; that legislators are elected by the people, but that legislators are not the Legislature; and that the Legislature is not chosen until the members elected assemble as provided by law and organize as a Legislature by determining what persons elected or claiming to be elected are entitled to seats. That is, the people elect the legislators, and the legislators, after their election, choose the Legislature; and hence the Legislature which was, in fact, organized next preceding the expiration of the term of office is the one authorized to elect a successor, without regard to the time when the members of such Legislature were elected by the people.

The report proceeds:

This refinement of reasoning does not meet the approbation of your committee. The question is, What was the intention of Congress in passing this act? The Legislature designated by the act is the one "which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time," &c. There is no such thing as choosing a Legislature, except by choosing its members. The Constitution declares that Senators shall be elected by the Legislature of each State. Hence the act of Congress employs the same phrase. But your committee cannot doubt that it was the intention of Congress to provide that the Legislature whose members should be elected next preceding the expiration of the senatorial term should elect the successor. The distinction sought to be established between the words elected and chosen derives no support from popular or legal lexicography. Elected is defined chosen, and chosen is defined elected; and the words are used as synonymous in the Constitution of the United States, the constitution of every State, in all our statutes, and in all popular literature.

Again, the report proceeds:

Subsequently to Mr. Blodgett's pretended election the Legislature provided by law, as it was authorized to do by the constitution of the State, that the Legislature which was to be elected in November, 1870, and organized in January, 1871, as required by law at the time of Blodgett's pretended election, should not be elected until December, 1870, and should not convene and organize until November, 1871. But, if your committee are right in their construction of the act of Congress, the Legislature which convened in November, 1871, was the Legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of the senatorial term, and, consequently, that Legislature was the one which was authorized to elect the successor; and this Legislature did, in fact, elect Mr. Norwood.

The vacancy happened—I use that word—in the office of the Senator from Georgia, on the 3d day of March, 1871. Subsequent to that time a Legislature was elected or chosen; that Legislature was elected I think in November, 1871. That Legislature, chosen eight months after the vacancy had happened, elected Mr. Norwood. Mr. Blodgett claimed to have been elected by the Legislature which had last organized prior to the occurring of the vacancy. But the committee held that the Legislature which elected Norwood was the only Legislature which could elect for that term. The committee reported a resolution authorizing the administration of the oath to Mr. Norwood, and thereupon the oath was administered to him and he was admitted.

So this law of 1866 received construction from the Senate in 1871; and it again received construction from the Senate in 1878. The construction adopted by the Senate in 1871 was followed by the Senate in 1878. The Legislature which elected Blodgett acted first. Blodgett claimed to have been elected about a year before Norwood claimed to have been elected, and he claimed to have been elected before the Legislature which elected Norwood was chosen.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Wisconsin will allow me to say that in that case in Georgia to which he refers the Legislature that elected Mr. Norwood was chosen previously to the expiration of the term, and the actual session of that Legislature in regular session was postponed by an act of the previous Legislature itself till the next November after the commencement of the regular term. Yet it was held and understood that the Legislature which had been elected and which chose Mr. Norwood Senator was the Legislature in existence previously to the expiration of the senatorial term; and if there had been a called session of the Legislature, that Legislature would have been called, and not the old one. Therefore the term of legislative service of the Legislature which elected Mr. Blodgett did in fact expire before the expiration of the senatorial term.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from Georgia, I have no doubt, is more accurately informed in regard to this part of the history of his own State than I am; but it appears, from the report made by Mr. CARPENTER to the Senate in 1871, that the vacancy, if you call it a vacancy—I call it that for convenience—in the office of Senator from that State happened on the 3d day of March, 1871.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Well, in November, 1871, the Legislature which elected Mr. Norwood was elected by the people of Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, that Legislature was elected in December, 1870, before the expiration of the old term in March, 1871, but it did not assemble in session until November, 1871. If, however, there had been an extra session of Congress called during the year 1871 so as to have made it important to have the term filled, and the Legislature had been convened in extra session for that purpose, it would have been the Legislature elected in December, 1870.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I see the Senator is right in regard to the time of the election of that Legislature. It was elected in December, 1870, but it did not convene until November, 1871.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It did not convene until November, 1871, but nevertheless it was the Legislature in existence.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That is not the point. The point is, which Legislature was chosen next prior to the expiration of the term. That is the point I was making, and that is the point in this case—which was last chosen? The Legislature that elected Mr. Norwood was chosen in December, 1870; the vacancy occurred in March, 1871. That Legislature convened in November, 1871.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator will see the difference between the New Hampshire case and the Georgia case. I am not discussing the question now, and only want to get the facts right. In the New Hampshire case, while the members of the Legislature were elected in November, 1878, by their constitution they have no legislative existence until June, 1879; whereas in Georgia, by our law, the Legislature which was elected in December, 1870, while it did not have a session until November, 1871, did have a legislative existence; and if a Legislature had been called together in extra session it would have been the newly elected Legislature, whereas in New Hampshire, if the governor now were to call an extra session of the Legislature it would be the old Legislature of March, 1878, and not the Legislature of November, 1878. That is the difference between the two cases.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The point is, which was chosen next prior to the occurring of the vacancy? It has been contended here that that Legislature which assembled and was organized next prior to the occurring of the vacancy was the Legislature which could elect. The Senator from Georgia has not maintained that, but it was to that point that I was addressing myself. So, then, so far as this case is concerned, the Georgia case is an authority.

It is true, as the Senator states, that if, after the 3d of March, 1871, the Legislature of Georgia had been convened in extra session, it would have been the new Legislature, the Legislature that elected Mr. Norwood. It was not, however, convened in extra session. But that is not the point. The point I make is that, in the language of the Constitution and in the language of the act of 1866, the Legislature which was chosen next prior to the occurring of the vacancy is the Legislature which must elect. It has been contended, as I have stated, by more than one Senator that the word "chosen" does not apply to the Legislature which was last elected prior to the occurring of the vacancy, but to the Legislature which actually assembles and organizes prior to the vacancy. It was to that point that I was addressing myself.

I was remarking that the act of 1866 has twice received construction from the Senate, and in each case the Senate has held that the Legislature chosen, in other words the Legislature elected, last prior to the occurring of the vacancy is the Legislature and the only Legislature which can elect the Senator. That is what we claim in this case. It has been claimed that the present Legislature could elect. Those who claim that make a distinction between the word "chosen" and the word "elected." Mr. Blodgett made that distinction, it appears from the report of the committee, in the argument which he made or caused to be made before the committee; but the distinction was repudiated by the committee and repudiated by the Senate.

I think, then, Mr. President, in the light of the decisions of the Senate, there can be no question that the Legislature of New Hampshire elected in March, 1878, could not elect a successor to Mr. Wadleigh.

Now passing from that point—and I do not propose to go at all elaborately into the discussion which has been gone over before—it is conceded that section 3 of article 1 of the Constitution is the controlling provision of the Constitution in this case. That being the law, the only question that the Senate really need decide in order to determine whether Mr. Bell is entitled to a seat upon this floor is this: Had a vacancy happened in the office of Senator from New Hampshire at the time of Mr. Bell's appointment which legally could be filled by the executive of that State? This was the question submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. A majority of the committee answered the question in the negative; a minority answered the question in the affirmative. It has been said, and said truly, that this case really has no political significance, and yet I fear the country will regard it as a significant fact that the committee in dividing upon this question divided exactly upon the political line. I was in hopes before the question was finally determined by the committee that some of our democratic brethren on the committee would come over to us. They could have done so and not endanger the chance of a majority report.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator will allow me to say that while it was desired very much that we should go over to him there was one trouble in the way, and that was we should have to abandon the Constitution to get over to him.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am aware that the Senator from Georgia is of that opinion, but I am emboldened to differ from him, for the reason that some very excellent lawyers in this body—I do not claim to be one—differ from the Senator from Georgia. I was in hopes, to state it differently, that some of our democratic brethren would be able to understand the Constitution as we do. I am pleased, however, to discover from the discussion that has taken place in the Senate that when the question is decided by the Senate the Senate will not divide upon the political line.

One rule for the construction of statutes is that words of common use are to be taken in their natural, plain, obvious, and ordinary signification, unless the contrary plainly appear from the context. The three governing words in the provision of the Constitution which has been referred to as being the governing clause in this case are the words "vacancy," "happen," and "otherwise." These three words are words in common use. It does not appear plainly from the context that they are to be understood otherwise than in their ordinary, common, popular signification.

Now, what does the word "vacancy" mean? We go to the dictionary for the meaning of the word, and it is defined as "a place or office not occupied, or destitute of a person to fill it." What is the meaning of the word "happen?" "To come by chance; to come without previous expectation; to fall out;" second, "to come; to befall." To illustrate, "they talked together of all these things which had happened." What is the meaning of the word "otherwise?" I give all the meanings of the word "otherwise" that are contained in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary:

> In a different manner; under different circumstances; in different respects.

Now, bear in mind that the office of Senator is a continuing office. New Hampshire is entitled to two Senators upon this floor. New Hampshire is entitled to fill two of the senatorial seats upon this floor. Prior to the 4th day of March last she did have two Senators upon this floor; she did fill two senatorial seats. Since that time she has had only one Senator upon this floor; she has filled only one senatorial seat. Now, understanding the word "vacancy" in its popular, common sense, I say that a vacancy has happened. In other words, a seat which was occupied prior to the 4th of March is not occupied now.

But it is said by the majority in their report that a vacancy cannot happen at the commencement of a term. Bearing in mind a preceding clause in the same section of the Constitution, which provides that the seats of Senators shall be vacated at the end of six years, can it be said that if the seat is vacated it is still occupied; and if not occupied is it not perfectly apparent that there must be a vacancy?

It has been stated repeatedly that one leading object of the Constitution was to keep the seats of Senators always full. That I believe has not been dissented from. But the framers of the Constitution saw that a vacancy might happen, might come to pass, might befall, during the recess of the Legislature, when it would be, not impossible, but inconvenient and expensive to assemble the Legislature for the purpose of filling that vacancy. To provide against that contingency the Constitution provides that the executive may fill vacancies. The Constitution makes no distinction between vacancies which happen at the commencement of the term, in the middle of the term, or at the end of the term; it speaks of "vacancies."

Now, in regard to the construction to be given to the word "otherwise," I have quoted all the meanings given to that word in Webster's Unabridged Dictionary; and, understanding the word in that sense, "otherwise" means "in any other manner," nothing more nor less; and the clause is "vacancies happening by resignation or in any other manner." As is stated in the report of the minority we are aided in the construction of this clause of the Constitution by referring to other analogous clauses of that instrument. The clause of the Constitution which authorizes vacancies that happen in the House of Representatives to be filled, or, to use the language of the Constitution itself, "in the representation from any State," is not identical with the language of the Constitution which authorizes the filling of vacancies in the Senate by the executive of a State, but I submit that it is identical in signification. That clause has received construction by the House of Representatives. I am not prepared to say that the construction given to it in the case to which I am about to refer has always been followed by the House. I do not know whether it has or has not, and I do not refer to this case as authority, but simply for the purpose of showing what the opinion of distinguished lawyers, then members of that House, was in regard to the construction of the words "vacancy" and "happen."

The question arose in the Twenty-fifth Congress in the case of Gholson and Claiborne. The facts of that case were simply these: the Twenty-fourth Congress expired by limitation on the 3d of March, 1837. President Van Buren issued a proclamation convening Congress in extra session in September, 1837. The State of Mississippi had not at that time held its regular congressional election, and consequently was liable to be without representation in the House of Representatives. The governor of that State, assuming that he had the legal right to do so, issued writs of election directing that an election should be held in July for the election of members of the House to serve during the special session of Congress. That was expressly designated as the time for which they would serve, in the writ of election. Pursuant to the writ of election an election was held in that State in July, 1837, and Messrs. Gholson and Claiborne, having received a majority of all the votes cast, were declared elected. They received their certificates of election, appeared in the House of Representatives on the first day of the extra session, and were sworn in and took their seats. A question arose after they had taken their seats in regard to the legality of their election. Thereupon the whole matter was referred to the Committee of Elections in the House. That committee reported in September, 1837. Two objections were made to the legality of the election of Gholson and Claiborne. One was that, if elected at all, they were elected for the entire Congress, and that the limitation inserted by the governor in the writ of election vitiated the writ, and consequently that no legal election was held. The committee, after disposing of that objection, proceed with the other; and I will read from the report:

> But the second objection, which would seem to be more formidable, involves the question whether, in the purview and meaning of the Constitution, such vacancy in the representation of the State had happened as would justify the governor in authorizing a special election to fill it. On this question the committee were divided. A majority of them were of opinion that a vacancy existed, and such a vacancy as was pregnant with all the evils which could arise from a vacancy happening in any other manner; and as the words of the Constitution are broad enough to embrace the existing case there is no good reason why, in giving them a practical construction, they should not be considered applicable as affording a remedy in this case as well as those arising from death or resignation. It is evident that all the evils arising from vacancies by death or resignation would exist in a vacancy produced by the expiration of the term of members prior to the election of their successors; and as the words used by the framers of the Constitution will fairly admit of the construction contended for, we are not at liberty to say the remedy prescribed was not intended for this case. On the contrary, the committee are of opinion the Constitution authorizes the executive power of the States respectively to order the filling of all vacancies which have actually happened, in the mode therein pointed out, no matter how the vacancy may have happened, whether by death, resignation, or expiration of the term of members previous to the election of their successors. The word "happen," made use of in the Constitution, is not necessarily confined to fortuitous or unforeseen events, but is equally applicable to all events which by any means occur or come to pass, whether foreseen or not; and as in this case confessedly the vacancy existed, it may properly be said to have happened.

Mr. Pennybacker, of Virginia, was a member of the committee, and he expressed himself very strongly and pointedly in support of the views contained in the report of the committee. There was no minority report. John Quincy Adams was a member of the House at that time and participated in the debate. He said:

The question was not as to whether or not the vacancy had been filled, but whether it had been filled for the whole term of the present Congress.

The question made was whether Gholson and Claiborne were elected for the entire Congress or only for the special session. The committee reported, and the House then so decided that they were elected for the entire Congress and not for the special session merely. But I was quoting from Mr. Adams. He said:

The question was not as to whether or not the vacancy had been filled, but whether it had been filled for the whole term of the present Congress. The law of the State of Mississippi made it clear that, although the governor had a right to issue his writ to fill the vacancy, it was only until superseded by the general election in November. He had no right to issue his writ for an election for the whole term, as was evident from the words "until superseded," &c., which were added to the writ. These words had been inserted in conformity with the laws of that State, and had they been omitted the governor would virtually have repealed the State law. But it might be taken for granted that a large portion of the people at the polls believed they were electing members for the whole term.

Mr. Adams conceded that the governor had a right to issue his writ for the purpose of electing members of the House of Representatives to serve during the extra session, but denied that he had a right to issue his writ to elect members to serve for the whole Congress.

The question as to the right of Gholson and Claiborne to retain their seats came up at the regular session of the same Congress in January, 1838. The House then rescinded the resolution which had been adopted at the extra session seating Gholson and Claiborne, and at the regular election held in November Prentiss and Word received a majority of the votes cast. They presented themselves at the regular session and demanded their seats, and Congress at the regular session first decided that Claiborne and Gholson were not elected for the entire Congress, not that they were not legally elected to serve during the special session of Congress; and they next decided that Prentiss and Word were not elected. That decision, as was stated by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, was had by the casting vote of James K. Polk, then Speaker of the House of Representatives.

It does not appear to have been questioned at all in that case that the governor of Mississippi had a right to issue his writ calling an election for the purpose of electing members to serve during the special session. The only question was whether he could issue his writ for the election of members to serve during the entire Congress.

As was mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, the provision of the Constitution which authorizes the President in the recess of the Senate to fill up all vacancies that occur in civil offices is construed by the executive department and recognized by Congress to mean that he may fill up not only the terms of officers who have regular and stated terms, but also those where the term is not a regular or stated term but made during life or good behavior.

I say then, sir, that applying the rules for the construction of statutes to which I have alluded to this provision of the Constitution, the conclusion which the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections arrived at is correct. Applying the construction given to a similar provision authorizing the filling of vacancies in the House of Representatives, the conclusion arrived at by the minority of the committee is correct. Applying the construction which has been given to that provision of the Constitution authorizing the Executive of the United States to fill up vacancies during the recess of the Senate, the conclusion arrived at by the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections is correct.

I do not care, Mr. President, to go over again the question of the precedents in the Senate. It is conceded, I believe on all sides, that there is no precedent in the Senate which can be claimed as an authority against the admission of Mr. Bell at this time, until the Lanman case in 1825. A great deal has been said concerning the point which was decided in the Lanman case. I admit that it may have been decided on either one of two points. It may have been decided upon the ground that the executive of a State could not appoint a Senator to a term to begin at the commencement of a senatorial term, or it may have been decided, as the minority of the committee believe it was decided, upon the ground stated in their report. The contemporaneous authorities seem to be in support of the understanding of this decision arrived at by the minority of the committee. It is said that the fugitive article—I believe some Senator called it a fugitive article—in the National Intelligencer did not really amount to anything. We all know that the National Intelligencer was edited not only with great ability but with exceeding care. We know that its editors were among the most accomplished journalists of their day, and it is quite likely that either the one or the other of the editors of the Intelligencer was present during the debate upon the Lanman case, heard that debate, and knew personally precisely what point was decided. At any rate, on the next day after the decision there was an article in the Intelligencer stating the point which had been decided in the Lanman case to be that the executive of a State could not appoint a Senator to fill a vacancy until the vacancy actually happened, actually existed. Judge Story, as has already been stated so many times, understood the decision in the same way. Mr. Gordon, who has been vouched for as an able lawyer and a careful compiler, understood the decision in the same way.

It has been suggested that even the statement made in the National Intelligencer on the day subsequent to the decision would not have been allowed to pass unchallenged had it not been the correct statement of the decision.

I called the attention of one of the Senators the other day to the head-note, the syllabus to the Lanman case as reported in Bartlett's volume of contested-election cases. That compilation was made in 1834, not very long after the decision. I understand that Mr. Bartlett was a very careful and accomplished compiler and editor of these decisions.

Notwithstanding what was said by some Senators in subsequent debates when a different point was under consideration by the Senate, the case referred to this morning by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] did not involve the question which is involved in this case. This question was not involved in the Sevier case. In regard to that case it is true that Mr. Grundy states in his report that the committee did not intend to overrule the decision in the Lanman case, and yet after making that statement the committee decide directly opposite to the Lanman case if that decision be what is now contended. Is it not more important to look at what the committee actually did than at what they stated? The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] very frankly admitted yesterday that the Sevier case cannot be reconciled with the Lanman case.

I do not care, Mr. President, to pursue this discussion any further. It has been said by some Senators that they entered upon the investigation of this question with an earnest desire that Mr. Bell should be seated. I cannot say that I entered upon it with such an earnest desire. I entered upon it with the desire of arriving at a correct conclusion in regard to the law; and if in that conclusion under the law as we understood it Mr. Bell could be seated, very well; and if not, just as well.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, I have a very few words to add to the discussion which has already taken place, and shall content myself with stating substantially the reasons which lead me to the conclusion to which I have arrived and to the vote which I shall cast.

I have felt, Mr. President, the importance of keeping in mind the exact state of facts upon which the Senate is now called to decide the question submitted to it. The Senator from Wisconsin on my right who has just taken his seat [Mr. CAMERON] has stated the facts accurately and clearly. The point to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate now in regard to that statement of facts is, that under the constitution of New Hampshire the Legislature which was chosen prior to the expiration of the senatorial term of Mr. Wadleigh does not convene until June, and that the Legislature which now exists in that State could not elect a Senator to fill this vacancy, because it is not the Legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of that term.

Mr. President, it has been emphasized during this debate that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to secure to the States continued representation in the Senate. That is apparent from all the provisions affecting this question. The first clause of section 3, article 1, provides for the composition of the Senate, the term of the Senators, and the suffrage of each Senator. By that provision the Senators from each State are to be chosen by the Legislature thereof, and by the act of Congress now in existence the Legislature chosen prior to the expiration of the term which is to be filled must elect the Senator. Provision exists in all the States, and as well in New Hampshire, for a Legislature. She is not without a Legislature. Her Legislature continues. There is no interruption in the existence of the Legislature of that State, but circumstances have transpired which have occasioned this want of power to elect a successor to Mr. Wadleigh.

Now, it is urged that a vacancy within the meaning of this Constitution cannot exist at the commencement of a term, but that the term must be filled in part before such a vacancy can in any event transpire; and the ground upon which that position is urged is this: that the expiration of the term of a Senator is a fact which is certain, which must be foreseen, and the Constitution did not intend to provide that the governor should fill a vacancy in that case but only where some unforeseen contingency transpired which made a vacancy. It is not the expiration of the term alone which creates a vacancy. In all cases the term of a Senator expires at a fixed time; but the law provides that the Legislature may elect a person who shall succeed the Senator whose term expires. When that power is exercised, when a Legislature exists which can elect a Senator, the election transpiring before the expiration of a term, the new Senator comes in and takes his seat, and there is no vacancy. It cannot be said that a vacancy occurs in that case because the successor immediately follows upon the term which expires before his term commences.

Then there must have been some other event which occasions this vacancy. There must have been some other contingency upon which this vacancy depends. That was the non-existence of a Legislature which could fill the vacancy. That occurred how? Not intentionally on the part of the State of New Hampshire. New Hampshire has all the provisions of her Legislature, she has a Legislature complete, and has provided for a Legislature which shall meet and succeed the one now in existence, but by an unforeseen circumstance, by a contingency which was not foreseen, by an omission upon the part of the people of that State, the provisions of law do not exist by which a successor can be elected until June.

It is said that the framers of the Constitution saw that these terms must expire. It is true they did; but they intended to provide for every contingency which might reasonably or properly happen; and here is a clear omission, a clear mistake, a pure oversight on the part of the people of New Hampshire, by which this difficulty has occurred. Is it true that the framers of the Constitution under such circumstances have framed an instrument with a casus omissus of this kind? The State cannot be said to have consented to this vacancy; it cannot be said that New Hampshire consented that she should not have her representation here from and after the 4th of March and during this extra session of Congress. It was a pure oversight on the part of the people of that State in changing their constitution. The constitution of 1792 of that State provided for annual sessions of her Legislature, which was chosen annually in March, and met by another provision, and a distinct provision of the constitution of that State, in June. The people of the State in 1877 adopted an amendment of that constitution by which the sessions of her Legislature were made biennial and the members were to be elected in November. In making that change the fact was not adverted to that by another provision of the constitution the Legislature was to meet in June, and it was a pure oversight that that also was not changed.

It cannot be said that the people of New Hampshire intended to put themselves in a position where they could not be represented in this body. They have here resorted to every means in their power to correct that mistake; and in view of the fact that the Constitution provides that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate, it will not be said that New Hampshire has consented to this state of affairs. That is too important a right.

Then it is not the expiration of the term alone which has created this vacancy. It is the failure of the Legislature to elect a successor to Mr. Wadleigh whose term expired on the 3d of March, and that failure did not take place with the consent of New Hampshire. She cannot be said to have consented when the omission was in the manner I have stated.

Now, Mr. President, it is probable, it is reasonable as long as men are imperfect that these mistakes will occur. Men are not infallible, and States are composed of men; so that these irregularities and others of a similar character might occur; and the intention of the framers of the Constitution was to make a provision which would not leave a State unrepresented under any circumstances which might reasonably occur. It was then, even within the construction of the word "happen" given by Senators on the other side of this question, a contingency. If that be so, the Legislature chosen in November, 1878, not being in session at the expiration of this term, the governor in the exercise of his powers filled this vacancy and his appointee is here with his credentials claiming his seat.

Under these circumstances, in addition to many other reasons which have been stated, I think the claimant should be admitted to his seat.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, I rise at this time more for the purpose of stating very briefly the reasons why I shall vote in favor of the views presented by the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in this case rather than to influence the vote of any other Senator.

The appointment of Mr. Bell in my opinion is within the spirit of the Constitution, and I believe it to be within the letter of the Constitution; and, therefore, in my judgment, he is entitled to the seat that he is asking for in this case.

This, as is admitted by all, is a permanent body, the permanent branch of the National Legislature. The purpose of its creation was that it should be perpetual, and its constituent parts are made up of the representatives of the States. Each State is entitled to two Senators in this body, to two representatives on this floor. They are to be chosen by the Legislatures of the several States. The legislative authority of each State, therefore, has vested in it the power of electing or choosing Senators. But the Constitution has provided that—

> If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

It is a conceded fact that a vacancy exists in the senatorial representation from the State of New Hampshire. She has but one voice in this Chamber at this time. It is a fact, of which we are bound to take notice, that this vacancy happening on the 3d of March by the expiration of the term of the former incumbent occurred, or "happened," in the language of the Constitution, during a recess of the Legislature of that State, for that is a matter of which we are bound to take judicial notice, so that the two main facts upon which the right of the executive of that State to act and to provide for perpetuity in this body by a temporary appointment exist in this case—a vacancy, and the occurring of this vacancy during a recess of the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire. The State, then, is entitled to this seat here.

It has been admitted on all hands that in construing powers like this, organic powers designed for the organization and perpetuity of government, every intendment should be in favor of the accomplishment of that object, and therefore a liberal construction should be given to the language to secure the purpose intended, the object designed, the perpetuity of the body, the continuance of that representation until the proper power in which is vested the authority to elect for the term shall be in session and may exercise its authority.

The latter part of this clause of the Constitution has been constantly liberally construed by the Senate. Where it is conceded that the governor had the right to make an appointment, the appointment does not terminate, as it might by a very strict construction of the latter clause of this clause, on the meeting of the Legislature of that State in which the vacancy exists and where the appointment is made, but it has been continually held that the appointee continues to hold, not merely until the meeting of the Legislature, but until the Legislature has chosen a successor, and thus terminated the temporary appointment, or until the Legislature has sat out its term and failed to act in the premises.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. Suppose there was no election of a Senator by the Legislature, and no effort to elect a Senator, what would become of the governor's appointee then?

Mr. McDONALD. I had already stated that before the question was asked.

Mr. EATON. I did not hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. McDONALD. I stated that this appointment, temporary as the Constitution declares it to be, continues until the end of the next session of the Legislature, unless they sooner fill it; and if they fail, of course then a contingency has arisen for that time at least when the State is without its equal suffrage in the Senate by its own consent, and the governor cannot appoint.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it ought to take a strong, unbroken line of precedent or a clear and well-settled construction of the Constitution to the contrary to authorize us to deny to a State, when she is asking it, her equal suffrage in the Senate. To justify such a denial the Constitution should be so clear upon the subject that there can be no two questions in regard to it. So far as the question of precedent is concerned, if I understand the cases that have been cited, (and I have given some attention to them,) they are as to number largely in favor of the construction that I am insisting upon. Down to 1825 eight Senators had been seated here upon appointments made by the executives of the States, many of them appointed to unfilled terms where the Legislature at the time of the occurring of the vacancy was not in session.

Mr. ROLLINS. All of the eight.

Mr. McDONALD. All of the eight. But in 1825 a vacancy occurred in the representation in the Senate from the State of Connecticut. It was the second time a vacancy had occurred from that State under the same circumstances. The first time the appointee of the governor was received and seated by a vote of 13 to 10. On the next occasion question was made as to his admission, and after some debate, for particular reasons which have not been made very clearly to appear in this discussion, by a vote of 23 to 18 the appointee was excluded. The report of the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the present case informs us that there is no preservation of that debate so as to know the particular reasons given or the particular conclusions arrived at by the various Senators who discussed the question. This report says:

> No record of this debate has been preserved, and the committee have not the advantage of the reasoning by which the Senate was guided in its action.

But it is now said that the Senate then decided by a vote of 23 to 18 that the governor's power to appoint has a limitation, that it can only be exercised where the vacancy has arisen by mere accident, and that it cannot be exercised where the vacancy has occurred by the expiration of a term. That may have been the ground upon which the Senate at that time by its vote determined that Mr. Lanman was not entitled to his seat; but, if so, in 1837 another case was brought forward here of precisely the same character, it being an appointment to begin a term. In the appointment of Sevier, of Arkansas, as his own successor, precisely the same case in principle was presented that was passed upon in 1825; but it is said that the committee having charge of that case drew a distinction between it and the Lanman case, and the Senate affirmed the action of the committee. If the committee did so they drew a distinction without a difference. Those who advocate the settlement of this question upon the Lanman case have been compelled to admit in this debate that there is no difference in point of fact between the appointment made in the case of Senator Sevier and that of Mr. Lanman, of Connecticut.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator states that Senators have been compelled to admit that there was no difference in point of fact between Sevier's case and Lanman's case. Certainly the Senator did not measure exactly the force of that expression. The facts as I understand them were different in one respect. Sevier's term was terminated by lot, or, as expressed the other day by a Senator, by a lottery; in other words, he drew under the order of the Senate by lot the class to which he should be assigned. At the time of his election or at any time prior to the determination of that lot, the Legislature of Arkansas could not tell when his term of office would expire. That fact made the point of distinction which was drawn by the committee in the two cases.

Permit me to say another word just here. It seems that the minority of eighteen of that date were of the opinion of the majority in 1825 in the Lanman case, and voted against the admission of Mr. Sevier. I may say that some of the greatest constitutional lawyers this country has produced, among others Mr. Webster, Mr. Clay, and Mr. Crittenden, voted in that case, as I understand, to sustain the decision of the Senate in the Lanman case.

Mr. McDONALD. The explanation of the Senator from Tennessee has not changed this proposition in any respect. Mr. Lanman was appointed his own successor, his term having expired on the 3d of March; Mr. Sevier was appointed his own successor, his term having expired on the 3d of March; but the Senator from Tennessee says—and the report of the committee undertakes to draw the same distinction—that because Mr. Sevier drew the short term and did not sit under his first election for six years as he might have done if he had drawn the full term, therefore there was a difference in the two cases; the Legislature not being able to determine when they elected him what particular term he would draw. But he drew his term in pursuance of the Constitution: his term terminated by the limitation fixed in the Constitution. If the governor of a State has the right under this power in the Constitution to appoint for the beginning of a term in one case, I should like gentlemen to tell me where the limitation is to be put upon him after that? If he may appoint to fill a vacancy that has happened by the expiration of any term, short or long, which is fixed by law and which terminates by law, why may he not equally appoint at the beginning of a term which runs for four years or six years?

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator ask me a question?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I say that in my opinion the decision in Sevier's case was wrong.

Mr. McDONALD. Exactly.

Mr. BAILEY. The facts were not identical with the facts in the Lanman case. The Senate, in 1837, attached to the distinction between the facts in the two cases an importance that I myself do not. I agree with what has been stated by other Senators, that the decision in Sevier's case was a wrong decision, but the report of the committee showed that it intended to recognize a principle which was settled in the Lanman case, a principle which has been recognized from the time Lanman's case was decided to this day, and never before now disputed upon the floor of the Senate.

Mr. McDONALD. That is, the committee intended to recognize the principle that the power of the governor to appoint could only be exercised where a vacancy occurred during a term and during the recess of the Legislature of the State in which it occurred. That I understand to be what is claimed was the decision in the Lanman case, although many Senators may have voted for the rejection of Lanman upon different grounds. There are contemporaneous statements which indicate very clearly that that may have been the case, and probably it was the case. Therefore the committee then recognized in the Sevier case, as the Senator from Tennessee says, the principle of the Lanman case, and then they violated it by reporting that Mr. Sevier, appointed to commence a term as his own successor, was rightfully appointed by the governor of his State, and could hold that temporary appointment until the next meeting of the Legislature.

The Senator from Tennessee and those who stand with him say that the Lanman case was decided right upon the propositions which they state, and they admit that the Sevier case was decided wrong if the Lanman case was decided right; so that they take as their precedent the Lanman case, which, according to the principles necessarily ruled on upon the facts presented in the Sevier case, was overruled twelve years afterward, and they make that the ground of their action in this case.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Sevier decision may have been right or it may have been wrong. With that case the committee which made this report have had nothing to do except as a precedent. But in that case the committee which had charge of Sevier's application for admission expressly indorsed the principles established in the Lanman case. While it is true that the committee may have committed an error, and the Senate may have done wrong in the admission of Sevier, it is very clear that that decision does not overrule the Lanman case, because it expressly sustains the Lanman case, and the committee seeks to draw a distinction, certainly a distinction satisfactory to itself, if it may not be satisfactory to the Senator from Indiana and myself.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask my friend from Alabama a question in return. What does he understand to be the principle settled in the Lanman case?

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no doubt about the principle settled in the Lanman case. I did not suppose any question existed upon that point at all. The principle was that the governor of a State has no authority to appoint a Senator where the vacancy, if you call it a vacancy, grows out of the fact of the expiration of a previous regular term of service.

Mr. McDONALD. Then, let me ask my friend what is the principle settled in the Sevier case?

Mr. HOUSTON. That it is wholly unimportant for me to state, because while that decision may be wrong, and I think it was wrong, yet outside of the error of its assimilating cases it establishes and reasserts the principle decided in the Lanman case.

Mr. McDONALD. To the extent that my friend claims for it, which is that the governor cannot appoint to begin a term. Is it contended that that is the decision in the Sevier case, that that is the recognition of the committee which reported that case, when it reported in favor of seating a man whose credentials stand upon precisely the same ground, an appointment to begin a term which had terminated in his own person?

Mr. HOUSTON. Not exactly that. The committee which decided in favor of the admission of Sevier thought there was a distinction between the two cases. In the Lanman case there was a regular expiration of the term of service of six years. In the Sevier case the fact was not precisely in that condition. It is true the term of service of Sevier under the Constitution expired, but the committee thought (and of course I have nothing to say about their judgment, for I have no power to revise it) because Sevier was elected in September previous and drew lots and happened to draw a short term when the Legislature had adjourned and could not have provided for it, that was an excuse to the Legislature for not having provided for the election of Sevier's successor, because they had a right to suppose that probably he would draw a better term than he did. That was their only reason, I presume.

Mr. McDONALD. Then I understand that the committee having charge of the Sevier case agreed that in the Lanman case it had been determined by the Senate that the governor could not appoint to begin a term, and that the case they had under consideration differed from the Lanman case because that term had been shortened by the provisions of the Constitution and was not to run for the six years for which Mr. Sevier might have been elected. I understand that that constituted the distinction, and therefore they admit that there may be contingencies in which the governor can exercise that power and fill a seat at the beginning of a term.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is not the ground upon which the committee put it. If the Senator desires to put it upon that ground, I have nothing to say. I am not here to defend that committee at all. In my judgment they made a wrong decision and a wrong admission of a Senator, but that is past. While that is true in my opinion it does not affect the judgment of the committee outside of that act when they declare that the Lanman decision is the true establishment of the law.

Mr. McDONALD. The difference between the Senator from Alabama and myself is just this: I think the committee in that case made a right decision and gave a wrong reason for it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not think so.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator from Alabama takes the reason, and I insist upon the decision, and as a question of legal authority I think the weight of authority is on my side.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. McDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Indiana asked the Senator from Alabama a few moments ago what was the principle settled in the Sevier case. I think from the report of that committee, if there was any principle at all settled in that case, it was this: that where a contingency happens which cannot be foreseen, the Legislature not being in session, then it is competent for the governor to appoint. That meets precisely the condition which was taken as necessary to enable the governor to appoint by Mr. Badger in his speech in 1854, for he there said that two things must conspire: first, an unforeseen contingency, and, second, the absence of a Legislature to fill it; and if there is any principle whatever settled in the Sevier case, it is that principle; and the decision in that case rests upon that principle that the happening of the vacancy in that case could not possibly have been foreseen by the Legislature, and therefore the governor might fill it.

Mr. McDONALD. My friend from Delaware and I take a very different view in regard to the Lanman case. He says, if anything was settled by that case it was so and so. Now, Mr. President, I do not think that anything was settled by it. That is precisely the point that I have been trying to press, that that case which is insisted upon as having so conclusively settled the construction which is to be given to these clauses of the Constitution that it is not now proper to question it, settled nothing; it stands alone, the solitary case against all the precedents that went before and against the very first decision that was made afterward. Who can tell how many of those twenty-three Senators might have thought that the exercise of that power ought to have been within the letter of the Constitution and that the governor of Connecticut should not have made the appointment until the vacancy had actually occurred? Of the twenty-three who voted on that side against the eighteen who voted to seat Mr. Lanman, how many may have been controlled by that consideration?

It seems to me that when it is insisted by Senators here that we are not to look to our own construction of this instrument, but that we are to be governed and guided by these decisions that they refer us to, and particularly by that in the case of Mr. Lanman, it should be considered that at best the case was passed upon by a mere majority and its principle was overruled twelve years afterward; and standing as it does against all the precedents that went before it, I think it is rather too much to insist that we shall give it now this great weight and authority and under its effect and by its rule as an inexorable rule exclude this State from its equal voice in the Senate.

But it has been said that the proceedings of the constitutional convention disclosed the fact that there is this limitation upon the power. I have looked into that with some care, and I draw a very different conclusion. The very able argument submitted by my friend the Senator from Tennessee was based mainly upon that fact, and yet in examining these documents I have come to a different conclusion. We find that in the original draught of the Constitution as presented by the Committee of Detail, as it was termed, these clauses of the Constitution were in article 5, the first and second sections. As they stood then they read:

The Senate of the United States shall be chosen by the Legislatures of the several States. Each Legislature shall choose two members. Vacancies may be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the Legislature. Each member shall have one vote.

"Vacancies shall be supplied by the executive until the next meeting of the Legislature." My learned friend from Tennessee said that left the question ambiguous as to whether the Legislature could fill the vacancy or not. I do not think there is any ambiguity of that kind. I think there is the strongest implication.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator will permit me to correct him. I have no recollection of having used any such language as that which he attributes to me.

Mr. McDONALD. It is not exactly that, but it is very nearly so. The Senator said, to quote his very words:

It is very clear that doubts were entertained whether under the section as repealed by the committee, the exercise of the power to choose a Senator for six years did not exhaust the power of the Legislature if the Senator should live through the term. He might refuse to accept the office; he might wish to resign; he might be promoted to another office; he might be expelled. The doubt was whether in either of these events a successor could be elected by the Legislature or appointed by the executive.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not say I had doubts. I spoke there of the doubts of others entertained at the time.

Mr. McDONALD. I am quoting the language of the Senator on this point. But that is not exactly in the line of my argument. I do not think there is any doubt that the original section 2 of article 5 as it stood in the draught of the Constitution presented by the Committee of Detail conferred upon the governor of a State the power to fill any vacancy in the Senate until the next meeting of the Legislature. Was it afterward curtailed or purposely stricken out so as to make a limitation? I think not. I think the proceedings of the convention show that it was not the purpose to do it. Reading the same paragraphs of the debate that were read by my distinguished friend, I desire to call attention to all that was said by Mr. Randolph on that occasion.

Mr. WILSON objected to vacancies in the Senate being supplied by the executives of the States. It was unnecessary, as the Legislatures will meet so frequently.

* * * * * * *

Mr. RANDOLPH thought it necessary, in order to prevent inconvenient chasms in the Senate. In some States the Legislatures meet but once a year. As the Senate will have more power, and consist of a smaller number, than the other House, vacancies there will be of more consequence. The executives might be safely trusted, he thought, with the appointment for so short a time.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. It is only said that the executive may supply vacancies. When the Legislature meeting happens to be near, the power will not be exerted. As there will be but two members from a State, vacancies may be of great moment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Senators may resign or not accept. This provision is therefore absolutely necessary.

On the question for striking out "vacancies shall be supplied by the executives"—

The votes stood 1 for the motion and 8 against it, and the State of Maryland divided. The amendment was lost by a vote of 1 to 8 and a divided State.

What addition was afterward made, and why? How did it come that there was any change in the phraseology of this part of the Constitution after this section had been thus passed upon? It appears on a motion made by Mr. Madison on the next morning; and here is what he said in regard to that:

Mr. Madison, in order to prevent doubts whether resignations could be made by Senators, or whether they could refuse to accept, moved to strike out the words after "vacancies," and insert the words "happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the Legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the Legislature."

And so it was passed and went to the Committee of Style and Revision. Now I ask the Senate to note that Mr. Madison's amendment put the power of the governor to fill vacancies upon precisely the same footing as that of the Legislature to fill vacancies. Where vacancies happened, the Legislature might fill them, or the governor might appoint until the next meeting of the Legislature; and the power of one, so far as this question of vacancy is concerned, was equal to the power of the other.

My learned friend said that the Committee of Style had no power to change the meaning of the terms that had been thus sent to them, nor do I believe they had such power, although I believe and say that if a change made by them was such that it could not be reconciled with the text that had been sent to them, we should be compelled to take that which the convention afterward received from them, for that was the last act of the convention. But, in my judgment, they did not change it, and therefore I hold that where a vacancy occurs, if the Legislature is in session it must fill it, and if it is not in session, if it occur in the recess of the Legislature, the governor has the power to make a temporary appointment vested in him by this clause of the Constitution, intended to be so to secure that perpetuity which is necessary to the preservation of this body.

But, Mr. President, there have been a number of precedents cited where States have acted upon what is understood or claimed here to have been the decision in the Lanman case. My own State has been cited as an illustration; but that will not answer. It gives no support to their argument. The vacancy in my State in 1855 occurred on the 3d of March, when the Legislature of the State was in session, and it continued in session until the 10th of March afterward. Consequently one of the occurrences, one of the contingencies upon which this power was conferred on the governor, did not exist in that case.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that on principle, taking into view what the framers of the Constitution were providing for when they drew these sections of the instrument, and above all considering the importance of preserving to every State in this Union its equal suffrage in the Senate, unless it is denied to it by its own consent, we ought to accept this appointment by the governor of the State of New Hampshire And in view of what has been said by other Senators in regard to the misapprehension—if you call it by no other name—of the authorities of the State of New Hampshire in regard to their right to fill this place, it is clear to me that she is voiceless here, so far as one of her Senators is concerned, not by her desire. Shall it be our act? It is not her desire. Shall it be our act to say that she shall not be our equal here until her Legislature shall assemble and fill this place?

Something has been said about which one of the legislative assemblies, if there are two in New Hampshire—there are certainly not two that have a legal existence at the same time—can have authority to fill the place. In my judgment any legislative body in any State that has vested in it the legislative power of that State, being in session when there is a vacancy in the representation of that State, has a right to fill it, a right under the Constitution strictly conferred, and that right cannot be impaired or taken away by any act of Congress or any power outside of the State. There requires, so far as this is concerned, but one thing, for this part of the Constitution in my opinion is self-executing, that there should be a Legislature in session clothed with the law-making power of the State, and a vacancy in the representation of that State in the Senate; and upon the occurring of these two events that place can be filled by that Legislature, just as I believe the present vacancy can be filled by the governor of the State until the next meeting of the Legislature.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, were it not for the importance of this question I would not consume one moment of the time of the Senate, but I feel it incumbent on me to assign the reasons for the vote which I intend to give in this case.

I believe in the right of the State of New Hampshire to two representatives on this floor, and I shall vote for the admission of the present applicant. I shall not undertake to go back to the beginning of the Government to find the law to guide me in the judgment and the opinion I have formed. I think that too much has been said on that subject. I think that we are in a body which is not controlled by the same principles which control courts of justice in settling questions of property. Judicial precedents become established law. They affect the rights of individuals; they affect the titles to property, and it is necessary to preserve them in an unbroken chain. But under the Constitution of the United States each House of Congress is made the exclusive judge of the elections and returns of its own members. It matters but little to my mind in point of law, therefore, what the Senate decided in 1825 or in 1837. If its former conclusion is not satisfactory to me, I feel that I am not compelled to follow it, because the Constitution has invested this body with an independent power to judge for itself respecting the right of the present applicant.

Each House—

Says the Constitution—

shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Not the Senate that met in 1825. It passed upon its case in its day and in its generation. So with respect to the decision which was made in the Arkansas case, in 1837; the members of the Senate then discharged their duty to their own consciences and to the country, and we are now called upon to discharge ours. This case, therefore, must be decided upon its own merits without regard to what has gone before it.

Senator Wadleigh's term of office expired on the 3d of March, 1879. On the 13th of March, 1879, Mr. Bell was appointed in his place by the governor of New Hampshire. In October, 1878, a change was made in the constitution of that State and two Legislatures were chosen in that year—one under the old constitution, the term of which commenced in June of that year and which will end in May of the present year; the other in November, 1878, and which will convene in June, 1879. These are the essential facts of the case.

During the last session of Congress the question was submitted to the Senate whether or not the Legislature which was elected under the old constitution had power to elect a Senator to succeed Mr. Wadleigh. The Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body made a report, which was adopted by the Senate, denying the power of the Legislature elected under the old constitution to elect Mr. Wadleigh's successor. I adopt the language of the majority report.

Mr. BAILEY. Permit me to ask the Senator a question. Was that report made in 1878 adopted by the Senate?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It is so stated in the report of the majority of the committee in the present case, and I have relied upon that for the facts. I will read it:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate in the Forty-fifth Congress, to whom was referred the question which of these two bodies had the right to choose a successor to Mr. Wadleigh, was of opinion, and so reported to the Senate, that under the act of 1866 (Revised Statutes, section 14) the last-named Legislature was entitled to elect, because it was the Legislature chosen next preceding the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term of service. In the opinion of the committee this report and the action of the Senate in adopting it are not important in the settlement of the question now presented.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to say that it is evident, from an examination of the RECORD, that it was a mistake of the committee in reporting that it had been adopted by the Senate. The RECORD, I think, will show that the report of the committee was made recommending the indefinite postponement of a bill, and, without further action on that report, it went over. That is my impression.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I suppose that the indefinite postponement of a bill which a report recommends the postponement of is founded upon the adoption of that report, and I did not suppose that the report of the majority of this committee was erroneous in so important a particular. I say, sir, that this is an important fact, and I disagree with the majority of the committee when they say that it has no bearing in the settlement of this case. I say that it has, and I accepted it as an admission on their part that a report had been made to this body and that the Senate had concurred in that report.

Now, sir, whatever may have been the motives which induced the submission of this question to the Senate, we are bound by the decision upon it. We were not bound to take action on the matter, but having acted, I hope for the sake of the character of this body and the good faith which ought always to attend its deliberations no one will say that the decision arrived at can now be questioned after it was accepted by the State and its right to full representation made to depend upon a necessity which that decision had put upon her.

It was argued here the other day by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] that the State had a right to elect a Senator and failed to exercise that right; but, sir, on every principle of honorable estoppel we cannot complain that the Legislature of New Hampshire elected under the old constitution failed to exercise that right if she had it. He who remains silent, says the law, when he ought to have spoken shall not be heard to complain when he ought to be silent; and it is as good a maxim in political ethics as it is in the courts of justice. Having taken jurisdiction of the question and given an opinion upon it we are just as much bound by it as if it had been given in the case which is now before us.

I hold, then, that the old Legislature had no power to elect Mr. Wadleigh's successor; and if this be true it is as clear as anything can be that the Legislature elected under the new constitution, and which will convene in June next, is the only body that can elect a Senator for the full term from that State. From this state of things a vacancy exists to-day in the Senate. While the Constitution declares that the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State, it is an undisputed fact that the State of New Hampshire has but one Senator in this body to-day. That this is a vacancy in the ordinary sense of the word no one can deny; that it cannot be filled before June next, except by an appointment by the governor, is equally true. New Hampshire is one of the States which ratified the Constitution, and I think there was no man within her borders who voted for its ratification who did not accept its language in a popular rather than a legal sense. It never was imagined that it would require the legal skill and the known abilities of the Senators from Georgia and Wisconsin to make plain to the people the legal import of the word "vacancy" as used in the Constitution, or to tell them of the weight and consequence which was given to the plainest expression which the framers of that instrument could employ.

We are told by the Constitution that the Senate "shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years," that they shall be divided into three classes, so that one-third of the body may be chosen every two years, "and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature." It is insisted that the word "vacancy" as herein employed does not refer to the Senate as a body, but to the terms of the Senators; and before I go any further on that subject I wish to refer to the proceedings of the convention already alluded to by my friend from Indiana.

Mr. Randolph thought it necessary, in order to prevent inconvenient chasms in the Senate—

Not in the terms of the Senators but in the Senate of the United States, that great body which was about to be created, and to which a large portion of the sovereignty of the American people was to be confided. It is contended that the vacancy must arise from resignation, death, removal, or expulsion during the term of the Senator to authorize the governor to fill, and that his power applies in no case where the term has not been filled and the office is vacant in consequence of a regular election not having been held to fill it. Now, what was the object of the Constitution in giving this power to the executive of the State? Was it that the six-years term of a Senator should always be filled by an individual to draw pay, duty or no duty, or was it that the Senate as a great body, the organ of the States, should at all times when called into service, regular or extraordinary, be composed in the manner and of the number stated in the Constitution? Is it possible that the men who framed this instrument thought it more important for the interests of the Government and of the people that the term of Senators should always be filled than that the Senate should be filled and the States secured in their full constitutional representation?

It is said that no harm can come of a temporary appointment made to fill a vacancy which happens during a senatorial term, but that it would be highly dangerous to permit the executive of a State to make an appointment at the beginning of a term. Let us reason a little and see the consistency of this argument. What makes this difference? Are the first two months of senatorial life of more importance than the two last or the two in the middle? I have listened patiently to hear some valid reason assigned for the distinction taken between an appointment to take effect at the beginning of a term and one made after there had been a regular entry into a regular term of service. No authority but that of the Legislature, it is said, can fill the position in the first instance, and those who employ this argument are forced to admit that the day after it is thus filled, yea the next hour or the next moment, it may be vacated by death, resignation, or otherwise, and then filled by an executive appointment. Suppose that any of the new Senators now around me had been stricken with death as they went to the President's desk to take the oath of office (which I am glad did not happen) and while the Legislatures of their States were not in session, does anybody doubt that a case of that kind would be within the provision of the Constitution authorizing a temporary appointment? The Senator may never have occupied one moment on this floor; he may have just entered here, and on his way to that desk he may be stricken down by death, and still if the Legislature is not in session when that calamity happens, there is not a lawyer in the United States who will deny to the governor of the State from which he came the power to fill the vacancy at once by a temporary appointment, and that appointee comes here and he enters upon the duties of his office as an original Senator, occupies a seat for the first time, and it will not be contended that any very serious danger could result to the Constitution from such an admission. It may be said that this is an extreme case, but it is not beyond the line of probability, and that is a good way to test a principle.

But it is said that the difference is in the election by the Legislature, that there can be no vacancy until there is such an election, for the reason that it was not intended that there should be. The provision of the Constitution relating to vacancies in the other body has been referred to. Well, what does that prove? If it proves anything it is that the idea of keeping full the representation from the State, and not the term of the individual member, was uppermost in the mind of the convention. The language is as cited by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin the other day:

When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

In that case I suppose no objection could be interposed to the filling of a vacancy at the beginning of a term on the ground that it was the act of the governor. In the case of a vacancy filled by an election ordered to the other House, no objection I say could be taken such as is now taken to an appointment by the governor, because in that case the election comes from the people, who are the fountain of all political power and authority. The Constitution requires that vacancies in the House of Representatives shall be filled by election by the people, the same as regular terms are filled; and still, strange to say, the Constitution gives to the executives of the States, in language as broad if not broader, the power to make temporary appointments to fill vacancies in the Senate. I defy anybody to distinguish between the language in the two cases in substance; and still it is argued here that in the one case the governor cannot fill an original vacancy by virtue of the power conferred in almost identical language with that which confers upon the people of the United States the authority to fill a vacancy in a congressional district.

If a vacancy now existed in the House, whether original or not, and the executive of the State in which such district was located should issue his writ of election, who could take the objection that it was an original vacancy but the people? They have the power to fill regular terms; it is from them that the authority emanates in all cases of delegated power, and they are the same power that the Constitution fixed upon to fill vacancies in the House when elections are ordered by the governor of the State; and the very language that was employed to confer that power is used in the Constitution to invest the governors of the States with power to make temporary appointments to this body.

Will it be said that the people, who are the source, I repeat again, of all power, may not fill a vacancy in the beginning of a term in the other House? If they can, and I affirm that the proposition is beyond reach of dispute, then they get the power to do it from language almost identical with that which is employed to confer the power of making temporary appointment on the executives of the States respecting vacancies in the Senate.

Mr. President, we have been referred to the act of 1866, and told that vacancies therein provided for must be filled in the same manner as regular terms. This to my mind proves nothing. One great controlling fact has been overlooked in this debate, and that is that the executive of a State has no power to fill any vacancy in this body in reality. Owing to the slip of language we sometimes speak of the power of the governor to fill a vacancy in the Senate, but he has no such power. The Constitution never intended that he should have such a power. It is only the Legislatures of the States that can fill vacancies, as the people fill vacancies in the other House. And what does this prove? It proves conclusively to my mind that the framers of the Constitution never intended that a State should go one moment without two Senators to represent her on this floor. Vacancies were thought of and expected to arise, but it was known that the Legislatures alone ought to fill them, and these bodies were only in session at stated periods. The governors, it is true, might call them together in special session, but such was the desire to keep the Senate full that the Constitution was unwilling to await the short delay of a special session, and gave the power of a temporary appointment to the governors. This is the only instance in the Constitution where two distinct methods are provided to keep an office full. In the House no provision is made to fill the office while the election is being held, but here it was thought wise, first, to repose the power of temporary appointment in the governor; and, secondly, the power to fill the vacancy in the Legislature.

These two things are as distinct as can be. The temporary power of appointment given by the Constitution to the governor is not the filling of the vacancy. But in order to prevent a moment going by when the State would be without a representative here, such was the importance attached to filling the places in this body by Mr. Hamilton and others that they were not willing to wait until a special session of the Legislature could be called before the power was given to the governor to make, in the language of the Constitution, a temporary appointment, not to fill the vacancy, because the language which follows this grant tells us that when the Legislature meets it shall proceed to fill the vacancy. The appointment made by the governor, therefore, is not the filling of the vacancy, but it was an additional precaution taken by the framers of the Constitution to guard against chasms in this body, in the language of Mr. Randolph, which we find nothing like in the Constitution in any other case. In the case of vacancies in the House of Representatives, all the delays incident to a regular election have to be waited on; the governor has to be notified; his mandate has to go forth; a delay of months may intervene before a Representative of the people can go into the other House of Congress duly empowered to represent his constituency. But such was the tender sensibility with which the framers of the Constitution regarded representation here that they were not willing to wait the ordinary calling of a Legislature to fill a vacancy, and they gave to the governor of each State the power to make temporary appointments until the Legislature could fill the vacancy.

Now I affirm this proposition which I will challenge any one to deny as a point of constitutional law. It is not disputed that a vacancy may arise in the beginning of a senatorial term as well as at the end, but it is claimed that no power can fill such a vacancy except the power of the Legislature. My proposition is that any vacancy in the senatorial office which the Legislature has power to fill under the Constitution it is competent for the executives of the States to fill by temporary appointment. Where do the Legislatures get the authority to fill vacancies, for be it remembered we are now speaking of vacancies, and there is a vacancy here which the Legislature of New Hampshire will be called to fill when it meets in June next, and it will proceed to fill that vacancy in accordance, I suppose, with the act of 1866, which was read to us the other day by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE:]

> And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

I say that the power of the governor to make temporary appointments in cases of this kind goes hand in hand with the power of the Legislature to fill them in a constitutional way. The one is coextensive with the other. Whenever there arises a case for a temporary appointment under this provision, there will ultimately arise a case for the exercise of the power of the Legislature to fill a vacancy.

Mr. EATON. Not necessarily.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. You and I differ throughout the whole case.

Mr. EATON. My friend will pardon me. Suppose a vacancy had occurred when the Senate was in session on the 21st day of February last, the session to expire on the 3d of March, and the governor proceeded to fill the vacancy, if my friend will allow me to use the expression, made a temporary appointment, would it not have expired on the 3d of March, though there should be no meeting of the Legislature until the May or June following? Therefore the Senator's proposition does not necessarily follow at all.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. In the great majority of cases it will follow. The latter power I claim goes hand in hand with the former and is intended to apply to the same cases. So that when you say there is a vacancy in the office of Senator which the Legislature may fill when it meets, you must say that the executive before that time arrives can fill it by appointment. Can the Legislature of New Hampshire fill this vacancy when it meets?

We have been referred to the peculiar language of the Constitution on this subject by the Senator from Georgia and other Senators who have spoken. Here, sir, we have an example of the precision which the framers of the Constitution thought proper to employ when they intended to confine the vacancy to the term of a particular officer. It is argued here that the words "resignation or otherwise" must mean removal, or expulsion, or inability to act, and a number of other like causes, as the Senator from Georgia tells us. I think a Senator on the other side of the Chamber the other day, in alluding to this subject, made a very proper answer, that it meant the filling of the term in any other manner.

> In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected.

Here is language that admits of no doubt as to what the convention meant. Its framers had this subject before them. It is not possible for any overlapping to take place in the presidential office, because these vacancies must arise out of specified and particular instances. There is no "resignation or otherwise" there. It is not stated that if a vacancy takes place in the presidential office by resignation or otherwise the Vice-President shall act as President. The particular grounds are specified with that precision which the importance of the subject demanded. It was equally as easy to say that in case of the resignation, death, expulsion, or inability of a Senator to act, his place might be filled by a temporary appointment by the executive, which should continue until the next meeting of the Legislature. No such language was employed, but it says that if a vacancy occur by resignation or otherwise the governor may designate a temporary successor who shall act until the Legislature shall fill the vacancy at its next meeting.

It has been argued here that the word "resignation," as found in this part of the Constitution, was intended as a limitation. The true history of the manner in which it found its way in here has been stated by my friend from Indiana. It originated with Mr. Madison, as he read to the Senate a while ago. The question was first left open and the word "vacancy" employed, and then it was qualified, for the reason given by Mr. Madison:

> Mr. Madison, in order to prevent doubts whether resignations could be made by Senators, or whether they could refuse to accept, moved to strike out the words after "vacancies" and insert the words "happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the Legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the Legislature."

Mr. Williamson was referred to by the Senator from Tennessee. He said:

> Senators may resign or not accept. This provision is therefore absolutely necessary.

In the case of a Senator who refuses to accept, as in the case of a Senator who shall unfortunately be stricken down by the hand of death before he enters upon his office, there is abundant authority in the Constitution for a temporary appointment by the governor. If the Legislature of a State shall designate a Senator and before he comes here to occupy the position he indicates a desire to retire from it, that case is put as one which would justify the exercise of the appointing power by the governor where a vacancy would arise, although it would be clearly an original vacancy in the term.

Now, sir, one word in regard to the Lanman case and I have done. The various cases have been paraded here just as one would parade a lot of decisions in a court of justice settling questions of property. As I said in the opening of my remarks to-day, I am not disposed to regard them with that veneration which some of my brethren of the profession seem to attach to them. I remember to have read somewhere a celebrated saying of one of the distinguished men of Great Britain. "You may shake" said he, "the constitution of the land to its center and the lawyer will sit tranquilly in his cabinet, but just touch a cobweb in the corner of Westminster Hall and the exasperated spider will crawl out in its defense." There is no precedent to guide me in this case but the justice of it and the Constitution which is before me; and from all the lights that I have I am clearly of opinion that the present applicant is entitled to a seat. It is remarkable to my mind, referring to precedents, that the further we get away from the origin of the Constitution the more importance is attached to the men who have delivered opinions respecting it. I was taught in my early professional days that the men who participated in framing this great charter of freedom and who sat in the first Congresses under it were the best judges as to what its true meaning was. I was taught to believe that the men who sat in the early Congresses of this Union, the great lawyers whose work we have here before us, had sounder views, more correct ideas in regard to the meaning of this great work, than the men of succeeding generations; and still we find the early decisions of the men who framed this charter of liberty trampled under foot and the decisions of a generation that came in behind them taken up and relied on implicitly. Why is the decision of 1789 heeded so little here in this and similar cases? It stands before you in the first case from Tennessee——

Mr. BAILEY. Allow me to say that I have examined the roll of the Senate in the year 1797 when the case of William Cocke, of Tennessee, was decided, and I find that not a single person who participated in the framing of our Constitution and form of government was a member of the Senate at that time.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Well, Mr. President, that may be——

Mr. WHYTE. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question? Did he examine when the debate took place on Uriah Tracy's case to see that it was debated very warmly on both sides, and find that Gouverneur Morris, who was one of the active men in framing the Constitution, was one of those who voted in favor of admitting Mr. Tracy?

Mr. BAILEY. I find that when Mr. Tracy's case was before the Senate Gouverneur Morris, who was, I will state in addition, a member of the Committee on Style and Arrangement, and to whose pen popularly is attributed the instrument as it now appears, was a member of the Senate, representing then the State of New York, but I believe at the time the Federal Constitution was framed he was a delegate from the State of Pennsylvania. Gouverneur Morris, then also a federalist, voted with the majority, and it was a strictly party vote, and was always recognized as a party vote, and that case was determined on party considerations and in strong party times. It was at the period that immediately followed the election of Mr. Jefferson to the Presidency, when partisan spirit dominated in this body to a degree that has never been known from that day to this.

Mr. WHYTE. Then I suppose the Senator from Tennessee means to say that Gouverneur Morris, who inserted or aided in inserting the clause that the members of each House are the judges of the election and qualification of the members of the respective Houses, forgot that great thing that he was a judge, and was governed solely by partisanship when he voted to seat Mr. Tracy!

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President, I said no such thing; I meant no such thing. I was replying to a statement made by the Senator from Florida to the effect that when the case of William Cocke, of Tennessee, was determined, the body was filled with persons who had belonged to the convention that framed the Constitution. I stated what is the fact, that not a single person who participated in the forming of this Constitution was then in the Senate. The Senator from Maryland asked me then the question whether, in 1801, when Mr. Tracy's case was determined, Gouverneur Morris was not a member of the Senate. I stated that he was, but stated what the Senator himself will not dispute is the fact——

Mr. WHYTE. I do dispute the fact that it was decided on partisanship entirely, for I would not do such an injustice to the memory of Gouverneur Morris.

Mr. BAILEY. I know nothing about Gouverneur Morris, except from his public reputation. I stated the fact that that case was determined by a party vote. There were other men there who were the peers of Gouverneur Morris in patriotism, in intelligence, and in ability, but the fact stands forth that that case was decided by a strict party vote and in strong party times and under the heats of partisan influence.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Well, Mr. President, I did not take the trouble to hunt up the party views which then prevailed, and I had hoped that there was not any party in it, but I suppose there was party feeling then as there always will be; but it only shows after all that this class of precedents is not entitled to the absolute credence that is claimed for them. If it is possible for a party decision to be made in one case, it is possible for it to be made in another, and the whole ought to fall to the ground. If they are that class of judgments that are governed by party, then I do not want to look to them on a question of this kind. I will only look to the particular case that is before me, and not undertake to discriminate between one party and another, but I confess I did not look into the subject to ascertain how the gentlemen who acted on these cases stood in a party point of view. But I was referring to the notorious fact that those men lived in the year in which the Constitution was adopted, and, although they may not have been in the convention which framed the Constitution, they were men of character and prominence who were in a position to ascertain the views of those who sat in the convention. Society then was small, and the public men of this continent at that time kept up an intercourse with each other, as is clearly indicated in the correspondence between Mr. Madison and Mr. Jefferson. I remember on one occasion, when speaking in this body on a great constitutional question, I found light in a letter written by Mr. Jefferson, when he presided over this body as its presiding officer, to his friend, Mr. Madison, in Virginia, who was then in the retiracy of private life. I found a volume of information in that letter upon the great subject which was then before us. While Mr. Madison was not a member of Congress at that time, he was well informed in regard to the current events of the day.

I have said a little more than I intended, Mr. President, and sufficient, I think, to explain my vote upon this question.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I will occupy only one moment. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] yesterday, when I did not happen to be in the Chamber, did me the honor to quote a remark I made in response to a question from the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] last summer, when there was an attempt made in the Senate to give to the Legislature of New Hampshire, then in session, the right to elect a Senator. I was myself strongly of the belief that that Legislature had the right to elect. I am still of that opinion. The proposed legislation, it will be well remembered, as the Senator from Wisconsin referred to it, became somewhat confused. A bill was introduced by the Senator from North Carolina, not now a member of the body, (Mr. Merrimon,) which was intended merely to have the effect in a declaratory way, or as an act additional to the law regulating the election of Senators, to provide that the Legislature might elect. If that measure had been allowed to come before the Senate, of course every gentleman, without expressing an opinion one way or the other in regard to the existing law, could have voted for it. Afterward the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] introduced a bill explanatory of the true intent and meaning of the existing law; and on that the Senate of the United States affirmed that the Legislature of New Hampshire then existing had no right to elect. There has been no opportunity since to choose a Senator in that State.

In the brief response I made to the Senator from Maryland on a subject to which I had never given special attention, only that general observation which we all have of matters occurring in legislation, and no issue on which has come before the Senate within the last forty years, I answered of course somewhat hastily and I answered in memory of a case in my own State in 1853. The Legislature of Maine, at the expiration of the senatorial term of Hon. James W. Bradbury, failing to elect and the election going over for a year, the question was discussed as to whether the governor of Maine could appoint. There lay in my mind at the time what was then the unanimous conclusion in Maine, that the governor could not appoint, and he made no effort to appoint, and I spoke out of the memory of that fact. But upon coming to a closer examination of the case, for I spoke without special investigation at all, the fact appeared, which is the leading point of difference in the cases, namely, that the Legislature of Maine was in session several weeks after the vacancy occurred and did not really adjourn until some time in April, the vacancy occurring on the 4th day of March.

My judgment now is that the Senate of the United States, having by their action prevented the Legislature of New Hampshire which ought to have elected from exercising that privilege, it would be rather hard for the Senate to turn around and say that the man who comes here now under the appointment of the governor, the only possible way left open by which the State can now have full representation on this floor, should not be received. That is the only way in which the senatorial seat may be filled for that vacancy, and it would be rather hard, I think, looking at it in an equitable point of view, if equity can be pleaded, for the Senate to prevent the appointee of the governor from taking a seat.

I am paired on this question with the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON,] who was compelled to leave the Senate on account of illness. I might, therefore, have sat still and said nothing except announce my pair; but, having been quoted in the way I was by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] I was unwilling to seem in any way to conceal my change of view, or rather my deliberate conclusion, upon the question, or to evade by the pair the full responsibility of voting for the admission of Mr. Bell.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, a remark fell from me during the session at which the bill referred to was considered similar to that which fell from the Senator from Maine, and I desire now, therefore, to say a single word.

I have no doubt that if any Legislature of New Hampshire could have made an election it must have been the Legislature which met last June; but I am quite as certain that in so doing it would not have followed the letter of the law of Congress; nor would the coming Legislature yet to meet, if it should undertake to make that choice, follow the letter of that law. If any Legislature of New Hampshire has been prevented from undertaking to make a choice of a Senator, it has been prevented by an act of Congress. The Legislature which met last June could not have filled the vacancy according to the law of Congress, because the letter of that law says that the Legislature which shall make this choice shall be the one chosen next preceding the expiration of the term for which any Senator has been elected. That Legislature was not such a Legislature. If the act of Congress had used the words "the Legislature of each State at its last regular session next before the expiration of such term shall proceed to make a choice," it would have left the matter without doubt, and would have intended what I have no doubt Congress intended to enact when they used the words "the Legislature of each State which is chosen next preceding the expiration of the time for which any Senator was elected." But Congress used words which happen, in their application to the case of New Hampshire, to deprive the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire of the power of electing a Senator according to the letter of their own law. It is the act of Congress and the words they unfortunately selected in that act which prevented the Legislature of New Hampshire from following its letter and choosing a Senator by that Legislature which otherwise would have done so.

According to the phraseology of this law, as to any other State in the Union it sufficiently describes the Legislature. It only happens because of the constitution of New Hampshire, that while it applies to every other State in the Union it does not apply to the State of New Hampshire, for every time, so long as that constitution remains as it is, that the election of a Senator recurs in New Hampshire, there will always be a Legislature chosen after the last regular session of the Legislature, but which will not meet until the June after the expiration of the term. That arises from the unfortunate phraseology of the law of Congress. That the State of New Hampshire should be deprived of its representation here because of this unfortunate phraseology, does not seem to me to be sound policy.

Therefore I shall vote for the admission of the Senator appointed by the governor of New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to strike out the word "not" before the word "entitled."

Mr. EATON. I desire before the vote is taken, even on striking out the word "not," to ask a question or two of my friend from New Hampshire. When did the new constitution of New Hampshire become operative?

Mr. ROLLINS. On the 1st of October, 1878.

Mr. EATON. And under that constitution what is called the present Legislature has been chosen, the Legislature which will sit hereafter?

Mr. ROLLINS. The Legislature which will sit in June next was chosen in November last. The Legislature which met in session last June was elected in March, 1878, under the old constitution.

Mr. EATON. One other question, which the Senator has partly answered. In 1878 there was an election of the Legislature of New Hampshire?

Mr. ROLLINS. In March, 1878.

Mr. EATON. It held its session when?

Mr. ROLLINS. In June, 1878.

Mr. EATON. How long did it continue in session—until July?

Mr. ROLLINS. Until August.

Mr. EATON. Therefore any time between June, 1878, and August, 1878, it was the duty of the General Assembly of New Hampshire to elect a Senator to succeed Mr. Wadleigh, whose place was to become vacant on the 3d of March, 1879.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator allow me to say just a word?

Mr. EATON. Certainly; by all means.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Legislature of New Hampshire would have elected a Senator in June, 1878, if the Senate of the United States had not declared that that Legislature had not the power so to do.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I might as well say a word or two on this matter now, and I shall be very brief. In starting I beg to say that no Senator on this floor who believes that the governor of New Hampshire had not the power to appoint temporarily a Senator to sit upon this floor, is to be brought to task and schooled as though he was doing aught against the Constitution of our common country, or did not desire to see every State fully represented on the floor of the Senate. I regret, from the bottom of my heart I regret, that I cannot cast a vote to seat Mr. Bell. If I were to do so, I should do violence to my own honor, I should dishonor myself, I should violate every constitutional opinion which I entertain with regard to this matter; and therefore I neither will nor can give such a vote.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to say one word?

Mr. EATON. Certainly; with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I wish to say merely that the new constitution was submitted to the people of New Hampshire at an election held in March, and it was adopted by the people. It was provided by the new constitution that another Legislature should be elected in November. Therefore I am not of the opinion that the old Legislature of New Hampshire would have had any right to elect, whether Congress had expressed an opinion in regard to the matter or not, because it was provided by the State constitution that another Legislature should be elected and that Legislature would be the Legislature chosen next prior to the termination of Mr. Wadleigh's term.

Mr. EATON. That is a matter of history.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator will allow me to say that the new constitution was submitted to the people in March, 1877.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. And adopted then?

Mr. ROLLINS. It was adopted by the people at that time.

Mr. EATON. There is but one Legislature in New Hampshire. That fact was thoroughly settled, if anything can be settled here, by the argument of my honorable friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] There cannot be two Legislatures in New Hampshire; there is but one Legislature; and if I am not utterly misinformed that Legislature has adjourned to meet on the last Wednesday of some month. I am not certain which month.

Mr. ROLLINS. That is a mere matter of form; the Legislature has adjourned until the last Wednesday of May.

Mr. EATON. No matter whether it is a matter of form or not, the Legislature of New Hampshire is still in existence, and it has adjourned to meet on a certain day hereafter.

Mr. ROLLINS. It never has met to do business under those circumstances. It is a mere matter of form.

Mr. EATON. That will do very well to talk about, but I am stating a fact.

Mr. ROLLINS. So am I.

Mr. EATON. The Senator says he is stating a fact when he says it is a matter of form. The Senator knows that if a war should take place between this country and Great Britain, and if his State were invaded, and it became necessary to call together the Legislature of New Hampshire to take steps for the defense of the State, it would be that Legislature which has adjourned to meet on the last Wednesday of a coming month which would be convened. Every man knows that, and yet it is a matter of form!

Mr. President, the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] refuses to be bound, he says, by the precedent of 1825. He proposes to govern himself in this case by his own judgment and his own reason. So do I, giving all due deference to the decision of the Senate in 1825 and in 1837 and every previous year. But before the Senator's voice in making that declaration had ceased ringing in my ears, it was yet sounding all over this Hall like a trumpet-call, he said that we must be bound by the action of the Senate last year. When here are twenty-five new members who were not members of the Senate last year, the Senator from Florida says that there was a certain action of the Senate last year which binds this Senate as a mass! In the first place, there was no action in regard to this matter to bind anybody. New Hampshire came here asking our opinion in relation to a certain matter. Somebody says that it was a trick. I do not say so. I gave no advice as a Senator, not the slightest, to New Hampshire.

I desire to say that in my judgment, last July or August the Legislature of New Hampshire had an unquestioned right to fill in advance the vacancy on the floor of the Senate which would be made by the expiration of the term of Mr. Wadleigh. I have no doubt about that. It was their duty to elect. Until recently, on the adoption of the new constitution of my State, the Senators from Connecticut were elected in the month of May, to take their seats the 4th of March next after the month of May. I was so elected. My present associate was elected under the new constitution, and so he was elected in the month of January to take his seat next December, had there been no extra session. It was the duty of the Legislature of New Hampshire last summer to elect a Senator. Before I get through, if I do not find myself talking too long, I shall endeavor to show that there is a duty for the State to perform; and that a State may consent, as New Hampshire has consented, to have but one Senator upon this floor. My friend from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] has been elected for more than a year, nearly two years before his term began.

Mr. President, this is the proper time to settle a very important public question in a proper and orderly manner, so that in a Senate that may exist hereafter, to which my honorable friend from Florida may not belong, it may be a precedent of value. Every Senator knows that the seating of the distinguished gentleman from New Hampshire who applies here under the appointment of the executive of that State makes no earthly difference upon this floor politically. As I said before, I would rejoice to vote in favor of his taking a seat if I could constitutionally do so. I would be glad to so vote, but here a precedent is to be established which is to govern in all cases, I trust, of a like character hereafter, one which will have weight hereafter, and certainly the greater weight if the claimant should be seated. I notice that very many of my friends upon this side of the Chamber are disposed to vote to seat Mr. Bell. I find no fault with them for that. They follow their own constitutional convictions. I would have every man do that. I shall do so now and at all times. But I do not want any excessive virtue to be claimed by anybody on this subject. I am very much disposed to do what I think is just and right, as well as my friend from Florida. I am not disposed to violate the Constitution of the United States as I understand it, and I understand it for myself and not through the understanding of my honorable friend from Florida or any other Senator.

Let us look at this question one moment. I have said that the question has not the slightest partisan or political significance in the world. It does not in a substantial manner affect any political result, and therefore it ought to be adjusted without the slightest partisan feeling It may appear when we go a little deeper into the examination of the subject, that the good people of New Hampshire have placed themselves in a position where they must not complain if they are not permitted by the Constitution to have more than one Senator on this floor for the coming three months. I beg leave to say that I do not believe the sun will rise any later or go down any earlier; I do not believe that the principles of good government will be destroyed; I do not believe the liberties of the people will be invaded, if New Hampshire should fail to have any other than the voice of my most excellent friend [Mr. ROLLINS] on this floor for about two weeks; I hope that will be the length of this session. No, sir; the grass will grow, the water will run down hill if not up, even if New Hampshire has but one representative on this floor for the next two weeks. At all events, as I understand the Constitution, I shall not violate it in order that New Hampshire may have two votes here for the coming two weeks.

Let me briefly call the attention of the Senate first to the composition of this body. In order to be understood it is necessary that I should perhaps say a word or two which has been better said before, but I wish to connect my remarks. Article 1, section 3, of the Constitution describes the composition of this body:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State—chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

How do they come here?—

That is the composition of this body. I cannot now take the time to go back to the debates in the convention which formed the Constitution; but the framers of that instrument thought that there might be temporary vacancies in this body. I desire the Senate to understand precisely the position which I occupy. The Senators were to be appointed for six years, and they could become part and parcel of this great body in no other way except by being "chosen by the Legislatures thereof" from each State in the Union.

My friend [Mr. KERNAN] suggests to me a thought that was in my own mind, and of course it would be in the mind of us all. Suppose the State of New York, so ably represented on this floor by my two distinguished friends now before me, had not chosen two Senators, could the governor of New York have appointed two Senators to take seats on this floor? To use a favorite expression of my distinguished friend from Florida, I defy any man to make an assertion so ridiculous and so absurd as that. No, sir, if originally, at the commencement of the Government, the Legislature of New York had not seen proper to choose Senators there could have been no appointment. Therefore I say that it absolutely amazes me when I hear the declarations of distinguished gentlemen, good lawyers, and certainly honest men; for as somebody said before, a playwright, I believe:

> For Brutus is an honorable man;
> So are they all, all honorable men.

I hear good gentlemen, honest men, able Senators, while admitting the fact that in no other way can Senators be originally chosen except by the Legislatures of the States, yet say that they can be appointed at the beginning of a term, because they say a vacancy has occurred, one of those things which happen, an unforeseen casualty, which happens once in six years as certain as God reigneth. Unforeseen, is it? Then the path of the sun is unknown and unforeseen. Yet men talk about such a thing happening just as we happen to die or as we happen to have been born. Enough on that one point, as I promised to be very brief.

Having spoken of the origin of the Senate, the commencement of the body, I assert again, and I challenge any Senator upon this floor to deny the proposition, that there could have been no Senators originally unless they had been "chosen by the Legislature" of the respective States. Now I come to the next clause in the Constitution in the same section:

And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

I do not propose to go into a discussion at this hour of the meaning of the word "vacancies," or the word "happen," or the words "or otherwise," or any other word. We have had a surfeit of that. The law-books are full of what the meaning of "otherwise" is. There is not a State in the Union which does not furnish, my own State furnishes over and over, cases which determine the legal meaning of the term "otherwise." The phrase is "by resignation, or otherwise." My friend from Georgia [Mr. HILL] and my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] have discussed and illustrated the meaning of those two terms to my entire satisfaction, and in order to get a better speech than I could possibly make myself I adopt their theory, their reasoning, their facts upon that matter, and their remarks; for I stand in regard to these two gentlemen pretty much in the same position as a member of Parliament with regard to Mr. Burke, who was not in the habit of making long speeches. Mr. Burke had made a very able speech, when this member rose and said, "Mr. Speaker I say ditto to Mr. Burke." [Laughter.] With regard to the discussion upon the meaning of the term "otherwise" and the meaning of the term "vacancies," I say "ditto to my friends from Wisconsin and Georgia." I do not care to take up the time of the Senate by a rehash in a poorer way of their good arguments on that point. I come to another section which has something to do with this subject. I read from section 5 of article 1; my friend from Florida read it:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

I cannot escape that clause and those words in the Constitution any more than my friend from Florida can. In this case I am to be a judge of the qualifications of Mr. Bell and of his right to a seat here. If he is improperly appointed by the executive of New Hampshire, I cannot vote for his admission to this body. If he is not entitled to a seat here, I should be false to myself if through courtesy or kindness or any desire to have a full Senate of seventy-six members I should permit myself to violate my convictions and my belief. That is a part of the Constitution which we are bound to respect. I do respect it as I understand it, and therefore I shall vote against the admission of Mr. Bell under that clause of the Constitution.

The times—

And here is a significant section, section 4 of the same article, which I desire to read:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

I do not remember to have heard this section alluded to in the debate and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to it. Under the Constitution the Congress of the United States proceeded in 1866 to do what? To pass a certain law determining the time and the manner of choosing the Senators of the various States in this Union, the Senators of the State of New Hampshire as well as of the State of New York. That Congress had a right to do, and that it did. Did the State of New Hampshire take due notice of that law, or did it not? That is the question which I desire to put to each Senator on this floor.

In the first place, was the law of Congress constitutional? That I will not discuss; it is here; it has been the law; there is not a member on the floor of the Senate who was not placed here by his own Legislature acting under that law. Therefore it is too late today to talk about its unconstitutionality. Did New Hampshire, did that great little State—I use the two adjectives—know or did it not know that there had been a law placed on the statute-book prescribing the mode and manner of electing Senators? It is a law thirteen years old now, and yet it had not entered the brains of my good friends in New Hampshire, it seems. So they went to work and made a new organic law and changed the time of the meeting of their Legislature and of the election of their Senators without any regard to a law of Congress passed under section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, and they now come here and say to Congress "We made a mistake; we did not read that law aright; let our friend come here and remain two weeks." Mr. President, to use a classical expression on the floor of the Senate, "That won't do." If the people of New Hampshire, with this law twelve years old staring them in the face all the while, have so undertaken to reform their organic law as to destroy their one chance for a representative on the floor of the Senate for thirty days, I cannot help it. The next time they change the constitution of New Hampshire they will look at the laws of the United States; I have not any doubt about that.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. ROLLINS. I understood the Senator from Connecticut to express the opinion that under the law of 1866 the Legislature which was in session last June had the right to elect?

Mr. EATON. I have not the slightest doubt about it.

Mr. ROLLINS. We have not done so——

Mr. EATON. I do not live in New Hampshire. If I had lived in New Hampshire I would have seen that the Legislature elected a Senator.

Mr. ROLLINS. As I suggested some time since, had it not been for the expression of the opinion of the Senate of the United States upon that question declaring that that Legislature of New Hampshire had not the right to elect a Senator, I have no doubt that Legislature would have elected a Senator.

Mr. EATON. I am very sorry for one thing, and that is that any sovereign State in this Union should come here to the Senate of the United States or go anywhere else to know what its rights are in the election of one of its Senators. It is a matter they ought to determine for themselves.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senate of the United States undertook to express an opinion on that subject.

Mr. EATON. Who asked the Senate to express an opinion? My friend shrugs his shoulders. My other friend here, my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] said yesterday that it was a trick, as he had heard.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senate referred a bill to its Committee on Privileges and Elections authorizing that Legislature to elect, and that committee made a report which was printed and the bill was indefinitely postponed on the recommendation of the committee. It was the action of the Senate that prevented the election.

Mr. EATON. There is no argument at all about it.

Mr. ROLLINS. It was the fault of the Senate, not the fault of New Hampshire.

Mr. EATON. And the trick answered its purpose, did it not? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROLLINS. The State of New Hampshire did not elect.

Mr. EATON. In other words, the little game was played out, was it? It is not quite played out yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROLLINS. The question of admission would follow the action of the State. The Legislature of New Hampshire would not undertake to elect a Senator to come here and claim admission after the Senate of the United States had declared that that Legislature had no power to elect, the Senate being the judge of the election of its own members. The Senate upon such a question is a tribunal from which there is no appeal.

Mr. EATON. That would be a very good argument if my friend were seeking admission to last year's bird-nest, but not this. [Laughter.] This is another Senate. It is not last year at all; it is this year.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator hear me one minute?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Lest I may not say anything else in this debate, I wish to put in one disclaimer for myself individually. I have heard it asserted here repeatedly that the Senate declared that the now existing Legislature in New Hampshire had no power to elect a Senator. I deny that the Senate ever so declared, but I wish specifically and individually to deny that I ever so declared or ever consented to such a declaration made anywhere.

Mr. EATON. I am very glad to hear the disclaimer of my friend from New York. I have heard a dozen gentlemen on this side say the same thing.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish my friend would pardon me once more?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. A Senator sitting near me says in his seat that I did not indicate at the time he has referred to that the Legislature of New Hampshire, in my poor opinion, had a right to elect a Senator. I beg to set myself right there. If he will take the trouble as I have done to traverse the debate, he will find that I did, although not specially called upon to do it. That is all I have to say about that. Therefore I do not want to be written down, included with other Senators, and as I think unjustly to the whole Senate, time after time as having declared my belief that a Legislature had no power to elect a Senator, when in my judgment it had as much power to elect a Senator as any other Legislature has ever had in any State during any year of this century.

Mr. EATON. I am very glad that my distinguished friend from New York saw fit to state what he has stated. It confirms me in my own opinion; it confirms my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] and my friend from Georgia [Mr. HILL] in the opinions which they have expressed, that that Legislature had an undoubted right to elect and failed in doing its duty. That is all there is about it. If we are right about it—and I ask the consideration of this assertion or expression by every Senator—if we are right about that we cannot admit this man; it is utterly impossible. If the Legislature of New Hampshire had the right last year to elect a Senator, and failed to do it, legally they consented to be without a Senator on this floor at this time. Therefore that clause in the Constitution which was alluded to by my friend from Delaware and my friend from Maryland (and great emphasis was put upon that clause, more in the argument than in anything else) "that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate," does not apply. Although that has no reference whatever to a question of the character which is now before the Senate, yet I will use it with some governing power, and I say that the State of New Hampshire legally consented to be without one of its representatives on the floor of the Senate, and, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] suggests, not only consented but prevented herself from electing a Senator.

I want to say one word in regard to this clause. What is the meaning of it? To read it and apply it to this New Hampshire case is to me, I will not say absurd, because the expression might be considered harsh; but what this means is that thirty-seven States of the thirty-eight States of this Union cannot say that the little State of Connecticut or the little State of Delaware shall not have two representatives on this floor. That is what it means; and it is paltering with a valuable clause of the Constitution to bring it up and read it in connection with this New Hampshire case. It means this, sir: that three-quarters of the States of this Union cannot alter the Constitution of the United States in that respect. That is the original organic law upon which we came into this Union. It means that Delaware, and Rhode Island, and Connecticut, and Vermont, and New Hampshire are to be equal with Indiana, and Illinois, and New York now and forever. That is the meaning of that clause in the Constitution, and do not make it small and bring it in here and apply it to this little case of New Hampshire, where they could have had their Senator elected ten months ago if they had not forgotten their duty. Failing to do their own duty, we are now gravely told that that clause in the Constitution is violated if we do not permit the governor to make an appointment. I confess, Mr. President, I am amazed at the claim made here.

A word or two more and I am done. I regret (and my friend from New Hampshire now in my eye knows that I regret) that I cannot vote for the admission of Mr. Bell, his friend, and undoubtedly a most respectable gentleman. I love New Hampshire as I do Massachusetts and Virginia, as equals in this great confederacy of States. I would have every State in this Union properly represented on the floor of the Senate. I rejoice when I see every chair occupied save one in this Chamber; and I would be rejoiced if that were occupied too; but in order to give an opportunity for a week or two I cannot violate what I regard as the true constitutional principle which should govern us all. Rather than to vote to admit Mr. Bell, I would agree myself to go out of the Senate and never cast a vote until New Hampshire could have its new Senator here. It can make no difference, as I said before, politically no harm can be done, and therefore I should be glad to fill that chair; but, Mr. President, with my view of the Constitution, with my view of the rights of New Hampshire under the Constitution, with my view of my duty, I cannot consent to admit Mr. Bell, and it will not go out to the world, and it cannot go out to the world, as the act of a partisan. I am not fearful that any gentleman will claim that I cast this vote in order to prevent a political opponent from taking a seat in this body. With all my political opponents, I say "all," on this floor—I have a right to say "all"—my relations are kindly and friendly, as they would be with Mr. Bell if he were here.

I ought to say one word in relation to a question which was put yesterday to my friend from New York [Mr. KERNAN] by the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who is not now in his seat. He put this question, as near as I can remember, without looking at the RECORD: when would the term of the new Senator from New Hampshire commence if he should happen to be elected hereafter—on the 1st of June? I was astonished to hear a question of that sort from the honorable Senator from Vermont, and so astonished was I that I sent to the Secretary of the Senate, and I will read what I hold in my hand:

STATE OF CONNECTICUT,
General Assembly, May session, 1852.

Resolved, That Hon. Isaac Toucey, having been duly elected, is hereby appointed a Senator in the Congress of the United States from the State of Connecticut for the unexpired term of six years, which commenced on the 4th day of March, 1851.

Then I had the curiosity to look and see what the record of the Senate was, and I find it to be this, under date of May 14, 1852:

Mr. Smith presented the credentials of Hon. Isaac Toucey, elected a Senator by the Legislature of Connecticut—for the term of six years commencing the 4th day of March, A. D. 1851; which were read; and, the oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. Toucey, he took his seat in the Senate.

For when?

And that was a year and a quarter after the 4th day of March, 1851. I happened to be a member of the Legislature of Connecticut in 1850. It was our duty to elect in May, 1850, a Senator to take his seat in March, 1851. The democratic party was in power. We had what was called a very large free-soil wing in the democratic party. They did not like Mr. Toucey. I happened to be in the upper branch, in the Senate, of the Legislature, and after balloting until I got tired I moved to carry over the business twelve months. It went over and in 1851 our whig friends were in just the same condition that we were in 1850. They had two or three silver-gray gentlemen whom they could not control, and, therefore, Hon. Mr. Baldwin, of New Haven, lacked two votes of an election in 1851. In 1852, the third year, Isaac Toucey was elected to take his seat for six years from March 4, 1851, as the successor of Mr. Wadleigh when elected by the Legislature of New Hampshire will take his seat for six years from March 4, 1879. Therefore the question of the honorable Senator from Vermont was fully and thoroughly answered by the action of the Senate itself.

Now, Senators, I have but this to say: in deciding this great and important question let each be satisfied that he decides according to his own convictions of constitutional law and not with regard to kindness to Mr. Bell or love for the State of New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, which is to strike out the word "not."

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, if any other Senator desires to make any remarks on this question, I shall not take the floor for the purpose of addressing the Senate myself. I am waiting until the entire argument is closed before I proceed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator as the chairman of the committee wishes to close the debate, I suppose.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If no other gentleman desires to speak on this question, I take the floor for the purpose of closing the debate.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask my colleague if he desires to address the Senate now or whether he will give way, having the floor for the purpose of closing the debate on this case, for a motion for an executive session?

Mr. SAULSBURY, I give way for that purpose.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. If it is the understanding that the Senator from Delaware closes this debate and nobody else is to speak, I have no objection to the case going over until to-morrow; but I certainly hope the whole day will not be occupied with it to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 9, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. Harrison, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ROLL-CALLS—PRINTING OF BILLS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I desire to submit a resolution for reference to the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in calling the roll of the House the Clerk shall call only the surname of members with the prefix of "Mr.," except where there are two or more of the same surname, in which case the full names of such members shall be called.

Resolved further, That the rules of the House be so amended that no bill nor resolution shall hereafter be printed except upon the recommendation of the committee to which the same is referred; and that for the purpose of such recommendations committees have leave to report at any time.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the introduction of this resolution.

FOLDING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask leave to introduce a resolution to meet a very pressing want at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the superintendent of the folding-room is hereby authorized to employ such additional force as may be necessary to fold the speeches now largely accumulated and accumulating in said room, to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $1 per thousand, and subject to the approval of the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to the consideration of this resolution just now.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. STEPHENS. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to make a report. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] one of my colleagues on that committee, has charge of a report which it was arranged should come in first, but I do not now see him in his place, and I suppose the order in which the reports may be presented is not material. I send the report to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules submit the following report upon the subjects therein embraced, and ask its adoption by the House:

The committee recommend the raising of the following select committees, to be appointed by the Speaker, and to consist of the same number as in the Forty-fifth Congress, respectively, to wit:

Committee on the Census; Committee on Reform in the Civil Service; Committee on the state of the Law respecting Ascertainment and Declaration of Result of Election of President and Vice-President: Committee on the Origin, Introduction, and Prevention of Epidemic Diseases in the United States; Committee on Vetilation of the Hall; Committee to Inquire into the Causes of the Present Depression of Labor.

The committee also report in favor of increasing the number of the Committee on Enrolled Bills to seven members; the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to eleven members; the Committee of Ways and Means, to thirteen members; the Committees on Agriculture, Judiciary, Elections, Commerce, and Appropriations, to fifteen members each.

The committee also recommend the adoption of the following additional rule:

RULE —. On a motion to suspend the rules and pass a general appropriation bill, an affirmative vote of three-fourths of the members present and voting thereon shall be necessary.

Mr. STEPHENS. This is the unanimous report of the Committee on Rules. I do not know that it is necessary to explain each proposition. The report is easily understood from the reading. The increase of the Committee on Enrolled Bills seems to be absolutely necessary in the opinion of the Speaker and all the members who have heretofore served on that committee. As to the proposed increase of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, I will merely state that the committee as originally constituted consisted of seven members, and it so remained until some time during the Speakership of the distinguished gentleman who is now a Senator from Maine. When all the committees consisting of nine members were increased to eleven, Speaker BLAINE seems to have acted under the supposition that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures had consisted of nine members, and therefore he appointed eleven members upon that committee. His successor followed that precedent, and for years the committee has consisted of eleven members, though originally, according to the order of the House, it was to embrace only seven members. As the committee has consisted of eleven members during the last three or four Congresses, the Committee on Rules have thought it best to fix eleven by rule as the number of members constituting the committee.

As to the proposition to increase the membership of the other committees named in this report I shall say nothing at present, unless other gentlemen wish to discuss the matter. I am under a promise to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] one of my colleagues on the committee, that he may offer an amendment to the last proposition.

Mr. KENNA. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will allow me an opportunity to offer an amendment to that part of the report which relates to the passage of appropriation bills under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] desires to offer an amendment, and also the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] It is my purpose to allow as much debate on this subject as the House may deem proper.

Mr. MILLS. Do I understand that the previous question is moved? I hope not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia only desires to retain his right to the floor, so that whenever the House wishes to close the discussion he may have the right to call the previous question.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will allow us to offer some amendments before he moves the previous question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say that the additional rule now reported from the Committee on Rules, to which the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] has indicated a desire to offer an amendment, has my very cordial approval. As a member of the committee it may be due to myself to say that I do not approve of all the recommendations embodied in this report. I do not for myself see that necessity requires this general increase of the membership of committees, or that good is to result from this proposed change. I can see the propriety of equalizing the committees, which it is in a great measure proposed to do in this report. Upon reflection I will not ask to offer the amendment which, with the consent of the Committee on Rules, I reserved the right to submit in the House. That amendment looked to opposing the increase of membership of the Committee on Appropriations, because I did not believe the best way to relieve that committee of the superabundance of labor at present imposed upon it was to be found in an increase of its membership, but rather in lessening its work by referring to other committees of this House some of the general appropriation bills which have heretofore been prepared by the Committee on Appropriations, but which seem to me to belong more properly to other committees.

That matter, however, Mr. Speaker, will come up more naturally and better after the regular standing committees of this House shall have been announced. And for that reason I waive my right to offer the amendment which the Committee on Rules agreed I should have the opportunity of offering here to cover the point I have referred to.

I do not intend to make any factious opposition to the action of the committee as taken, for if there be anything in that report which was not unanimously agreed upon by the Committee on Rules it was simply because of my own single dissent. I am content to let the honorable gentleman from Georgia offer his report as it is with this statement to the House, and I will endeavor hereafter to get the attention of the House on the subject to which I have alluded with reference to the work of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MILLS. I can see no very great good to be obtained by adopting the report of the Committee on Rules. I can see, and think I have seen, in my six years of service in this House that our code of rules do need amendment, do need it in many respects; and yet I must say that the report of the Committee on Rules just made to the House does not meet a single one of the points to which I have reference.

I am not one of those, sir, who believe that a body can be made to move faster by increasing its proportion. I have seen that thing attempted in my own State. It has been long a mooted and difficult question with the people of Texas to know how to dispose of the great mass of business which comes before the supreme court of that State growing out of the varied interests of that immense empire, and we have tried this thing of increasing the bench, but finally had to abandon it. We went from three to five, but had to go back to the old practice. And so it will prove in reference to the committees of this House. The smaller your committees the more rapidly will they be able to dispatch the public business. It is a great mistake, in my judgment, to think you will dispatch the public business more rapidly or more correctly by adding to the number of any committee as the Committee on Rules propose to do by the resolution now pending.

One very material alteration I would make in the rules, Mr. Speaker, is in reference to the Committee of Elections. There the Committee on Rules propose to increase the number from what it is now to a much larger number. I would propose, on the contrary, that there should be no standing Committee of Elections in this House at all. The Committee of Elections in this House is simply a denial of the right of the people to representation upon this floor and a denial of the right of a member to his seat. We have twenty-five or thirty contested-election cases every Congress. They come up here and are referred. They go through the whole length of the term of Congress for two years, a majority of them falling in the last expiring hours of the session, and men are admitted to their seats on this floor just in time to draw an additional salary to that which has already been paid to the former incumbent, when this House has decided that he has been exercising the rights of a Representative on this floor, although he was not the man whom the people sent here to represent them.

That is one wrong: that we deny to the people the right of representation on this floor in the person of the Representative they have chosen; and we do the additional wrong of paying two persons for the whole time of the Congress for one seat, when, if the question had been promptly decided, the district would have had proper representation and only one member would have been paid. Why should not our contested-election cases which come up to this House be referred, every case, to a special committee—referred just so soon as they reach the House, each case to a new committee, with the order under the rules of the House to report within thirty days its conclusions to the House, so the House may determine who was legally elected the Representative from the district—to decide at once who possessed the right of representing the constituency from that district and determine between the contestants as to which party had the right to occupy the seat?

That is one amendment I would make to the rules. Another amendment I would offer is this: that the Committee of Ways and Means, the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures should have leave to report at any time, and, on motion of any member of this House, that any public bill reported by those committees should be set down for a certain day with the privilege of having that bill considered from day to day until disposed of. Under the present rules of this House, as gentlemen must know who have spent any length of time in service upon this floor, it is impossible to get a bill from either one of these committees, or, indeed, any other except the Committee on Appropriations—to get it before the House and have the House consider and dispose of it, and to carry the recommendations of the committee into the form of law. Why? It is because those committees have to make their reports in the "morning hour;" and as the morning hour was very justly characterized at the last session of Congress, it is the "nine hole." The Committee on Banking and Currency or the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures or the Committee of Ways and Means may submit any report they choose upon the coinage of silver or about banking and currency or in reference to taxation, and when the report comes in, in the morning hour, there it remains if any large portion of the House should happen not to be in favor of the change proposed, and there it can be kept to the close of the session by merely making two motions—one to adjourn and another the day to which the House shall adjourn, and so, by calling the yeas and nays on those two motions, consume the morning hour every day. So it may go on from day to day until the session expires, and thus the majority of the House finds itself without the power under the rules to carry into execution its will in reference to the recommendation of every one of these important committees.

I would have that changed, so that when a bill is reported from either one of these most important committees of the House it shall be in the power of a majority of the House to fix a day for the consideration of that measure, and to say that it shall be considered from day to day until the subject shall have been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from Texas that, as he may recollect, he made a decision that the committee had the right in reporting a bill for commitment to introduce a resolution as to how it should be considered when in Committee of the Whole. And that decision was given effect to in several instances, in one notable instance in reference to the tariff, in one from the Judiciary Committee, and in one from the Committee on Railroads and Canals.

Mr. MILLS. Now, the Committee on Rules report one other thing which I want to oppose. There was an effort made in the last Congress to change the rules of this House so as to prevent the passage of the river and harbor bill. I believe in the kind of improvements provided for by that bill. I believe that the country stands in need of them, and that the appropriation of money by Congress in improving the channels of commerce and cheapening the carrying rates of this country is the most important legislation that is enacted by Congress. And yet it was attempted in the last Congress to make a rule of this House which should defeat these bills; and now we have a report from the Committee on Rules, saying it shall take three-fourths of the House to suspend the rules and pass a bill of that kind, instead of a vote of two-thirds. That is increasing the chances for a defeat of those measures, and I oppose it. I see no reason for such a change of the rules, none whatever. Instead of the rules being amended, so that the will of the majority may be made the law of the land, obstacles are constantly thrown in the way of making the will of the majority the law of the land.

Why should one-fourth of this House arrogate to itself the right to stop the legislation that a majority of this House shall will to enact? This threatens us with a veto power, to be lodged with one-fourth of the House, who shall say that less than three-fourths shall not pass a law which under all democratic institutions in the world a majority are competent to pass.

There are many other objections to this report which I might state, but I will not detain the House further at this time.

Mr. WAIT. I certainly trust that that part of the report of the Committee on Rules which recommends an increase of some of these leading committees will be adopted by the House. I can speak from my own experience as a member of the Committee on Contested Elections, as to the necessity of such an increase. I served on that committee during the last Congress. We had a great number of contested-election cases thrown upon the committee in the very early days of the session, and if we had had a numerical force on that committee sufficient to give to a subcommittee of three each case, they could have gone to work, examined the cases, heard the evidence, listened to the arguments of counsel, and been able to report at a very early day their opinion which of the contesting parties was entitled to a seat in this House.

I do not believe that members of this body who have not served on the Committee of Elections, or who have not made an examination with regard to the amount of evidence introduced in those cases, have any idea whatever of the labor that is thrown upon the subcommittees in the mere examination of the testimony that is introduced. I hold in my hand a document embracing the testimony and other papers in the case of Nutting against Reilly, and they cover fifteen hundred and thirty pages. Now, I ask the House what time would be required, in their view, to give the evidence in that case a careful examination, so as to enable the subcommittee to read, mark, and inwardly digest the same and report to the entire committee, and have that committee present a report here to this House which would enable the House to act intelligently with regard to the rights of the contestants in that case? And this is not an isolated case. There was hardly any case presented to the committee in the last Congress in which the testimony and papers did not amount to five hundred or one thousand pages; and we had to devote day and night so far as we had the opportunity to examine the testimony with care, so as to be able to come to a correct decision and to report to the committee of which we constituted a part.

I certainly trust that these leading committees will be increased, if gentlemen familiar with the duties of these other committees, the number of which it is proposed to increase, can speak as definitely with regard to the necessity for an increase as I think I can in regard to the Committee of Elections. I believe other gentlemen who have served on that committee will agree with me in the statement I have made.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to say that I apprehend from the remarks made by the gentleman from Texas and others that the proposition embodied in the new rule which the Committee on Rules asks the House to enact is not clearly understood. I certainly indorse cordially that part of the report made by the Committee on Rules. I do not understand that it looks to the prevention of the passage of any bill; but if it shall be made a rule of this House it will require that the appropriation bills which pass under a suspension of the rules without discussion, without explanation, without giving to any member of this House a right to offer an amendment, under a gag law, which are understood by nobody, except by the members of the committee that report it—that such bills so to be passed shall receive three-fourths of the votes of the members present.

Now, sir, the Committee on Commerce seem to think that it alone is stricken at in this matter, and I need not remind the House that the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] who sits on my left, or some member of the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress, introduced and passed through it, less than sixty days ago, what is known as the sundry civil appropriation bill, which generally appropriates about sixteen millions of money. It was introduced here; it was never discussed; it was never read, and it was not even in print.

Mr. ATKINS. It was one of the best bills that ever passed the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And had some of the worst features in it that ever passed this House or any other House.

Mr. ATKINS. Point them out.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I did point one out, but the point is that the bill was passed through the House under a suspension of the rules, when it was never in print until the day on which it was passed, and there was no opportunity of members knowing a single, solitary provision in a bill that appropriated nearly twenty millions of money, and no one could even ask a question as to what the provisions of the bill were.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman's statement is incorrect.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In what particular?

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman has alluded to the sinking fund for this District.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Well, if the gentleman wants to go into a discussion on a bill which he passed through the House under a suspension of the rules and which was not in print, and the House is willing to hear it, I am perfectly willing to go into that discussion. This I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, and my friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will not take issue about it, that the bill never was in print until the day that it passed the House, and there was not a member on the floor that could know anything of a solitary provision of the bill, unless he was a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, I say that it is dangerous legislation. I had as much confidence in that committee in the Forty-fifth Congress as any other member, and I do not mean to reflect on the committee, but I say it is not safe for this Congress to delegate such power to any one committee. Members should have an opportunity to read a bill; they should have an opportunity of offering amendments to it, and to hear it discussed. If one committee of the House, whether it be the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Commerce, is to be intrusted with these vast and dangerous powers, I insist that common prudence would prompt the House that it shall, when so passed, receive the votes of three-fourths of the members present. That is the object of this amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if it is not true that the river and harbor bill has been passed at every session for a number of years without discussion, without having been amended, without any member having the power of offering an amendment to it?

Mr. BLACKBURN. In answer to the gentleman's question I would say that never during my short service in Congress has there to my recollection been passed a single river and harbor bill that was not passed without members having an opportunity to offer any amendment or to ask for any explanation.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he did not vote for the last river and harbor bill in that very way?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I answer, yes; but it is the first river and harbor bill I ever voted for, and unless discussion is allowed upon it, and amendments can be offered, and the character of the bill can be understood better hereafter, I sincerely trust and believe it will be the last.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the gentleman to state to the House what amount of money is appropriated annually under the river and harbor bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I was not a member of the Committee on Commerce, but if my memory serves me, about $8,000,000 is the average of the appropriations made in this hasty way.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Georgia to be committed by an arrangement in the Committee on Rules to allow the first amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. KENNA. I desire to offer my amendment at this time if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. STEPHENS. According to an arrangement the first amendment was to be offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. He declines to offer it, and the second amendment must be offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KENNA. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is willing that I shall offer my amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not insist upon my right at this time.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then I will yield to the gentleman from West Virginia to offer his amendment.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted immediately after that clause in the report which relates to the passage of bills under a suspension of the rules; and with the permission of the gentleman from Georgia I desire, after it shall have been read, to say a word in explanation of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

But this rule shall apply only to bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KENNA. After the signature of the gentleman from Kentucky on my right [Mr. BLACKBURN] to the memorable protest which was presented at the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress against the passage of the river and harbor bill in the manner in which it was passed, and after the vote by that gentleman in favor of the last river and harbor bill reported and passed in the same manner, I had hoped that he had reconsidered his opposition to the passage of such bills, and that we would hear no further from him, either in the nature of an amendment to the rules or otherwise, in opposition to the passage of such measures.

This proposition to kill river and harbor appropriation bills by means of rules of this House does not come here now for the first time. A similar effort was made in the last Congress. It comes now, however, in somewhat more decisive terms. If I can have the attention of gentlemen upon this floor for a few minutes I will endeavor to point out to them the manner in which this proposed amendment of the rules would be equivalent to absolutely prohibiting the passage of any bill for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

As members of this House are probably aware, the Committee on Commerce has not the right, which is enjoyed by the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations, of reporting at any time. The very nature of the river and harbor bill, the labor necessary to its proper preparation, are such that it is physically impossible for that committee or any other committee of this House to prepare properly such a bill until late in the session. That committee having the right to report only on those days when it is called up on the regular call of committees, and the time having been reached when the accumulation of business on the Calendar prevents the calling of that committee under the rules of the House as they now stand, they could never report a river and harbor bill to go upon the Calendar.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] favor that style of legislation by which from five to eight millions of dollars annually are taken from the Treasury without members of this House having any power to offer an amendment or any opportunity to discuss the bill, and without the bill being even printed until brought up for action?

Mr. KENNA. I am not prepared to say to the gentleman that I would prefer to consult rather the wishes of a minority of one-third of the members upon this floor as to the propriety of a measure which two-thirds of the House in their superior wisdom desire to pass, and no river and harbor bill has ever been offered without being printed in advance and distributed among members for the fullest information. I submit that when two-thirds of the members of this House, after a full opportunity for the investigation of the merits of any measure, determine in the exercise of their own judgment that a bill should pass in a regular and parliamentary manner, it is their right to pass it; and a minority of one-fourth of the members of this House ought not to be allowed to deprive so large a majority of that right.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KENNA. I prefer to get through first.

Mr. WHITE. I merely want to enlarge on what the gentleman is saying.

Mr. KENNA. If the gentleman will pardon me I will do that myself. [Laughter.] Understanding, then, the condition of the rules of the House to be as I have stated, that the Committee on Commerce is practically excluded under the rules of the House from the right to report a river and harbor appropriation bill for reference to the Committee of the Whole House, to be considered there, it is plain that that committee cannot bring in such a bill at all, unless they do so under a suspension of the rules. The proposition of the Committee on Rules to require a three-fourths vote to pass such a bill is practically a proposition that such a bill shall never be reported and passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. KENNA. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want the gentleman to tell me how the amendment that he has sent to the Clerk's desk would affect the Committee on Commerce. Let me——

Mr. KENNA. I think I understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me state the question.

Mr. KENNA. If I understand my amendment, if adopted then the proposed amendment to the rules would not affect the Committee on Commerce at all.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is where the gentleman shows he does not understand the question he is discussing. I understand that there is no rule which gives the river and harbor bill to the Committee on Commerce. It is there not by rule, simply by courtesy, by sufferance. It belongs to the Committee on Appropriations, and always came from that committee until within the last four or five years.

Mr. KENNA. Allow me to say——

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman will permit me to make one suggestion to him, and I am done. The amendment of the rules which he opposes and which he proposes to amend does not require that a three-fourths vote shall be had in order to pass the river and harbor appropriation bill. It does require that a three-fourths vote shall be had to suspend the rules and pass the bill without its being submitted to the House for consideration. If the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Commerce should bring in a river and harbor appropriation bill which they are not ashamed of, and should be willing to let it be considered by this House, then it would not require a three-fourths vote to pass it.

Mr. KENNA. The Committee on Commerce are not ashamed of any measure which commands the support of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] as did the last river and harbor appropriation bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Of the various bills that the Committee on Commerce have thrust through this House under the gag rule there is but one that has that redeeming feature.

Mr. KENNA. If the Committee on Commerce has "gagged" the gentleman from Kentucky, the House will bear me witness that it is the first time that enterprise has been made successful. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. And it shall be the last.

Mr. KENNA. Let me add a few words further, if I can have the attention of the House for a moment. So far as regards the gentleman's reference to the rule, I will say that the rule which gives jurisdiction to the Committee on Commerce was during the last Congress subjected to most thorough investigation and discussion, in the line of opposition to the passage of the river and harbor bills. This House had then under the fullest discussion the propriety of referring to that committee matters relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors; and not by the mere courtesy of this House, but under the providence of God by an overwhelming vote of the majority, upon a question raised, the decision was entered upon the records of the House that the Committee on Commerce is the proper, and the only proper, committee to whom such matters should be referred. I refer to the debate in reference to the contest between the Committee on Railways and Canals and the Committee on Commerce, when the point was raised that the rule defining the duties of the Committee on Commerce did not give it jurisdiction of these questions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it may be true that this particular amendment is intended to affect all appropriation bills. But every other appropriation bill under the rules may be reported at any time; the river and harbor bill cannot be reported at any time. The effect, therefore, as I have stated, of adopting this amendment will be that the river and harbor bill can only come into this House upon a proposition to suspend the rules which must be sustained by a three-fourths vote. I say to those gentlemen on this floor who believe in internal improvements who do not share in the gentleman's idea that it is iniquitous to pass such a measure with the sanction of two-thirds of the House, that no man who is in favor of this system of improvements and desires to see it carried on can support an amendment which practically and in effect must kill every bill of the kind that may hereafter be presented. I am for the improvement of our rivers, the development of our commerce, and for every other measure which is calculated to afford relief to the people of this great country.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I have no fears that this House will adopt any rule by which the Committee on Commerce shall be required to obtain a vote of three-fourths of the members of the House to suspend the rules and pass a river and harbor appropriation bill. There is not a member here, representing a district in which river and harbor improvements have been commenced or are desired by the people, but would be condemned instantly if his people knew he had favored a proposition calculated to prevent the improvement of the great ways of communication and the consequent cheapening of the cost of transportation. I venture to say that no man could sooner seal his own decree against the chance of returning to the halls of legislation than by voting for a proposition which would prevent these improvements, so valuable to the great mass of the American people—so valuable in improving harbors and opening rivers and consequently so valuable in cheapening transportation.

I have, I say, no fears on this subject. I do not think one need detain the House long by any argument on it. I cannot conceive it possible that members of this House who at all appreciate what their constituents demand in this direction will put themselves in the power of a minority of one-fourth of this House. If they do, the rule will undoubtedly be changed before the first regular session of this Congress shall close.

But there is another view of this case more serious, more important, and when I heard that this proposition had received the unanimous concurrence of the Committee on Rules, I wondered where the republican members of that committee were when this unanimous consent was given. I wonder still; and at the proper time I shall ask an explanation.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONGER. Not now. I am talking about my friends on this side of the House now; and I object to the "third party" coming in to interrupt me.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think the gentleman will hereafter object still more earnestly to the "third party." I want to ask the gentleman this question——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. CONGER. Well, I will yield to my friend.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to know why it is that the river and harbor bill when reported to this House should not take its chances as other bills do and be subject to amendment and discussion.

Mr. CONGER. So it should, if the rules were altered so that this bill could come before the House. But the gentleman's question diverts me from the point I was on in regard to my colleagues on this side of the House. I will, however, pass from that for a moment.

Mr. FRYE. Do not forget it.

Mr. CONGER. No, I will not forget it; if I do I hope the gentleman will remind me of it.

Those who are familiar with the work of the Committee on Commerce upon the river and harbor bills, as I claim to be in some degree from six years' experience on that committee, know that the preparation of a bill of this kind is more laborious than any other bill presented to the House. There is a volume of engineers' reports as large almost as the Revised Statutes, relating to from one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty public works; there are minute reports of special engineers upon each work; there are petitions and memoranda; there are statements of citizens and of transportation companies. No man can venture upon the labor of preparing a river and harbor bill unless he has at his finger ends all the information in regard to the particular improvements to be made, their relations to navigation, to the productions of the region and to transportation. It requires days, weeks, months, years of the most earnest and devoted attention to all those great questions of international commerce and navigation and production and the expense of transportation and the monopolies of railroads—more study, indeed, if the Committee on Commerce would fairly and honestly perform its duty to the commerce of the country, than any other bill which can be originated for the consideration of the House.

Now, sir, there is not a member of the House interested in the smallest improvement before that committee who does not go before it. He is heard by that committee. He presents his claim. He calls attention to the report of the engineers. Everything is searched out and considered for or against the improvement. The committee hears all that can be presented on the subject. Every single item is discussed and examined.

The great work of the Committee on Commerce in reference to the river and harbor appropriation bill is to hold back—to prevent large appropriations, to cut down the estimates of the engineer officers, to cut down the requests of the people of every region. When an improvement is deemed worthy and valuable the people of every district want it done, and done at once, and their Representatives go before the committee and urge that it would be the best economy to make an appropriation up to the full estimate or the very largest appropriation. The work of the members of the Committee on Commerce is steadily to resist this pressure.

Mr. FORT. Does the gentleman think the Committee on Commerce considers appropriations for rivers and harbors so much better than the House can? If that be so, then why is it that the committees having charge of other appropriation bills are required not only to consider them carefully, but to report them to the House to be open to debate and amendment, to general debate and to amendment in debate under the five-minute rule? Why is it the river and harbor appropriation bill is allowed neither to be debated nor amended?

Mr. CONGER. I can tell the gentleman I think almost any member of the House is able to answer the question, and therefore I think I may answer it myself. The gentleman from Illinois never votes for any river and harbor bill. He dwells out upon the prairie, where there is nothing but the dew which falls from heaven to make anything like navigation possible. [Laughter.] But I will answer his question. I will treat him as fairly as if he voted for every river and harbor appropriation bill. Other appropriation committees have the law controlling their action in each case before them. That law specifies just what appropriation shall be made. If they follow the law there is no discretion; they have only to look at the law the preceding year, and follow it. Unless the law has been altered in the mean time they merely have to revise the estimates sent here from the Treasury and see that the appropriation conforms to the law. They have to make appropriations according to law, and it is but little work; indeed it is the work of a mere copyist. In making up the river and harbor appropriation bill, however, the members of the Committee on Commerce must exercise their judgment on every measure, and ascertain whether the interests of the country demand any appropriation, and, if so, how much.

Mr. STEVENSON rose.

Mr. CONGER. I am answering the gentleman from Illinois, but if the gentleman starts another interrogatory on me I shall not get through to-day.

Mr. FORT. I thought the gentleman was through.

Mr. CONGER. Oh, no.

Mr. FORT. It is impossible to tell when the gentleman is talking and when he is not, he talks so much. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. If there is any gentleman in the House who is listened to when he does get the floor with that sublime attention which we all desire to receive from the House, it is my friend from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to answer why the river and harbor bill ought to have the opportunity to be presented as other appropriation bills are; that the Committee on Commerce ought to have the right to make its report at any time, and to have that bill considered from day to day at the time fixed, until disposed of. Such, however, is not the rule. The magnitude of the work prevents its being reported, even in the longest session, at an early day, because the reports of the engineers, ordered by the House itself, are continually coming in even up to the very last moment of its passage. So much for that.

I come now to what I consider a more serious question still, and to which I have invited the attention of those gentlemen on this side of the House who have made unanimous report in favor of the proposition, that an appropriation bill passing under a suspension of the rules shall be required to have a three-fourths vote. Sir, I do not know but it is premature for me to say it, but I venture to say if this House adjourns we shall be called upon to provide appropriations for the next fiscal year or a part of it by the passage of an appropriation bill or by the passage of a joint resolution making appropriations by a majority of this House, or by suspension of the rules. It seems plain to me, however it may be concealed, that this amendment is not aimed at the river and harbor bill. That is a mere pretense. It has alarmed our friends here. This House will on opportunity strike out that part and relieve the Committee on Commerce from the effect of any such rule. But when we come to the time when it requires two-thirds of the House to pass a resolution for appropriations of this year until the 1st of January next there is one-quarter of the members in this House, I venture to say, who can defeat it, but there is not one-third. I venture to say if we can get back beneath the shadow, if we can get back and find what is the moving cause, if we can discover lying far back what is the motive among the strategists of this House we would find that the motive which prompted the offering of this to the House was to prevent two-thirds of the House, of the sober men of the House, of those men who are willing to prevent revolution, of those men who are willing to keep this Government together, to prevent two-thirds from passing an appropriation bill without these political clauses.

Every man here, any man here, may take the roll of the members of this House, may look at the votes which have been given already on some questions, and they may know that they can count upon two-thirds of this House to pass the proper appropriation bills, although we cannot agree upon the political questions, rather than launch out onto the sea of revolution. I know, sir, there are men enough from both sides of the House to make a majority of two-thirds who will provide for the Government, who will prevent revolution, and who will refuse to starve this Government to death. But, sir, I have no such guarantee that three-fourths of this House will do it.

Therefore I ask where were the republican members of the Committee on Rules that assented to a proposition which should prevent two-thirds of the sober-minded, careful, candid, patriotic men of this House from passing a joint resolution to continue the support of the Government when we fail to pass, as undoubtedly we shall fail to pass, the appropriation bills? I would like to have that explanation. And now I think I have said all I desire to say.

Mr. REAGAN. I shall direct my remarks to the last item in the report of the Committee on Rules, as that matter has occupied considerable attention in this discussion. I have always recognized, sir, the difficulties that occur in the passage of any bill appropriating large amounts of money under a suspension of the rules, absolutely cutting off amendment and the privilege of members to debate; and I have never participated in thus passing a river and harbor bill that I did not feel a wish that it were practicable to have the bill open for amendment and debate. It has been, however, generally assumed that if we pass such a bill at all it would be necessary to pass it under a suspension of the rules, in the interest of economy and to secure appropriations to improve the commercial facilities of the country.

Just how much foundation there is for that supposition I am not aware.

This much, however, we know, that in the Senate, where these bills are open to amendment and free debate, there are always large additions made to the bills as reported and restricted by a committee of this House. The apprehension has been that if we attempted to report bills of this kind and open them to amendment and debate, the House would soon increase the amount of appropriations by amendments to such an extent as to make bills that no one would consent to vote for.

I apprehend that there is some foundation for the supposition, and my apprehension rests upon this, that the opposition to the river and harbor bill in the main comes from objections to it on the ground that it does not give money enough to particular localities. There are a few gentlemen who are opposed to all improvements for cheapening transportation, reducing rates of insurance, increasing the value of the products of the country, and increasing the value of manufactured articles, and who, upon the ground of what they call economy, would strike down those improvements which are necessary to accommodate the thirty billions of commerce that float over the waters and pass over the railroads of this country. They do this simply because they do not understand and have never attempted to grasp the subject so as to see to what extent the people are benefited by small appropriations of money to increase commercial facilities, to give larger value to products of the soil and to manufactured articles, and to cheapen the articles of consumption used by the people all over the country. I have no sympathy with that class of gentlemen who oppose improvement as a matter of economy. It is a sort of economy that would stifle trade, cripple production, arrest manufactories, and retard the growth of the country, impede its progress, and injure its prosperity; and I have no sympathy with it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas a question. Is it true that, by the river and harbor bill passed under the gag-law, under the spur of the previous question, without even having been printed, money has been appropriated to localities where there was no necessity for it whatever?

Mr. REAGAN. I will answer the gentleman's question, and I will also answer the question which the gentleman propounded to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. KENNA.] I will answer that question first, because I desire to correct him as to a matter of fact. He asked about the passage of these bills without the privilege of debate or amendment, and when they were submitted to the House without being printed; and in each of his questions he has laid stress on the fact that they were not printed. Now, I have never known a river and harbor bill brought before the House for its action that was not printed days and weeks before action was had on it, and laid on the tables of members, so that they had an opportunity of examining it and determining whether it was one that should meet the approbation of the House.

Now, I will answer another question of the gentleman. There has been more demagoguery and want of information displayed on this floor upon this question than upon any other subject that I know of. I refer to the reiterated charge that in these bills money is appropriated for streams for which no money ought to be appropriated. I desire, sir, to say that in the three bills which have passed in the last four years an item has never been inserted that was not inserted upon the examination, survey, and report by the Engineer department and certified to by the Chief of Engineers. I desire to say further, that I know of no item that has ever gone into a river and harbor appropriation bill of the last three years with which I am familiar that was for the improvement of the navigation of a stream that was not navigated by steamboats or other vessels.

Mr. STEVENSON rose.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to answer one gentleman at a time.

Mr. STEVENSON. At the risk of being considered a demagogue, I want to ask the gentleman from Texas why if these bills are proper they should not be subject to amendment and discussion in the Committee of the Whole House?

Mr. REAGAN. I have been trying to state the reasons which have always controlled the House in that respect without reference to party. It was believed that such a bill, if submitted to the House for amendment and debate, would be at once loaded down with amendments so that no member could vote for it; that it would be defeated; and that in that way there would be lost the benefit of appropriations for the improvement of the commercial facilities of the country. As evidence of that I state that every bill that passes this House has been so increased in the Senate.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the gentleman mean to say that the fact that a bill may be loaded down with amendments is a reason why the House should pass any bill under the gag of the previous question, without the power of amendment or discussion?

Mr. REAGAN. I said, but I think the gentleman from Illinois did not hear me, that this mode of legislation has never commended itself to my entire approval. I would much prefer that bills of this kind should be submitted to the House for amendment and debate. I would rather it were so, because that would close the mouths of gentlemen who make these foolish statements.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is it not a fact in the legislative history of the country that some of the worst laws ever passed in the House have been passed under a suspension of the rules?

Mr. REAGAN. That may be so; but I do not care to go into the subject of general legislation.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. REAGAN. Not now. I will at the close of my remarks.

Mr. CHALMERS. I would like to hear from the gentleman upon this amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] made some statements that it is right I should refer to. The gentleman from Kentucky stated that the Committee on Commerce had not jurisdiction of the river and harbor bill and that it was only by the courtesy of the House that they were permitted to prepare that bill and that they had never been allowed to do it but in four instances. Now, sir, I must express my profound astonishment that the gentleman knows so little upon this subject.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am sure the gentleman from Texas does not want to misrepresent me.

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Texas will find that what I said was that the Committee on Commerce had the custody of the bill under no rule of the House. I know as well as the gentleman does that for many years it has been customary for that committee to make up the river and harbor bill at the request of the Committee on Appropriations and to submit it to that committee before reporting it to the House. I know that four years ago for the first time the Committee on Commerce claimed jurisdiction of the bill, not only to prepare it as it had been done before at the request of the Committee on Appropriations but to report it, and they did it from that time but never before.

Mr. REAGAN. I think the gentleman is seriously mistaken. I had the honor to present at the last session of Congress a historical examination of that very question, deduced from the Journal and laws, to show that a river and harbor bill had not been passed through Congress in thirty years that was not reported by the Committee on Commerce. I did it after a careful examination of the records, journals, and laws. If one single bill has been referred from the Committee on Commerce to the Committee on Appropriations for its action it does not so appear from the Journals of the House. That disposes of what the gentleman says about this being a courtesy only which has been in existence for four years.

I have before me the facts. I will not attempt to refer to them now except in a general way. Thirty years ago there was an able and earnest debate in this House between the members of the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Railroads and Canals, and the Committee on Commerce, as to which of these committees should be entitled to the jurisdiction of the river and harbor bill.

After full discussion the Committee on Commerce was accorded jurisdiction of this subject, and it retained it until the Forty-fourth Congress. One of the then Representatives from Kentucky made the question that the Committee on Commerce under the rule was not entitled to the preparation of this bill, but that the Committee on Railroads and Canals was. The then Speaker, Mr. Kerr, decided against that proposition, and decided that the Committee on Commerce had jurisdiction of the subject. Again last year, after a careful examination, I laid before this House a full history of the subject, and, after an elaborate debate, the House decided again that the Committee on Commerce had jurisdiction of the subject.

It is true that in the early history of the matter, I speak of forty or fifty years ago, the Committee on Appropriations did report some of these bills, and besides that there were one or two bills reported by some other committees, but there has never been a bill for that purpose reported from the Committee on Railroads and Canals; so that the gentleman will see that I am not mistaken, for I speak from the record, and he had no right to say that this committee exercises jurisdiction over this subject and performs the duty of preparing the bill as a matter of courtesy, but it holds it by the deliberate judgment of the House twice expressed, once more than thirty years ago, once last year, and supplemented by the decision of a Speaker of this House.

He will also see, if he will take the trouble to turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the early part of the last Congress, that for thirty years no committee but the Committee on Commerce has ever reported a bill to this House for the improvement of rivers and harbors. That is all I desire to say on that subject, except that it is just about as accurate as the general denunciations upon this floor usually are. I believe the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. FINLEY. One question which I desired to ask the gentleman was substantially the one asked by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. STEVENSON,] and which has been answered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] Another question was this, if I understood the gentleman correctly, he stated that there was no appropriation for any rivers which were not navigable or were not being navigated.

Mr. REAGAN. I did make that statement.

Mr. FINLEY. At the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress, when we had an incidental discussion of this question, it was asserted upon the floor of this House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on my right [Mr. WRIGHT] that the rivers Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh were small streams of water, one of them, I understood him to say, so small that a man could jump across it. I desire the gentleman to state whether those streams are navigable or not?

Mr. REAGAN. I will state now that the gentleman's statement shows his utter ignorance of the whole subject.

Mr. FINLEY. I am very willing to be informed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Allow me to ask——

Mr. REAGAN. No, one question at a time. The Kiskiminetas and Conemaugh were inserted in the bill not with appropriations to improve them; that was not asked nor was it granted. But they were inserted for examination.

Mr. FINLEY. And——

Mr. REAGAN. Let me get through; I will answer the question. They were inserted there, at the instance of the Representative through whose district they run, for examination and survey. The practice of the Engineer Bureau is, when a provision is put in a bill for the examination or survey of a stream, to send a person to make a preliminary examination. If that preliminary examination indicates that a survey is desirable, then the survey is made.

Mr. SPARKS. How much was appropriated for that survey?

Mr. REAGAN. Let me answer the question. If the report is in favor of a survey, then a survey is made and an estimate sent in for an appropriation to improve the river. I do not know what the action of the Department in that case was. I know that gentlemen amused themselves very much here by stating to the House and to the country that we appropriated money for the improvement of those streams, when we never appropriated one dollar for that purpose, and when the predicate of an appropriation under the practice of the Government was never laid.

Mr. SPARKS. As the gentleman has spoken of demagogues, will he allow me to ask him how much money was appropriated to make that survey?

Mr. REAGAN. As I understand it, no survey at all was made. A recognizance was made, but no survey was ever made; and the recognizances in such cases are made by salaried officers and cost nothing.

Mr. SPARKS. Well, how much was appropriated for the recognizance?

Mr. KENNA. No specific sum at all.

Mr. SPARKS. How much?

Mr. REAGAN. There was appropriated in the bill $100,000 or $150,000 to make the surveys authorized by the bill, and to be employed in finishing the works for which there was no special appropriation.

Mr. SPARKS. Allow me to ask the gentleman this question: whether or not the river and harbor bill of the last Congress was not made up on the basis of catching more than two-thirds of the votes of this House?

Mr. REAGAN. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question, for it enables me to say what I desire to say.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. REAGAN. I will, if the gentleman will not be in too much of a hurry. Just let him keep quiet.

Mr. SPARKS. I am very cool.

Mr. REAGAN. I will answer the question. The gentleman asks me if that bill was not made up on the basis of securing a two-thirds vote in this House. I say in reply that so far as I was concerned I never asked a man how he would vote on it, and I never knew how any member would vote upon it unless the information came to me in some voluntary manner. In regard to the three bills with which I have been connected, I have never inquired how any man would vote on either of them; and I make that statement here in the presence of this whole House. I have always thought that it was an unjust and improper course for any one to put items of appropriation in a bill to secure votes for its passage, and I have utterly repudiated such a course.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman now let me ask him a question?

Mr. REAGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Texas has made an issue with me, and it must of necessity be recognized by the House as an issue of fact. I will not take the time of the House to restate what I have said in regard to the Committee on Commerce never having had jurisdiction of the river and harbor bill until four years ago, which then occurred under the administration of the gentleman who is now Speaker of this House and who was at that time the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I am sure that he will bear me out in the statement I make that then for the first time the Committee on Commerce undertook to bring into the House and control a river and harbor appropriation bill. Prior to that time for years they had, upon the request of the Committee on Appropriations, examined estimates and prepared the bill as a matter of convenience. But more than that, here is Rule 79 of this House which stands unrepealed to-day:

It shall be the duty of the Committee on Commerce to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things touching the commerce of the United States as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their opinion thereon.

This rule defines the duties of the Committee on Commerce; and nowhere does it clothe that committee with any power in reference to the preparation of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

But, sir, the gentleman has appealed to the record and has impugned my information. I now desire to refer him to a record far more recent than any he has been using. I ask him whether he does not know—surely a gentleman who has served as the chairman of the Committee on Commerce should know——

Mr. REAGAN. I do not yield for a speech; the gentleman can make his speech after I am done.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Does he not know that in the Forty-second Congress (this is only the Forty-sixth) the consular and diplomatic bill was sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs? Does he not know that in the Forty-third Congress, on the 30th of April, 1874—

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. REAGAN. I was not then a member.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That was in 1874.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire not to be further interrupted. The gentleman, I have no doubt, will find that whatever was done at that time was done by reason of the defect in the rules which denied to the Committee on Commerce the privilege possessed by the Committee on Appropriations of reporting at any time. Therefore I presume the bill after being prepared in the Committee on Commerce was, as a matter of convenience, brought before the House and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Does the gentleman mean to say that the bill was prepared by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BLACKBURN. On the contrary, at the request of the Committee on Appropriations the Committee on Commerce prepared the bill, brought it into the House, and referred it to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REAGAN. Then, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has not strengthened his position——

Mr. SPARKS. Is not the river and harbor bill an appropriation bill proper?

Mr. REAGAN. It is.

Mr. SPARKS. Then why should the Committee on Commerce have charge of its preparation?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Illinois may be much grieved that the Committee on Appropriations, of which he has been a member, has not control of the river and harbor bill in addition to all the other general appropriation bills. I sympathize with him, but I cannot help him. The rules of the House do not give this subject to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman's reply may be good wit, but it does not answer my question. The gentleman admits that this bill is an appropriation bill. Why, then, I ask him, is it not referred to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know what reasons have influenced this House for thirty years in regard to this matter. Many considerations have doubtless influenced it. The Committee on Commerce is charged primarily—the very definition of the duties of the committee shows it—with the consideration of questions relating to the commerce of the country. The fact which I have stated that for thirty years past no bill of this kind has been prepared and reported by any other committee than the Committee of Cmmerce stands attested by the Journal. More than thirty years ago, as appears by the debates, it was thought right by the House that the Committee on Commerce should take up and report river and harbor bills. This committee has made reports of those bills from that time to this. However, if it is the desire of the House to change the rule and transfer the preparation and report of these bills to the Committee on Appropriations, I think that would be better than to leave this subject in the hands of the Committee on Commerce, tied up by the rules in such a way as to defeat legislation on the subject.

Mr. SPARKS. Is the river and harbor bill rightfully, under the rules, in charge of the Committee on Commerce any more than the Indian appropriation bill should be in charge of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Army appropriation bill in charge of the Committee on Military Affairs, or the Post-Office appropriation bill in charge of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads? Is there any greater reason why the Committee on Commerce should have control of this appropriation bill than that these other committees should have control of these bills respectively?

Mr. REAGAN. In principle, I do not see any reason that should take this bill to the Committee on Commerce more than the Army appropriation bill to the Committee on Military Affairs or the naval appropriation bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I only take the matter as I find it. If gentlemen are not satisfied with the rules, let them change them; but let the change be fair and just and manly.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman will allow me to suggest a very good reason why the river and harbor bill does not go to the Committee on Appropriations. Because the rules of the House do not specifically refer that subject to the Committee on Appropriations, while these other bills, the Indian appropriation bill, the Post-Office appropriation bill, &c., are by name given in charge of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] was aware of that when he asked his question. The rules of the House, as well as its practice, give the preparation of this bill to the Committee on Commerce.

But I want to say a word directly upon the proposed amendment to the rules. As the rules now stand, the Committee on Commerce has no privilege of reporting appropriation bills at any other time than when the committee is regularly called for reports. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] have called attention to the difficulty and labor connected with the preparation of the river and harbor bills and the time that such preparation necessarily consumes. This necessarily prevents a report upon the subject till late in the session; and then, the Committee on Commerce being without the privilege accorded to the Committee on Appropriations, it is difficult if not impracticable to have the bill debated and amended in Committee of the Whole before its passage. It is proposed now to add to the difficulty of securing action on the river and harbor appropriation bill; for this proposed amendment can have no reference in general to any other bill. It is true that at the last session the sundry civil appropriation bill was, just at the close of the session, passed under a suspension of the rules in order to get it through, because it was not reported in time to be considered by the House in the ordinary way. Hence, it was passed under a suspension of the rules in order to go that far toward avoiding the necessity for a called session of Congress. If there has been any general appropriation bill passed under a suspension of the rules, it has not been in my experience in the House. That stands as an isolated exception. It was caused by the late day at which the bill was prepared, and it was deemed necessary to pass it in that way in order to avoid a called session of Congress.

I take it for granted, Mr. Speaker, that requiring a three-fourths vote to suspend the rules has for its object the prevention of passing under a suspension of the rules any river and harbor appropriation bill. It may be unwise to pass these bills under a suspension of the rules at all. The principle of legislation in a country like this is that the majority shall control. In exceptional cases and to guard against hasty and inconsiderate legislation for some other purposes, we say that in certain cases two-thirds may suspend the rules and pass a bill. Now it is proposed that we shall go beyond that, trench still further on the majority principle, and assume that three-quarters of the House are inconsiderate, wasteful, extravagant, unpatriotic, and that they must put themselves under the guardianship of one-quarter of its members, who by their virtue, their patriotism, their integrity, their economy, are charged upon their own assumption with taking special care of the country and its interests.

Mr. SPARKS. Would you suspend the rules by a majority vote?

Mr. REAGAN. I have not said any such thing.

Mr. SPARKS. But that is the proposition here. The question is not about the passage of any measure, good or bad; but it is on the suspension of the rules, and I ask the gentleman now whether this thing of suspending the rules, that is to go outside of the rules, shall be done according to his judgment by a mere majority vote?

Mr. REAGAN. I have not stated anything of the sort and I am not called upon to do it.

Mr. SPARKS. You say you would do it by a two-thirds vote; why not by a three-fourths vote?

Mr. REAGAN. That is going far beyond what we ought to do, trenching still further upon the rights of the majority of the House.

Mr. SPARKS. But it seems a majority of the Committee on Rules think otherwise.

Mr. REAGAN. I am sorry for that. I regret that they have done it. What I say is this, that it is for the House to settle the question, and I am no more concerned in that than any other member of the House, and that is, whether it is their purpose, by putting this provision on the bill and not according to the Committee on Commerce the privilege of reporting the bill as the Committee on Appropriations might report it, to defeat any river and harbor bill. I call the attention of members to the fact—they will have to meet their constituents, to confront the country on the fact, if they vote for this—that they will take a step which is to injure the country by defeating that kind of legislation which has been employed for a number of years in promoting the commercial interests of the country.

Now, sir, there have been for several years appropriations made which have done much to improve the harbors, deepening the inlets to them; improving the navigation of rivers by the removal of obstructions, thereby reducing the cost of insurance and transportation; reducing the cost of freights, and in every way facilitating and expediting the commercial interests of the country. In the execution of this policy I desire to call the attention of members to the fact that in 1870 there was appropriated $3,947,000 for this purpose; in 1871, $4,700,000.

Mr. ATKINS. Allow me for one moment.

Mr. REAGAN. Not now; wait until I get through with my statement.

In 1872, $5,588,000 were appropriated for this purpose; in 1873, $6,102,000; 1874, $5,193,000; 1875, $6,643,000; in 1876, $5,015,000; in 1878, over $8,000,000, and in 1879, that is, for the present year, over $6,000,000. All this has been in pursuance of a policy which has met the approval of Congress certainly since 1869–'70 until now.

Mr. ATKINS. The question which I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas is this: whether the issue as to what committees shall have charge of the river and harbor bill is raised in the report of the Committee on Rules now pending?

Mr. KENNA. No, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. Then why this discussion?

Mr. REAGAN. Because your former colleague on the committee and the gentleman from Kentucky drew it out.

Mr. ATKINS. Then the discussion is all out of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I am sorry the gentleman from Tennessee did not discover it to be out of order when the gentlemen from Illinois and Kentucky were upon the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. I have had time since the gentleman from Texas got the floor to make several discoveries so far as that is concerned.

Mr. REAGAN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have felt it was right to defend the action of the Committee on Commerce against charges made against that committee, and I do not think I have violated the rules of the House.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to modify my amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield now to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire, by way of supplement to the proof I have already furnished to the gentleman from Texas and the House as to my being absolutely correct in the statement I have made, to refer the gentleman to the action taken by this House on the 30th of April, 1874, where the Committee on Appropriations reported this very river and harbor bill, and by the action of the House it was sent to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REAGAN. What year?

Mr. BLACKBURN. April 30, 1874.

I desire to supplement that now with just this one statement, that in the Journal of the 16th of February, 1875, I find this:

Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4740) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REAGAN. That was simply because the Committee on Commerce had not the same privilege of reporting as the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MILLS. If the gentleman from Kentucky will look further he will find on the 22d of February Mr. SAWYER's motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, and it was passed on his motion. The Committee on Appropriations reported the bill back, and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and then, on motion of Mr. SAWYER, the rules were suspended, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was passed.

Mr. REAGAN. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. KENNA,] who desires to modify his amendment.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to withdraw the proposition to add to the end of the section as reported the words I sent to the Clerk's desk, and move instead to strike out the whole clause which relates to the suspension of the rules.

Mr. STEPHENS addressed the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] has control of the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I had the floor and have not yet yielded it.

Mr. BLOUNT. How much time has the gentleman from Texas?

The SPEAKER. One hour.

Mr. BLOUNT. How much time has he left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has occupied the floor about twenty-three minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS. I only wish to make a suggestion to the House as to the debate. I desire that a reasonable time should be allowed for debate on this subject, and I suggest now to the House that at a certain hour, by common consent, say two o'clock, the vote shall be taken, and that it shall be taken on each proposition separately.

The SPEAKER. It is the right of any member to call for a division.

Mr. STEPHENS. My proposition is that a time shall be fixed for closing the debate, and that when the debate is closed a vote shall be taken on each proposition and upon the pending amendments without debate.

Mr. REAGAN. I have not yielded the floor to have this motion interposed now. I will be through in a moment, and then the gentleman from Georgia can resume charge of the matter. I now desire, with the permission of the gentleman from Georgia, to offer a substitute for the last clause of the report of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has not the floor to use in that way. The report of the Committee on Rules is under the charge of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that my amendment may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter the Committee on Commerce shall have the same privilege to report a bill making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors that is accorded to the Committee on Appropriations in reporting general appropriation bills.

Mr. COX. I do not intend to revamp old issues or to discuss irrelevant matters. It is not logical nor pertinent to this report that we should discuss commerce and its needs transportation and its cheapness, or any system of internal improvements. The issue raised by that part of the report of the committee which has been most discussed is this: Shall we make a conspicuous exception with regard to the river and harbor bill? Shall we say that such bills, for some hidden or public or other purpose, shall have some sort of preference and priority? If so, gentlemen should give reasons for it. What reasons can they give? Why, why should there not be scrutiny into a bill of this nature the same as into other appropriation bills? I say, sir, there is more need of particular scrutiny and general debate on a bill whose very make-up, tendency, and design is "log-rolling."

I charge nothing upon the gentleman from Texas, I impugn no man's motive, when I say that in order to pass such bills by a two-thirds vote it is necessary to keep a weather-eye out to make some a nice local calculus for the two-thirds majority. We all know it to be so; no gentleman can deny it. The gentleman says he asked no man to vote for a bill thus made up. To be sure he did not. Of course he would not. Why should he? When his bill is put together is it not a foregone conclusion? There is no one-third left to defeat it. When the river and harbor bill of 1878 came in with nearly $8,000,000 in it, it followed the precedent set by Judge Holman, of Indiana; but, sir, I know, for he told me, that he regretted it as a bad example. That eight-million bill was crowded through without discussion, without consideration. It passed upon the 23d of April, 1878. But we did provoke some useless discussion after the bill was through. That arose from a protest I hurriedly penned and presented under difficulties. It was signed by some forty members, to this effect:

Several MEMBERS. Let the Clerk read it.

Mr. COX. I will send it to the Clerk's desk so that it may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

We, the undersigned, members of the Forty-fifth Congress, protest against the passage of the substitute report of Mr. REAGAN, of Texas, to House bill No. 4236, making appropriation for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, for the following reasons:

1. The bill contains appropriations to the amount of $7,293,700, and is of such large amount that the rules of the House should not be suspended to facilitate its passage without debate and consideration.

2. All our rules, and especially Rule 121, specially applicable to appropriations for works of internal improvement, are intended to guard against a vote in gross on such appropriations, and require, for wise purposes, separate votes on each item, under certain conditions. We protest against the infraction of so salutary a rule on a bill where the tendency is to combine for general spoliation upon the Treasury.

3. The right of the House of Representatives to consider appropriations in Committee of the Whole House, or at least in the House itself, should be sacredly protected. This suspension of the rules deprives this House of our traditional privilege, and thus encourages similar attempts upon the Treasury to gratify local interests.

The eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, to "regulate commerce among the several States," is virtually abrogated, and the very authority under which our legislation is conducted defied by a bill of this nature, which appropriates money for improvements of rivers located wholly within one particular State and of no national importance. In a time of general depression and with the Treasury threatened with a deficit, it is unwise and unjust to the tax-payers to place such a burden, as this bill proposes, upon them.

A VOICE. All democrats, are they?

Mr. COX. The signers of that protest are not all democrats. Many respectable gentlemen on the other side signed that paper; and more would have done so but for the haste. In the original copy of the protest the words "spoliation upon the Treasury" were used.

I remember very well a scene that occurred here. I am sorry to say that there was a "solid South" led by my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] on the other side, who insisted that the word "spoliation" was a reflection and an insult to the House. To placate this clamor I withdrew the offending word, much to the disgust of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] whom I do not see in his seat. He thought my courtesy better than my courage. But, sir, that protest was timely and true. It was based upon a principle of honest legislation. That principle prevails in every deliberative body that passes laws to pay out the people's money to aid government. I do not speak of our State Legislatures. Nor do I limit my expression to this hemisphere, nor to republican representative assemblies. No nation which has deliberative assembly, in the form of legislatures, ever consents to pass a bill for paying out money raised by taxes without full consideration and debate as to the objects of such appropriation. We are making ourselves exceptional; and even monarchical countries shame us for our lack of manhood.

I challenge any member to show any one Congress, Reichstag, Chamber, Cortes, or any other legislative body which passes without deliberation and debate, and by suspensions of rules that would cut off inquiry and discussion on a money bill. We are asked here to confirm the bad practice of suspending—what? All rules. What for? To run millions through on a committee report without debate here. Why, sir, when you suspend all the rules you act without any rules—chaos! The committee desires cosmos, order, or some approach to it. There are authorities for my statement. The volume in my hand is Correspondence Relative to the Budgets of Various Countries, edited by J. W. Probyn. It is published in London, Paris, and New York in 1877. The questions as to certain practices in legislative bodies were asked by the Cobden club of all the various statesmen of the various countries and replies are given. Here is question 4:

If such examination of the details of the proposed expenditure takes place by committees appointed for such purpose, are the decisions of such committees in regard to any reductions of expenditures subject to the revision of the government or of the assembly?

Here are some of the answers; which I shall read without comment.

From Austria:

The decisions of the finance committee with regard to a reduction of the expenditure are not at all subject to the revision of the government; but the latter, in order to co-operate in fixing the budget with the legislature, has to explain and defend the government proposals in the committee as well as in the house; hence the minister whose department is concerned and is under discussion in a sitting of the committee has to be present. Consequently the committee must, in the absence of a particular minister, postpone the discussion of his department till he can appear.

The same thing is more expressly stated to be the custom in Belgium; where the house, "after debate," decides whether it will reject or accept any given proposal. (Page 12:)

When the discussion of the various budgets by the committees gives rise to proposals for reduction or increase of the estimates, these or any other proposals are examined by the central committee, which submits whatever observations it sees fit to the government. The report mentions the proposals of the committees, and the conclusion come to by the central committee. It makes known also the replies of the ministers, and all are examined and discussed by the full chamber.

In Denmark, where the ministers are permitted to make observations on the budget in the Chamber, the answer is:

The conclusions arrived at by the sections or committees are subject to the decision of the whole house.

And are we to retrograde when even kingly realms do so well in considering how the people's money is to be spent?

The ministers of the crown, I have said, are admitted to make observations in the Danish lower house, but the decisions and proposals of the committee are only subject to revision and alteration by the Assembly.

One of the eminent philosophic statesmen of Denmark gives credit for these jealousies of the money appropriation power to the "peasant majority;" and for it he forgives them many political faults.

From France the significant answer was that no decisions come to by the committee or by its subdivisions had any legal force. The Assembly decided everything. M. Leon Say (page 49) sums up the French practice in his reply when he says:

The vote on the budget is taken chapter by chapter. Even if the budget commission has suppressed the request of the government, they will overrule the committee to aid the government.

Another writer (page 56) pithily answers the query thus:

The budget commission, of which the committees or subcommittees are only subdivisions, does not decide anything definitely; it confines itself to proposing to the Chamber a given reduction or increase, as it thinks fit. Generally it calls before it the ministers or heads of departments and discusses modification of the budget with them, but this discussion has no other object than that of enlightening the members of the commission.

In the Chamber, the minister and each deputy may attack or defend the report of the commission or the proposals of the Government, as well as present amendments. New amendments—that is, those which have not been seen by the commission—are sent back to it before any discussion takes place, so that the commission may give its opinion.

In general, the views of the commission are adopted by the Chamber; sometimes the commission remains in a minority on a given question.

Yet the gentlemen who have interests in river and harbor bills would not allow us the privilege even of the French Chamber!

From Holland the answer was:

If the bill passes (amended or not) in the second chamber it is forwarded to the first chamber of the States-General, where it is examined in the same manner, first in the sections, afterward in the full house, with this exception only that no more amendments can be proposed. (Page 71.)

From Germany, the old land of free discussion, where the Witenagemote was the forerunner of discreet and ample debate in the interest of the people, the model of the English Commons and the American Congress—what from her:

The decisions of the budget committee constitute proposals, which are laid before the whole house, which adopts or rejects them after full discussion.

Whether in the Reichstag or Bundesrath, or any other German house or assembly, the authorization of expenditures must come from the wisdom of free debate. Such a proposition as this to suspend all rules and pass supplies, without debate, would be regarded as an unexampled outrage on free representative government.

In Italy the practice is as follows, as given on page 80 of this little red budget volume:

The committee refer and propose matters directly to the Assembly or Chamber, which deliberates upon the proposals.

A reduction voted by the Chamber of Deputies may not be approved by the Senate, and on the other hand the Senate may vote a reduction not voted by the Chamber.

In this case the project of the budget as amended returns from the Senate to the Deputies. The report of the general committee on the amendment passed by the other house is laid before the Chamber of Deputies, which discusses and votes according to the usual forms.

Are we to be less democratic or less republican than the Italian Chamber? Where is our vaunted independence if a committee is to bind us and make a bill to which no minority can except by rational discussion?

Signor Boccardo writes from Genoa, (page 87,) and concisely, of the Italian custom. He says: "The committees refer their conclusions to Parliament, which discusses the proposals and deliberates upon them."

In Portugal the Assembly revises the expenditures, but the government generally gets what it wants.

In Russia there is no representative assembly, but there is an independent Council of the Empire, and their practice is better than that we have adopted as to river and harbor bills! Discussion is ample.

In Sweden the committee only inquires. It does not decide. It is the Riksdag which discusses and decides. They have exclusive rights; his majesty only may consent.

But what sort of report was that which was made from America. It is curious to read it in the light of these proposals to pass one appropriation bill without consideration.

Senator DAWES answers thus:

In practice almost every item is contested; some one member playing the role of economist and leading the attacks. The Executive must take them as they finally pass.

Mr. David A. Wells advised the querists "that all appropriations were subject to careful examination and debate in open legislative session."

Another writer, J. S. Moore by name, called "the editor of the World," says very truly:

Of course, as I have already explained, any member may move an amendment and give his reason; and very often estimates made by the appropriation committee are stricken out, diminished, or increased. The appropriation committee, no doubt, exercises a great prestige, but it is the majority in the House that sustains their wisdom or rejects it.

What a satirical commentary are these responses as to our congressional practice, in view of the river and harbor bills of the past few years. Congress for the last three years (for this is not the uniform practice) has been in the habit, for some reason or other, of passing these river and harbor appropriation bills without deliberation or scrutiny. Whatever may be said of the bills themselves, the practice is shameful, disgraceful in the light of progressive civilization! It is against all the customs of civilized communities and deliberative bodies, and yet for objecting to such a system the gentleman from Texas undertakes to tell us that we are demagogues.

Mr. REAGAN. Not as to that; it was in relation to the ignorance displayed about the bill.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Texas said afterward that his object in cutting off debate was to prevent discussion and foolish remarks being made.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman quotes me wrong; I said no such thing.

Mr. COX. The gentleman said it was to prevent foolish remarks.

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; not to prevent foolish remarks on the bill.

Mr. COX. What was your language about foolish remarks?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman does not understand me, and I will not allow myself to be put in an attitude of advocating the cutting off of debate. I did no such thing; on the contrary I expressly repeated the wish that the condition of things would allow free discussion and amendments to the bill.

Mr. COX. Did not the gentleman in the first place speak in favor of a proposition to cut off all debate, to suspend all the rules and pass the bills without debate or consideration?

Let me recommend, when he calls others to judgment, a little scripture. If he will take it and read it prayerfully it will do him good:

Therefore thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that judgest: for wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself; for thou that judgest doest the same things.

But we are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth against them which commit such things.

And thinkest thou this, O man, that judgest them which do such things, and doest the same, that thou shalt escape the judgment of God?

And art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind, a light of them which are in darkness.

An instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, which hast the form of knowledge and of the truth in the law.

Thou therefore which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal?—Rom., c. ii, 21.

It would be irregular to say that about stealing; I did not mean to go so far. [Laughter.] And I withdraw that portion of the extract. Still I would throw out in the most dim and nebulous form the idea that the river and harbor appropriation bill is a sort of modern and model larceny. I would not use the word "steal" in reference to all the bills brought into this House.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman will allow me. I have been entertained by his quotation of Scripture, but would like to hear his application of it.

Mr. COX. It is this, that when the gentleman undertakes to teach others he should be very careful in what he says. He says he is in favor of debate, and yet brings in a proposition to cut off all debate. He is a teacher of the blind, and is blind himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman confounds necessity with desire. The gentleman should not misrepresent me.

Mr. COX. I know the gentleman may feel under the necessity of crowding through an eight-million bill for rivers and harbors. That is a necessity. He does not desire to do it, but he does it. [Laughter.] Now where does he stand——

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection to the gentleman indulging his wit by perversion of my remarks if he chooses.

Mr. COX. Well, I will see in the morning, when I look at the RECORD, whether I have perverted the gentleman's remarks, and if I have I will make amends. One thing I have done, certainly; I have made him good-natured.

Now the point I desire to make to this House is above all this little controversy about rivers and harbors. It is that by the common consent and rules of all deliberative bodies, the world over, no money bills are ever passed without fair debate and consideration. Is it not a ground of grave suspicion against a bill if it will not bear the fiercest inquisition and test? A bill has a black eye, it wears an ugly visor before it gets here, if it cannot have all its features displayed and scrutinized.

I stated the other day that I believed it a good principle of parliamentary law that every measure should stand or fall on its own reason, on its own proper basis. In the State of New York our constitution with reference to appropriation bills not only allows full discusion, not only allows a vote on every item of appropriation, but it gives to the governor of the State the right to veto each and any particular item. This, sir, is in the line of true economy and just legislation. Yet it is gravely urged here, after we have passed the noon of the nineteenth century and after there has been great progress made in political science and parliamentary practice, that a particular kind of bill, involving for the last ten years sixty-odd millions of dollars, should be passed through this House by a system which will enable various men of divers localities and similar inclinations to combine for a common raid upon the Treasury. This proposed rule was intended to cut up such a system, if not wholly by the root, to restrain it to some appreciable extent.

I hope the House will, before any special bill comes in and by an excess of present and timely virtue, restrain the House by an amendment of the rule as to suspensions.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. COX. Very well.

Mr. DUNNELL. Does the gentleman favor that portion of the report of the Committee on Rules which is now under discussion?

Mr. COX. I not only favor it, but if I had the power I would go further and introduce a rule that an appropriation bill should never be passed under a suspension of the rules, not even by a three-fourths vote.

Mr. DUNNELL. Then your argument is as much against the proposed rule as against the existing custom.

Mr. COX. That depends upon who heard the argument and how it was heard. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS. I desire to submit a proposition to the House, to which I hope there will be general consent. It is that the vote shall be taken upon the report of the Committee on Rules at half past two o'clock; in the mean time amendments to be offered to each proposition; and when the debate shall have closed at half past two o'clock, then the propositions to be taken up and voted on separately with the pending amendments without further debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to that at all, except that I have been authorized by the Committee on Rules to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire also to speak a few words upon the report.

Mr. STEPHENS. You can have the floor now.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] said that he would yield to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly; all amendments to come in between now and the hour I have named. I ask the House now to pass an order that at half past two o'clock all debate shall be closed upon this report.

The order was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the order just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend the report by adding that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The last clause of Rule 120 is hereby so amended as to read as follows:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendments thereto changing existing law be in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. On the subject of the proposed rule that has been discussed so long I have only a word to say. There was certainly no idea on the part of any member of the Committee on Rules, so far as I know, that there was any purpose to use the power suggested in the proposed rule to prevent the passage of any appropriation bill that had been debated, or to provide for any such contingency as that suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER.] If there is any danger of that sort it is fair to consider it, and it is fair to reject the proposed rule. I do not care much about it; there is a proposition pending to strike it out altogether, and I do not care very much whether that proposition prevails or not. Possibly in the present temper of the House it ought to prevail.

But this I do want to say: there is a general feeling in the country that there has been an abuse in passing great appropriation bills without debate. Yet I admit that it has been the opinion of some of our best men, and I have shared that opinion to some extent, that probably we obtained a river and harbor bill with a smaller appropriation in the aggregate by passing it under a suspension of the rules than we would have done if it had been open to general amendment, in which case very likely it would have been loaded down by amendments making the aggregate of appropriation larger. I know the distinguished gentleman from New York, Mr. Potter, not now a member of this House, frequently said that he voted for the passage of the river and harbor bill under a suspension of the rules in order to prevent the amount of appropriations being greatly enlarged beyond what the Committee on Commerce reported.

It is also due to the truth of the history of the case to correct some things said by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] In 1872, when I was appointed chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I found a custom prevailing, not a rule, which was followed during the whole of my four years' service as chairman of that committee, and, as I know, had been followed while my predecessor, Mr. DAWES, was chairman of the committee. That custom was this: When the Committee on Appropriations had gone over the whole ground of appropriations far enough to determine what they ought to recommend as the aggregate amount of appropriations for the year, we said to the Committee on Commerce, "We think the House can afford to appropriate so much money—$4,000,000, $3,000,000, $5,000,000—for rivers and harbors, and we would like you to draft a bill distributing that amount of money, and have it referred to us." That was done in every instance. The Committee on Commerce prepared the bill and reported it to the House for reference to the Committee on Appropriations. If the Committee on Commerce had not exceeded the amount which the Committee on Appropriations thought could be properly spent in the aggregate for that purpose, we always reported the bill back to the House just as it came from the Committee on Commerce. As a matter of fact, it was in every instance within my knowledge reported back without change; and I think that almost always we asked some gentleman representing the Committee on Commerce to take charge of the bill in the House. That was a matter of comity between the two committees, but the Committee on Appropriations kept control of the total amounts of appropriation to be made. Now, shortly after I ceased to be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and during the chairmanship of the present Speaker, he and his committee were overruled in a struggle in the House by the Committee on Commerce, who reported a river and harbor bill directly to the House and put it on its passage under a suspension of the rules; and since that time—unfortunately, as I think—the business has been taken wholly out of the hands of the Committee on Appropriations. It was by no fault of the present Speaker, who was then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and by no fault of that committee; but they were overborne by numbers. Since that time the Committee on Commerce has had, not as a matter of rule, but as a matter of custom, exclusive control of the river and harbor bill. I think, too, it has been found necessary almost always to put that bill on its passage under a suspension of the rules.

Now, the proposition coming from the Committee on Rules is not to declare that the bill shall never pass except by a three-fourths vote, but that if a compound motion is made to suspend the rules and pass the bill, the adoption of that motion shall require a three-fourths vote. This will not at all stand in the way of a motion to suspend the rules and bring the river and harbor bill up for immediate consideration and action. This can still be done under a two-thirds vote.

Mr. KENNA. If this proposed rule be adopted, may not a minority of the House defeat a suspension of the rules for any purpose that would put the river and harbor bill in the line of progress?

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, no. As the rule now stands, and as it would stand with this amendment, two-thirds would suspend the rules and bring the bill up for immediate consideration, and then the majority could pass it. That is right. The only purpose of this proposed addition to the rules was, as I understood, to prevent the forcing of the bill through by a two-thirds vote without any consideration.

But if our friends on either side think that this rule in its operation will reach too widely and will include other bills which ought not to be included, I am willing that the proposition should not be adopted.

Mr. KENNA. I am glad to hear the gentleman say so.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not understand that the proposed rule bears any such construction as the gentleman from Ohio now gives it. I would like to have the proposed rule read in this connection.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the Clerk read it. The gentleman will see that I am right about the matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rule —. On a motion to suspend the rules and pass a general appropriation bill an affirmative vote of three-fourths of the members present and voting thereon shall be necessary.

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] will see that this three-fourths vote is to be necessary only on a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill by one vote. It would not apply to a motion to suspend the rules and consider a bill.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me ask the gentleman one question, because the remarks which the gentleman now makes will not bind the House or the Speaker in the future in the construction of this rule if it be adopted, as I find such remarks made in connection with former changes of the rules have not had any such binding effect. I ask the gentleman whether this rule, if adopted, will not, by implication under its fair construction, repeal all rules with reference to the suspension of rules and the passage of bills?

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, no. This refers to appropriation bills only.

Mr. CALKINS. I mean so far as regards appropriation bills.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think not.

Mr. CALKINS. Will not this proposition, if adopted, repeal absolutely, by implication, every provision with reference to these bills?

Mr. GARFIELD. I think not. If there is any danger of that we had better vote down the proposition. I do not think it is of enough consequence to justify spending much time upon it.

Mr. STEPHENS. This proposed rule, as I understand, will not interfere in the slightest degree with the general rule in regard to suspending the rules by a two-thirds vote. On this point I agree entirely with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] The object is simply to assert that a two-thirds vote shall not be sufficient to pass a bill appropriating money without debate upon a motion to suspend the rules. If this proposition be adopted, every provision of the existing rules which permits a two-thirds vote to suspend the rules and take up any measure for consideration will remain intact.

Mr. GARFIELD. So I think.

Mr. STEPHENS. An appropriation bill, when brought up for consideration from the Committee on Commerce or any other committee, can be passed by a majority vote.

Mr. ATKINS. In other words, this new rule will simply require a three-fourths vote to suspend the rules and pass a bill. That is the whole of it.

Mr. GARFIELD. If adopted, this rule will provide that by a single vote two-thirds shall not be sufficient to do both things—to suspend the rules and to pass. That is a very different motion from one to suspend the rules and bring up a bill for immediate consideration.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. GARFIELD. For a question only, as I have but little time.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not think the gentleman stated it correctly. The suspension, as I understand him, would simply give the privilege of considering the bill in the Committee of the Whole, subject to debate and amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. One-fourth of the House could not under this rule defeat the consideration of the bill. It could only defeat its passage at once by one vote.

Mr. STEPHENS. Without debate?

Mr. GARFIELD. Without debate or consideration.

Mr. KENNA. If I understand the gentleman from Ohio, he maintains that one-fourth could not defeat the consideration, yet if two-thirds should decide the bill should be taken up for consideration, as the rules now are and as I understand them, all the other appropriation bills would have precedence over the river and harbor appropriation bill, that not being considered as one of them, and practically it would be excluded from consideration.

Mr. GARFIELD. That may be so.

Now, I wish to say in conclusion, on this part of the subject, that, in my judgment, the true rule for us to adopt—and if I had the making of it I would so frame it—would be that the Committee on Commerce should have the power to take up this bill and report it at any time for reference to the Committee on Appropriations, but for nothing else, and that it should take its place there among the other appropriation bills in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me ask one more question. Do I understand the purpose of this rule is to take from the Committee on Commerce this bill and put it in the already overcrowded Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not think the gentleman understands it; I am only stating what I would do if I had my way.

Let me state that the proposition to divide the Committee on Appropriations, to scatter its bills as suggested and as was once moved indeed, is in my judgment, although I think it is not pending, an utterly ridiculous proposition. I believe it would cost this Government $20,000,000 a year if the appropriations were scattered to the several committees. But I understand that is not under consideration.

I have only one word to say in conclusion, and that is on the amendment I have just had read. All our trouble of complaints against the Appropriations Committee, that it has been grasping power and getting control of all the business of the Congress, (and it is largely just and the committee is not in fault for it,) is because of the unfortunate extension which has been given to the meaning of the last clause of Rule 120, namely, that all germane propositions which can be construed in any way, even in a remote way, to retrench expenditures may be put upon appropriation bills. The extension which has been lately given to that rule I think has given this Appropriations Committee a mass of business and an amount of power that are unsafe for the fair and reasonable conduct of business. Now, I am aware the distinguished gentleman who offered this modification of the rule, the present Speaker, did it for a very good and laudable purpose, to enlarge the powers of the committee in the direction of economy and for the purpose of economy proper. I know, sir, there was a good reason in his mind; it was this: if it is in order to increase a salary, it should be in order to decrease a salary on an appropriation bill; if it is in order to increase expenditures, it ought to be equally in order to decrease them. That rule had been so construed that it was not in order to change a law cutting down expenses, when it was really construed that it was in order to change the law to increase them. That I did not concur in, and what I think the gentleman had in his mind was to correct that evil and to allow the rule to work both ways. But the rule has been construed out of its old channels altogether. It has overflowed its banks like a river in flood-tide, and now you can reconstruct the entire judiciary of this country and the Army and the Navy and the foreign service and every element of law as we see proposed in the bill now before the House; and ultimately, gentlemen, it will break down the Appropriations Committee, if this policy of overloading them with all sorts of legislation is not in some way restricted.

I do not believe this House will be likely to concur with me to change this rule back as I have proposed in the amendment, but I do think for its own sake and without regard to partisan consideration the rule might in some way or other be so modified that we shall not pile all the general legislation of the country on one committee, already heavily overworked. And for that reason I have offered it. If any one will make an amendment to it to effect the purpose I have in view, I would go so far as to agree it should not apply to the pending amendment, so no one should think I was doing it for partisan purposes. If you will agree it should not apply to this bill, I will still be willing, in the interests of good legislation and prudent management of public affairs, this rule should be changed as I have suggested.

With the exceptions I have named I am in favor of the report. As to the three-fourths rule, there is so much difference of opinion about it that perhaps we had better let it go not adopted. I see the Speaker desires to take the floor, and I now yield it.

The chair was taken by Mr. COX as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) It is well that the House should understand the effect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, if it should be adopted. With him I agree fully that this should not be a partisan question. I had supposed that the operation of that rule had ceased to be viewed in a partisan light. It was originally adopted when the two Houses disagreed politically. It was adopted so that the rule might be changed from the manner in which it had operated prior to the date of the enactment of the new rule from increasing appropriations on an appropriation bill to decreasing them. It was not, as described by the gentleman from Ohio, an extension, but it was a restriction. It is right that there should be a restriction of legislation on appropriation bills so as to confine amendments changing law in the direction of reducing the expenses of administration.

It is not wise, in my judgment, to change that rule now. Whenever we shall want to increase the amounts authorized by existing law to be appropriated through a change of legislation, it should be done by independent legislation. The object of legislating on appropriation bills, in my judgment, should be directed exclusively to the saving of money.

There have been partisan hardships caused by this rule; there has been legislation accomplished under it which some in this House have considered dangerous. But in the general exercise of the rule it has saved millions of dollars to the people of this country. I believe there is not a man upon this floor who has not gone before his constituents with an assurance that he would, as far as his judgment went and as far as lay in his power, reduce the expenditures of this Government. I tell such gentlemen as have made those assurances that if they strike out this feature of the rule they will obstruct in a great degree the power of the committee and of the House to reduce expenditures or to keep them within late limits. And I say, in a spirit of liberality, in a spirit of truth, that I do not believe that either side of this House desires that the expenditures of the Government shall be greater in the future than they are now fixed by existing law. I therefore hope that this question of striking out that feature of the rule will not be voted upon as a party question, but that gentlemen on that side of the House, and there are many of you, perhaps all of you who seek economy, will not now again open the door for extravagance and remit this House and this country back to the condition in which it was placed by its rules prior to the time when this change was made, when according to the interpretation of the Speaker, we could change existing law upon an appropriation bill in the direction of extravagance and not in direction of reductions.

I hope, therefore, that the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his amendment. In the Committee on Rules I was not in favor of submitting the issue; but after consultation, it was deemed by a majority of the committee wise to submit the question to the House. I hope and believe and beg that the majority of the House will not change the rule so that any gentleman when an appropriation bill is being considered can propose to insert amendments which will increase the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire only to say a word. I agree with every word the Speaker has said with regard to the necessity of holding ourselves to the strictest line of economy; but there is no need whatever of so adjusting this rule that it shall be against economy. We can protect the economy of the present rule as it now stands perfectly, and at the same time shut out general outside legislation. Certainly it is an abuse so to construe the rule that if you can show a saving of five cents out of a million dollars in any proposed legislation, that shall be construed in order when the main purpose of the legislation is not to save or lose five cents but to change a great political branch of the Government.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) But it must be germane to the paragraph under consideration.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; but the germaneness leads out perhaps into the whole judiciary system. Now, for instance, who for a moment believes that on the score of any of our ordinary economies it is germane or fitting, or a matter of economy, to put the whole great question of the election of a Congressman to this Hall upon the pending appropriation bill upon the score that it will save a few dollars of expense; that we shall substantially reorganize a great branch of the laws of this country, not on the ground that it ought to be done but on the ground that it will save a few dollars? I say that is a perversion of the meaning of this rule; and it has become so perverted that that perverted clause ought to be stricken off; and then we could put in any protection that any gentleman on either side might suggest against bad legislation and in the direction of economy.

Now, I agree with the Speaker that I think both sides of the House are against extravagance, and that a majority of this House will protect us against extravagance. But let us not in the name of economy open the door to a very serious danger in another direction.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) There is just one word I would like to add, and that is that under the operation of this rule, as amended, the dominant party in this House was enabled to reduce the appropriations $30,000,000. It is conceded, even by gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the expenditures of the Government were reduced $20,000,000. There was some little controversy about the precise amount, into which I do not desire to enter now, but I do say that the reduction even to the amount of $20,000,000 in the expenditures, the amount contended for by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Foster) in the last House, could never have been reached at all, except under the operation of the amended rule.

Therefore it is that you should not change the rule at all; but if there is anything in its execution which is a hardship we should seek to modify it in that particular respect.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me a single word in conclusion. It is not the rule that gives the reduction. It is a vote of the majority in the House, and that has been done years before. In spite of this rule, the last Congress increased the expenditures fully as much as the next to the last Congress reduced them.

Mr. ATKINS. That was on account of pensions.

Mr. GARFIELD. The question of reduction, therefore, does not come from the rule.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I beg the gentleman's pardon. We could not change the law prior to that except in the direction of increasing salaries. We changed it right about face, and made the rule apply so that you might legislate on an appropriation bill when the amendment was germane to the subject under consideration, if it went in the direction of reduction and economy.

Mr. REED. Nevertheless it remains true that upon the appropriation bills in the last Congress all sorts of legislation were ingrafted by means of this rule.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Not more than under your dispensation.

Mr. REED. That seems to me clearly to be true, because the transfer of the Indian Bureau was ingrafted upon an appropriation bill; the question of the reorganization of the Army was ingrafted upon an appropriation bill; the question of a reorganization of the rules and regulations of elections was ingrafted upon an appropriation bill; the repeal of the test oath, and the law in regard to the use of armed troops and in respect to civil officers to preserve the peace at the polls were put upon appropriation bills, solely on the ground that it would retrench expenditures.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Where they show it on their face.

Mr. REED. It is precisely this thing to which we object. To economy, the object which the Speaker has in his mind, nobody objects on this side. What we do object to is this: that this rule, if it accomplishes what he says it does, and I am not competent to give an opinion on that point, for my experience is so limited, goes further and in a different direction, and accomplishes certain things which, as an accomplished parliamentarian, he himself must see ought not to be accomplished, namely, the adding of all sorts of legislation to appropriation bills, making them a sort of omnium gatherum, instead of bills to provide for the payment of the expenses of the Government according to law.

The result of this matter is this: that the country gets a great deal of crude legislation and the Committee on Appropriations gets badly overworked. This House has got impatient at the absorption of the whole business of the House by one committee, so that a large minority of the House are disposed to break the work of that committee and put a portion of it in the hands of the several committees, the effect of which will be to add to the expenses of the Government more than this rule ever saved. I think it would be better to modify the rule so as to accomplish the wise purpose the Speaker has in his mind.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The language of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] would seem to imply that this rule governs the Committee on Appropriations only. This rule governs the House, and it ought not to be made a means of reflection against any committee more than against any member of the House. Any member of the House can do exactly what the Committee on Appropriations have the power to do, and that is to offer to amend by ingrafting legislation on an appropriation bill if it be in the direction of economy. The Committee on Appropriations has this power to insert new legislation in manner as stated, but the rule is not a privilege given to the Committee on Appropriations only. It is a privilege given to any member of the House as well, if he sees fit to offer an amendment which is germane to the pending paragraph and which reduces the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. REED. The effect of the amendment is what I have stated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. COX in the chair.) The hour of half past two has arrived and debate is closed by order of the House.

Mr. FRYE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] a question.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I am ready to answer any question.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let the question be asked and answered by unanimous consent.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania please explain how the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] opens up any opportunity for legislation of an extravagant kind?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Because it takes off the restriction which says that new legislation shall be in the direction of economy.

Mr. FRYE. But does it not say distinctly that no legislation shall be in order on an appropriation bill?

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I will meet that issue directly. I am in favor of any amendment to an appropriation bill, germane to the paragraph of the bill to which it is offered, that will reduce public expenditures.

Mr. FRYE. But if I construe the proposed amendment correctly, and I believe I do, there would be no door open under it to introduce legislation which would be extravagant.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The door would certainly be open to prevent economy by legislation in that direction.

Mr. FRYE. But not open for extravagant propositions.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) Let the proposition be again read.

Mr. CALKINS. I have not yet understood the position of the Speaker of this House. I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. BRAGG. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRAGG. I make the point of order that debate upon this subject has been closed by order of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I propose an amendment to come in at the end of the proposition in regard to the Committee of Elections.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk of the House shall cause the records and other papers relating to contested-election cases to be printed prior to the assembling of the first regular session of Congress, under such rules and regulations as the Committee of Elections may prescribe.

Mr. STEPHENS. Allow me one moment. These amendments are now offered and read, to come up and be voted on when the portion of the report to which they are germane shall be reached.

Mr. SPRINGER. So I understand. I have also another amendment to offer, proposing an additional rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

All private bills and joint resolutions hereafter introduced, which have been printed by order of either House of a preceding Congress, shall not be again printed at the expense of the Government until after a reference to a committee and report thereon with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the propriety of that will be evident to every gentleman. It will save many thousands of dollars annually.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

There shall be no standing Committee of Elections, but all cases of contested elections shall be referred to select committees, who shall report to the House within thirty days.

That the Committees of Ways and Means, Banking and Currency, Coinage, Weights, and Measures, shall have leave to report at any time; and on motion of any member a majority of the House may fix a day for the consideration of any public bill reported by either of said committees; and the House may continue the consideration of said bill from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. FORT. I wish to submit an amendment, and to have a vote upon it at the proper time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule 51 by adding the following:

And the morning hour shall not be dispensed with upon any day for any purpose except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I offer an amendment to come in as an addition to the portion of the report in regard to select committees.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "respectively" insert the following:

To have the same number of members, duties, scope, privileges, and powers as those on similar subjects of the last Congress.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to amend the rule in relation to the call of States for bills and joint resolutions during the morning hour of Monday, so as to make it read:

That when States are called for the introduction of bills they shall be called in their alphabetical order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to move the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule 101 by striking out all after the figures "1822," and inserting the following:

And the Committees on Printing, Commerce, and Banking and Currency at any time.

Mr. SHELLEY. I move to lay the report of the Committee on Rules, with all pending amendments, on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS. I now call the previous question on the report and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first proposition of the report of the Committee on Rules will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules submit the following report upon the subjects therein embraced, and ask its adoption by the House:

The committee recommend the raising of the following select committees to be appointed by the Speaker, and to consist of the same number as in the Forty-fifth Congress, respectively:

1. Committee on the Census;
2. Committee on Reform in the Civil Service;
3. Committee on the state of the Law respecting Ascertainment and Declaration of Result of Election of President and Vice-President;
4. Committee on the Origin, Introduction, and Prevention of Epidemic Diseases in the United States;
5. Committee on Ventilation of the Hall; and
6. Committee on the present Depression of Labor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] will now be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "respectively" insert the following:

To have the same number of members, duties, scope, privileges, and powers as those on similar subjects of the last Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does that mean that these select committees shall have stenographers and clerks, and be clothed with power to go out on trips of investigation, at great expense, the same as before? If it means that, it ought not to be adopted.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. That is not what I mean.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is what the amendment will accomplish.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. That could not be done without an appropriation.

Mr. CONGER. Before a vote is taken I ask that the powers of each of these committees be either read to the House or stated to the House. We have a right to know that.

Mr. FORT. That will take all day.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. My object in offering the amendment——

Mr. CONGER. Let us know what the powers of those former committees were.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is in the nature of debate.

Mr. CONGER. It is not in the nature of debate. There are at least two hundred and fifty members here who do not understand what those powers were.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. One of those committees referred to had certain powers by the resolution originally creating it——

Mr. FORT. And those powers are very extensive.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If there is objection I will withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn.

The first proposition of the report of the committee was then agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the next proposition of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee also report in favor of increasing the number of the Committee on Enrolled Bills to seven members; the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, to eleven members; the Committee of Ways and Means, to thirteen members; the Committees on Agriculture, Judiciary, Elections, Commerce, and Appropriations, to fifteen members each.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has offered an amendment to come in after the word "elections." The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk of the House shall cause the records and other papers relating to contested-election cases to be printed prior to the assembling of the first regular session of Congress, under such rules and regulations as the Committee of Elections may prescribe.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that this is not germane to the proposition of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is germane to that part in reference to increasing the number of the Committee of Elections. The object is to enable the committee to obtain possession of the papers relating to contested elections earlier than they have been able to do heretofore.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think it would be better that the "rules and regulations" should be prescribed by the House, not by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. CONGER. I have raised a point of order on the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The main question has been ordered. It is too late to raise a question of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. If there is objection to this proposition I withdraw it, with the understanding that it shall go to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the proposed amendment will be withdrawn and will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The pending proposition as reported from the Committee on Rules was then agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the next proposition reported from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee also recommend the adoption of the following additional rule:

Rule —. On a motion to suspend the rules and pass a general appropriation bill an affirmative vote of three-fourths of the members present and voting thereon shall be necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following:

"On a motion to suspend the rules and pass a general appropriation bill an affirmative vote of three-fourths of the members present and voting thereon shall be necessary."

And insert the following:

"Hereafter the Committee on Commerce shall have the same privilege to report bills making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors that is accorded to the Committee on Appropriations in reporting general appropriation bills."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 100, noes 88.

Mr. BROWNE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think we can settle the question by tellers.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The House had better understand what is the right of the Committee on Appropriations in regard to reporting bills at any time. It is only the right to report for commitment.

Mr. BROWNE. The effect of this proposition is simply to add the right to report at any time to the right that the Committee on Commerce already has to have a river and harbor bill passed under a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ATKINS. Does this amendment provide that the Committee on Commerce shall have the privilege of reporting "a bill" or "bills?"

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I submit that this privilege should apply only to the bill known as "the river and harbor appropriation bill."

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent that the word "bills" be struck out and the word "bill" inserted.

Mr. REAGAN. Every one must understand that it applies only to the one regular river and harbor bill during each session of Congress.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 146, nays 97, not voting 43; as follows:

Mr. DEERING. Mr. JOYCE is detained at his room by serious illness.

Mr. O'NEILL. My colleague, Mr. WARD, is absent and paired. If he were present, he would vote in the affirmative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question recurred on the amendment as amended, and it was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question next recurred on Mr. GARFIELD'S amendment, as follows:

Amend the last clause of Rule 120 to read as follows:

"Nor shall any provision in any such bill, or amendment thereto, changing existing law be in order."

Mr. WHITE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 110, nays 128, not voting 48; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. My colleague, Mr. LAY, is paired with Mr. DICK.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I am paired with Mr. CHITTENDEN. If he were present, I would vote in the negative.

Mr. GOODE. I am paired with Mr. WILLITS, of Michigan. If he were present, I would vote in the negative.

Mr. MULLER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. CAMP. If he were here, I would vote in the negative.

Mr. BLISS. My colleague, Mr. O'BRIEN, is paired with my other colleague, Mr. EINSTEIN. If present, Mr. O'BRIEN would vote in the negative and Mr. EINSTEIN in the affirmative.

Mr. AIKEN. I am paired with Mr. WARD, of Pennsylvania. My colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, who is absent by leave of the House, is paired with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. CRAPO. My colleague, Mr. RICE, is paired with Mr. GIBSON, of Louisiana. If Mr. RICE were present, he would vote in the affirmative and Mr. GIBSON in the negative.

Mr. STONE. I am paired with Mr. SHELLEY.

Mr. DWIGHT. I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. MASON, is paired with Mr. BACHMAN. If Mr. MASON were here, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. BACHMAN. I am paired with Mr. MASON, of New York. If he were present, I would vote in the negative.

Mr. McGOWAN. I am paired with Mr. ROTHWELL.

Mr. CONGER. My colleague, Mr. HUBBELL, who is detained from the House by sickness in his family, is paired with Mr. ACKLEN. If present, he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I am requested to announce the pair of Mr. TUCKER with Mr. HARRIS of Massachusetts. If present, Mr. TUCKER would vote "no" and Mr. HARRIS "ay."

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I am paired with Mr. BLAND. If present, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Mr. BUTTERWORTH, who is absent and paired, would, if present, vote "ay."

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment; that offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

The Clerk read as follows:

All private bills and joint resolutions hereafter introduced which have been printed by order of either House of the preceding Congress, shall not be again printed at the expense of the Government until after a reference to a committee and report thereon with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that is right; let us vote for it.

Mr. FINLEY. That refers only to private bills, as I understand?

Mr. SPRINGER. It includes all private bills and resolutions hereafter introduced.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

The question being put on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 148, noes not counted.

So the amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment; that offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be no standing Committee of Elections, and all cases of contested elections shall be referred to select committees who shall report to the House within thirty days.

Mr. CHALMERS. I wish to know if a division of the question cannot be had?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In what respect does the gentleman ask for a division?

Mr. CHALMERS. I wish to vote for a standing Committee of Elections, but would at the same time desire that contests might be referred to select committees when necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not see how the amendment can be divided so as to meet the gentleman's object.

Mr. CHALMERS. I only wanted to know if it could be divided. I asked the question for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A question to be divided must contain two substantive propositions. This is a unit.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I think the amendment is capable of division. It provides for sending all cases of contested elections to select committees, and it also provides at what time they shall report. Can the question not be divided? I should be glad to vote for the amendment, but I think the time allowed for reporting is too short.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is out of order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I should like to have my question answered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman calls for a division he must suggest the division himself.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I suggest that we vote first upon the proposition to create special committees, and second upon the proposition to require them to report within thirty days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the rule on that subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any member may call for a division of the question before or after the main question is ordered, which shall be divided if it comprehend propositions in substance so distinct that one being taken away a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House.

Mr. BUCKNER. I submit it is too late to call for a division of the question. The House was dividing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think the demand for a division is made too late. The matter of reporting within thirty days can be separated from the rest of the proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. It would be impossible under that rule to print the record in a single case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The Clerk will read the first portion of the proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be no standing Committee of Elections, but all cases of contested elections shall be referred to select committees.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to amend the proposition. The committees should consist of seven members. Can we not amend this by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] is recognized.

Mr. STEPHENS. This proposition is directly inconsistent with the previous action of the House to-day, which has been reconsidered and the motion to reconsider laid on the table; namely, that the standing Committee of Elections shall consist of fifteen members. We have said that there shall be a standing Committee of Elections, and this proposition is inconsistent with that action.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a matter for the House to decide. The question is on agreeing to the first branch of the amendment which has just been read.

The question being put, the first branch of the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is next on the last portion of the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Who shall report to the House within thirty days.

Mr. SPRINGER. If we adopt that, what will it relate to? When you have cut the head off you can let the tail go with the hide.

The question being put, the second portion of the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next amendment is that also offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.] The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committees on Ways and Means, Banking and Currency, and Coinage, Weights, and Measures, shall have leave to report at any time, and on motion of any member a majority of the House may fix a day for the consideration of any public bill reported by either of said committees, and the House may continue the consideration of such bill from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Upon that amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 41; not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. EWING. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHITE and Mr. EWING were appointed.

Mr. WARNER. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 50—more than one-fifth of the last vote.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 120, nays 110, not voting 47; as follows:

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. CHITTENDEN. If he were here, I should vote "ay."

Mr. HUNTON. My colleague, Mr. GOODE, is paired with Mr. WILLITS. If he were here, he would vote "ay."

Mr. DWIGHT. My colleague, Mr. MASON, is absent on account of illness.

Mr. STONE. I am paired with Mr. SHELLEY.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I am paired with Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts.

Mr. BLISS. My colleagues, Mr. O'BRIEN and Mr. EINSTEIN, are paired.

Mr. AIKEN. I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WARD.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the rules was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment was the one offered by Mr. FORT; which was read, as follows:

Amend Rule 51 by inserting after the last word the following:
And the morning hour shall not be dispensed with upon any day for any purpose except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 123, noes 39.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS. I desire now to submit a resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are two other amendments pending and undisposed of.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will wait until those amendments have been disposed of.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read the amendment offered by Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, which was as follows:

That when States are called for the introduction of bills they shall be called in their alphabetical order.

Mr. GARFIELD. They are now called according to the dates of their admission into the Union.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. No, they are not; Maine is now called first; and it was not admitted into the Union until 1820.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 82, noes 143.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The next and last amendment, the one offered by Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, was then read, as follows:

Amend Rule 101 by striking out all after the figures "1822," and inserting the following:
And the Committees on Printing, Commerce, and Banking and Currency at any time.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. The object of my amendment having been accomplished by the adoption of a previous amendment, I ask leave to withdraw it.

There being no objection, the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. STEPHENS. I now submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be authorized to incorporate the several propositions agreed to at the proper places in the existing rules.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to submit the report which I send to the Clerk's desk. It is the unanimous report of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution of the House in reference to a modification of Rules 59 and 113, or of the practice which has arisen under them, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to present the following report:

The rules under consideration are as follows:

"59. When two or more members happen to rise at once, the Speaker shall name the member who is first to speak.—April 7, 1789.

"113. The rules of proceedings in the House shall be observed in a Committee of the Whole House, so far as they may be applicable, except the rule limiting the times of speaking—April 7, 1789; but no member shall speak twice to any question until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.—December 18, 1805."

With the exception of the last clause of Rule 113, which was adopted in 1805, these rules have remained unchanged for ninety years. In the nature of the case discretion must be lodged with the presiding officer, and no fixed and arbitrary order of recognition can be wisely provided for in advance; and the committee are of opinion that these rules should not be changed.

The practice of making a list of those who desire to speak on measures before the House or Committee of the Whole is a proper one to enable the presiding officer to know and remember the wishes of members. As to the order of recognition, he should not be bound to follow the list, but should be free to exercise a wise and just discretion in the interest of full and fair debate.

The committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. If there is no discussion desired, I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. ATKINS. For what purpose?

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the question is upon the motion to adjourn; but pending that motion the Chair will submit some requests to the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, for four days, on account of illness in his family;

To Mr. HORR, for ten days; and

To Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, until Tuesday next.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BELFORD: Papers relating to the claim of G. F. Jocknick—to the Committee of Claims, when appointed.

By Mr. BLAND: Papers relating to the claims of Adolph Bower and of Coggswell & Co., of Saint Louis, Missouri—to the same committee, when appointed.

By Mr. COLERICK: The petition of 19 ladies, of Zanesville, Indiana, for such legislation as will make effective the anti-polygamy law of 1862—to the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed.

By Mr. CRAPO: The petition of Alexander Sutorius, for reinstatement as captain of cavalry, United States Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs, when appointed.

By Mr. KLOTZ: The petition of Aaron Snyder, for a pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, when appointed.

By Mr. SHERWIN: The petition of William Edmonds, for a pension—to the same committee, when appointed.

Also, the petition of citizens of DeKalb County, Illinois, for such legislation as will make effective the anti-polygamy law of 1862—to the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed.

By Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee: Papers relating to the claims of Meshack Franklin, administrator of John K. Wilburn, deceased, and of Enoch Taylor—to the Committee of Claims, when appointed.

Also, papers relating to the war claim of Martha A. Bonner—to the Committee on War Claims, when appointed.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 10, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FARLEY presented a resolution of the common council of Crescent City, California, in favor of an appropriation for the construction of a sea-wall in the harbor of said city, extending from the Light-House Island to Steamboat Rock and to Battery Point, being an appropriation for the Crescent City Harbor, California; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ROLLINS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 387) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 388) for the relief of Jacob B. King; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 389) for the relief of Peter Phillips; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 390) to authorize the President to restore Dunbar R. Ransom to his former rank in the Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BECK (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 391) to regulate the holding of the circuit and district courts of the United States in the State of Kentucky, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 392) to remove the political disabilities of John R. F. Tatnall, of Georgia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 393) granting a pension to John G. Eckles; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 19) to provide for the publication and distribution of a supplement to the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company (Senate bill No. 18, first session Forty-fifth Congress) be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, it was Ordered, That Chambers C. Mullin be allowed to withdraw his memorial and papers from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of Edward Shields and others be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, it was Ordered, That the papers in the claim of the "Old Settler" or "Western Cherokees" be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the papers in the claim of James Vance and William Vance be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SAUNDERS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the claim of Frank Spevacek, Maria Sochar, and others, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SENATOR FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported by Mr. SAULSBURY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the 2d instant:

Resolved, That Hon. Charles H. Bell is not entitled to a seat as a Senator by virtue of the appointment by the executive of New Hampshire.

The pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HOAR, to strike out the word "not" before the word "entitled."

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, when I obtained the floor last evening, after inviting gentlemen who desired to speak to do so before I proceeded, I had a right to infer that there was no one else who desired at that time to speak. I have understood, however, that my remarks on that occasion have been construed into an assumption on my part that I had a right to close the debate on this question. Now, sir, I know of no constitutional provision, no public statute, and no rule of the Senate which confers upon me or upon any other member of the Senate the right to close a debate, but I believe it has been a courtesy that has been conceded to the member of a committee who reports a measure before the Senate that, if he should so desire, he might defer his remarks with a view to close the debate on the question. Personally, I would have preferred to have spoken at an earlier period of the discussion, but in deference to the wishes of gentlemen who concur with me in opinion upon this subject I deferred my remarks until the debate, as I supposed, had about terminated. However, I claim no right, I invoke no courtesy, and I hope that no gentleman who desires to express himself upon this question will hesitate to do so on account of my having at this period chosen to debate the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I entirely agree that the ordinary practice is for the chairman of the committee reporting a measure to have the last word, unless he should say something new that would require a reply; but in this present case the pending and the real question is on the proposition asserted by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] that is, to prove to the Senate that the proposition of the committee ought to be turned into an entirely different one; and I should imagine, according to the practice, if the Senator from Massachusetts were here, that he practically would be listened to in answer to all the objections which had been made to his proposition. It is of no practical consequence now because he is not here.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I referred to this matter because I understood that some criticism about the remarks which I made was indulged in by some of my brother Senators, as though it were an assumption of right on my part to close the debate. I certainly did not so intend to be understood, and I hope no gentleman will be embarrassed because I now address the Senate in expressing himself hereafter as he may desire upon this question.

Mr. President, the arguments which have been submitted by gentlemen who concur with the committee render it unnecessary that I should say but very little on the subject. Indeed I do not believe that it is necessary that I should address the Senate at all. Every view that I shall be able to present has already been presented. Nevertheless, as a member of the committee which reported the resolution it may not be improper, in fact it may be proper, that I should make some remarks in support of the resolution which I have had the honor under instructions of the committee to submit to the consideration of the Senate.

I desire at the very outset to say that personally I should have been gratified if I had been enabled to arrive at a conclusion that would justify me to vote for the admission of Mr. Bell as a member of this body. It is always a disagreeable thing to deny to any one who claims a seat in this body the right which he claims; and in this case the high opinion which I have formed of the claimant, his character for intelligence and respectability, and his standing in his own State would have induced me, if I could have done so consistently with my views of what was right under the terms of the Constitution, to have joined in a report for his admission into this body.

I desire to say one other thing, that there is no political importance whatever which can attach to the decision of this question, whether it be favorable to the admission of Mr. Bell or in favor of his rejection. The relative strength of parties in the Senate renders his admission or rejection a matter of very small consequence politically. In times of high party excitement, and sometimes when parties are nearly evenly balanced in this Chamber, we are liable to be led away by our partisan feelings and to express opinions and give votes colored and shaded, unwittingly doubtless, by our party bias. But no such condition of affairs exists in this particular instance, and I am glad it is so. There is another difficulty, another danger to which perhaps I might allude with some degree of propriety. When there is no political necessity pressing upon us, that kindly feeling of humanity which prompts one to do good to another may lead us from feelings of generosity or a desire to be magnanimous to a political opponent to give a latitude of construction to the constitutional provision bearing upon this subject which is not in harmony with its letter or its spirit. Against that danger it is as necessary to guard as to guard against the influences of party prejudice and party bias.

For the purpose of placing this question fairly and properly before the Senate it may not be amiss to refer to the circumstances which have given rise to the temporary appointment by the governor of New Hampshire of Mr. Bell as a Senator. From the admission of the State of New Hampshire into the Federal Union her constitution provided for annual elections and annual sessions of her Legislature, and such continued to be the case up to 1878. In December, 1877, a constitutional convention of that State proposed an amendment to the constitution changing elections from annual to biennial, and the sessions of the Legislature likewise. That proposed amendment was submitted to the popular vote at the annual election held in March, 1878, and by a majority of votes of the people of that State the amendment was ratified.

Under the provisions of this amended constitution the first election was to take place in November following—that is, November of last year—but by another provision of her constitution, which was not changed, the members elected took their seats in June following their election and held for one year. Therefore the Legislature elected in March, 1878, holds under the terms of the constitution until seven days, which I believe is the language, prior to the first Wednesday in June following, that is June, 1879, and the term of service of the persons elected as members of the Legislature in November, 1878, does not commence until the expiration of the term of service of those who were elected in March. The Legislature elected in March, 1878, met in June and held their regular session, but did not elect a successor to Senator Wadleigh, whose term of service was to expire on the 4th of March of the present year, and the Legislature elected in November does not meet until June. Under this condition of affairs the governor of the State doubtless thought that he was authorized to make an appointment, and he appointed Mr. Bell temporarily as the successor to succeed Senator Wadleigh.

The question, therefore, presented is, has Mr. Bell under this appointment a right to a seat in this body? In other words, was it competent for the governor of New Hampshire, under the circumstances stated, to make a temporary appointment of a Senator? That is the question. In order to arrive at a proper conclusion on this subject we must undertake to determine what is meant by the provision of the Constitution of the United States under which the supposed authority to appoint arises. That provision of the Constitution I shall read. It is found in the third section of the first article. The particular expression under which the authority is supposed to be found is in these words:

> And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

The primary rule of construction of constitutional provisions or of statutory provisions, in fact, of any instrument, is to look first at the particular words to be construed to ascertain their true meaning and import; but it is very obvious if we sever these words from the context that it is utterly impossible to give any construction to the language I have read. We are driven, therefore, in order to ascertain its true meaning, to look beyond the mere expressions themselves, and to consider them in connection with the preceding portion of the section with which they stand connected. When we look at the whole section we find that these terms apply to filling vacancies in the Senate of the United States. We are therefore, I say, compelled to look at the whole section in order to understand what is the true meaning and import of the terms under which this supposed authority is found authorizing the governor of New Hampshire to make this appointment. The first clause of that article provides as follows:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

It may not be amiss, in order to aid us to determine precisely and definitely what is intended by the expression of the Constitution, to refer to the convention which framed the Constitution. A century has not passed away since that convention met. It is admissible to consult the records of that convention in order to ascertain what was definitely intended by these various provisions of the Constitution. We cannot enter into the convention; we cannot listen to their deliberations; but we may put ourselves as near as possible in their place to ascertain, if we can, at what the men who composed the convention were aiming. We know who they were. They were the representatives of independent States met in council for the purpose of forming a government for the benefit of all the States thus assembled. We cannot enter into that convention and listen to their discussions, but we can understand from their debates what they were deliberating about. They were providing for a Senate of the United States. As I before remarked, the States were equally independent, equally sovereign. The convention had conceded, in a previous provision of the Constitution, that there could not be equality in the House of Representatives, for the reason that it would infringe the fundamental principle for which they had long contended, that there should be no taxation without representation. They had provided, in the formation of the House of Representatives, that revenue bills, the money bills, should originate in the House of Representatives, and according to the principle that taxation and representation should be inseparable, they provided that the representation in that body should be according to the population of the respective States. But when they came to consider the Senate they determined to maintain the equality of the States; and the fundamental idea underlying the composition of the Senate of the United States was to maintain the equality of the States by conceding to each State equal representation in the Senate. The idea has been thrown out here that the paramount purpose of the convention was to have a Senate at all times full. That express declaration is made in the report of the views of the minority. They say:

> The purpose of the Constitution is to have the Senate always full.

The idea underlies every argument which I have heard made in support of the views of the minority, that the great controlling purpose of the Constitution is that this body should be always full. Such an idea is most erroneous. The convention which framed the Constitution took ample care to provide that less than a full Senate should be competent to do business. It is provided in the Constitution that a majority of the Senate shall be a quorum and competent to transact business. The idea of having the Senate always full did not enter into the mind of the members of the convention. They knew that it would be utterly impossible to have the Senate always full.

No, sir, there was a higher purpose which controlled the deliberations of that body in the formation of the Senate and that was to secure the equal right of representation on the part of all the States. It would never have been conceded by the feeblest and smallest State in this Union that in the Senate, which represented the States, there should be any inequality whatever between the largest and the smallest States. The great fundamental idea underlying the organism of the Senate was that it should be composed of an equal number of members from each State, so that there might be perfect equality among the States of this Union at least in one body of the National Legislature. That purpose is secured in this first clause of section 3.

Then, after that question had been decided, the question of how the Senators should be chosen came up for consideration. Mr. Pinckney, I believe, proposed that the house of delegates should elect the Senator. Others suggested the executive appointment of Senators; but the convention determined to lodge the power of choosing Senators in the Legislatures of the respective States. Why did they so determine? It was said in the convention that they would be less liable to be governed by improper influences, but I apprehend that there were graver and higher considerations. The Legislature represented more clearly and more nearly the great body of the people of every portion of the State. But that was not all. The legislative department of the State government represents more nearly the sovereignty of the State. I use the word "sovereignty" in connection with State governments. I hold that the States of this Union in everything which they have not conceded to the General Government are sovereign. The legislative department of the State government more nearly represents its sovereignty and therein may be found the reason why the Legislature should be invested with the power of choosing Senators. The Legislature makes the laws of the State, it provides the revenues of the State, it is clothed with the power of impeachment as a check upon other departments of the States, and therefore, I repeat, it more nearly represents the sovereignty of the State government than any other department.

Hence the Constitution provided that the choice of Senators who were to represent the State in their organized capacity should be made by the Legislature. Then the term of service was definitely fixed. Every provision in relation to this subject was carefully considered to even the minutest detail. Having fixed the composition of the Senate the convention next proceeded to the consideration of another subject in the same connection. It was very apparent that under the first clause of the Constitution all the Senate would have to be elected at one time, and hence at the expiration of the regular term of six years all the old members of the Senate would go out and new members come in. In order that there might be always in this body persons who had experience in the service of the Senate it was provided that the Senators should be divided into three classes, that the term of one class should expire at the end of two years, of the second class at the end of four years, and of the third class at the end of six years. What was the reason of that? "So that," says the Constitution, "one-third may be chosen every second year."

Mark the word "chosen"—the identical expression which is used in the first paragraph applying to the choice of Senators. Will any one suppose that when the convention in that clause of this section used the word "chosen" they meant that at the expiration of two years, if the Legislature had not acted, the governor should appoint? Why had they carefully used the same word that applied to the Legislature choosing Senators? It never entered into the mind of the men who framed the Constitution, I may venture to assert, and the suggestion never was made, that when a class fell out the governor could appoint successors.

When this provision of the Constitution so far had been agreed upon, another idea was suggested, and that was the idea that a vacancy might happen. So far they had a perfect Senate, they had an equal number of Senators from each State chosen for the same term, and the Senate was perfectly organized, but a contingency might arise whereby there would be a vacancy in the body; and then the discussion took place upon the question of how vacancies should be filled, and from that discussion in the convention it is very apparent what they meant by the word vacancies. It was suggested by one that the governors should fill the vacancies, but Mr. Wilson, I believe it was, objected to that, and after discussion Mr. Madison offered an amendment which was adopted, an amendment which was referred to and read by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] in opening the discussion in this case. I will read it again:

Mr. Madison, in order to prevent doubts whether resignations could be made by Senators, or whether they could refuse to accept, moved to strike out the words after "vacancies" and insert the words "happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise, may be supplied by the Legislature of the State in the representation of which such vacancies shall happen, or by the executive thereof until the next meeting of the Legislature."

It is clear that it was in the mind of Mr. Madison at the time and in the contemplation of the convention, first, that there was doubt as to whether a person chosen a Senator could resign. There may be no doubt now on that subject in our minds; but it is very certain from the reason and purpose of that proposed amendment given by Mr. Madison that doubt on that question at least existed in the convention, and also whether a person elected a Senator could refuse to accept. Mark the language, "or whether they could refuse to accept;" and for the purpose of putting this matter at rest and assuring the right to a Senator to resign or not accept this provision of the Constitution was proposed by Mr. Madison. Observe the language in which he proposed the amendment:

Happening by refusals to accept, resignations, or otherwise.

That is the language of the amendment proposed by Mr. Madison. It was adopted by the convention and went to the committee of revision, or to the committee of style as it was termed, when the language was changed into the form in which it appears now in the third section of article 1 of the Constitution.

Now, Mr. President, a critical examination of the language I have read, conferring the power to make temporary appointments on the governor, will show what they meant, apart from the history of the provision. I maintain that the history of the provision itself instructs us as to the purpose and intendment of the convention which framed the Constitution; but if it was without a history, if the annals of that convention were completely blotted out, if all memory and tradition were gone in reference to the convention itself save the instrument they have left us as a heritage, I maintain that a critical examination of the words in which they have embodied their ideas in the third section of the first article excludes and precludes the idea that a governor could fill a term at its commencement. What is the language?

If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise.

What is meant by "happen?" Does it not signify in this connection an unforeseen event, a casualty, an accident, that may take some one out of his seat after he has been placed there by the choice of the Legislature of his State? Can any one doubt that that is the true meaning, the true interpretation of that provision? I think not. To state what has been so often expressed, the word "happen" implies contingency, uncertainty, accident. The whole structure of the sentence shows conclusively that such was the understanding and meaning intended by this clause. Those who differ with me will please answer the question if that is not true. If under this provision an appointment may be made by an executive to fill a term at its commencement; if the words "happen by resignation or otherwise" include every emptiness of a seat either by constitutional limitation or otherwise, then pray tell me the office of the words "by resignation or otherwise" in this sentence? Would it not convey that idea better without the words "by resignation or otherwise" in the clause? Read it as it is:

And if vacancies happen by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature, &c.

I repeat, if that provision gives to the governor the power to make a temporary appointment to the office upon the expiration of the term of an incumbent, would not the same power be given if the words "by resignation or otherwise" were stricken from the Constitution, so that it would read, "and if vacancies happen during the recess of the Legislature of any State," &c.?

Then tell me the office of the words "by resignation or otherwise" if the construction now attempted to be given is true. Sir, it is merely tautology of ideas, it is surplusage of language, it is unmeaning and frivolous to interpolate those words unless they were intended to import something into the Constitution not there before; and the men of that day were as careful and guarded in the expression of their language as the men of the present day. If any Senator on this floor was going to frame a provision giving to the governor the power to appoint temporarily to fill all vacancies, would he incorporate into it the words "by resignation or otherwise?" No, sir. The authority given to the Legislature to fill vacancies after a temporary appointment by the executive must apply to vacancies in a term previously filled by the Legislature. There could have been no necessity for the insertion of such a provision in the second paragraph of the section if it did not relate to filling vacancies happening in a term previously filled.

If that was intended to apply to full terms, and not to vacancies happening in a term exclusively, why was that language used? Did not the power to fill a full term reside in the Legislature by the provision of the first clause, and why should it be repeated in this second paragraph if it was intended to apply to the identical vacancy that the appointment by the Legislature applied to in the first clause?

I hold, then, Mr. President, in common with those who have preceded me in favor of the report of the committee, that there is no power in the governor to make an appointment of a Senator at the commencement of a term, or until the term has been filled by the choice of the Legislature, and I maintain that from the history of the provision itself, from its clear import and intendment, no other construction can be properly given to this clause under consideration.

Having thus expressed briefly my own views in reference to the proper construction of these clauses, I shall proceed to show that the construction for which I contend has been sustained by the action of this body for a long time, as well as by the opinions of many distinguished and able men who preceded us in this Senate.

My attention has been called to a definition of the word "happen." I have here, handed me by the Senator from Kentucky, an acknowledged authority, Webster. I have not before looked into the dictionary for the definition of terms; but the definition of this word is so appropriate, so in harmony with the views which I have expressed, that I beg leave to call attention to it:

Happen: to come by chance; to come without previous expectation; to fall out.

So that that great authority in reference to the definition and meaning of the word "happen," is in consonance with the views which have been expressed not only by myself but by gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate in support of the resolution reported by the committee.

Before I proceed to examine the precedents, I also wish to direct attention to another word upon which there has been some stress laid in this debate, and that is the word "otherwise." It is admitted that if the words "or otherwise" were stricken from this clause then the provision would be confined to vacancies occasioned by resignation; but it is contended that the words "or otherwise" are unlimited in their meaning and therefore cover every possible vacancy that may occur in the Senate including those which occur by the expiration of a constitutional term.

The meaning of the word "otherwise" in this connection has been fully explained by the lucid arguments of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] and the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] I need not supplement their views upon that point at all, and yet I wish to call attention to the construction that has been given to that word in connection with the word "vacancies" by the supreme court of Arkansas, a State that furnishes some of the ablest lawyers in this country, among whom I am glad to say is the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] who sustains the views of the committee in this case. That court had before it a case in which the very expression occurs. In December, 1848, that State passed a law to distribute the proceeds of the five hundred thousand acres of land donated to the State by act of Congress for internal improvement, and by the third and fourth sections of the act it was provided:

That on the first Monday of May, 1849, and every two years thereafter, the qualified voters of each county shall elect five commissioners, who shall constitute a board of internal improvement of the county; said election shall be held at the places, in the manner, and on the notice now prescribed by law for general elections; * * * that when any vacancy shall occur in the office of commissioner by death, resignation, or otherwise, it shall be the duty of the presiding judge of the county court to order an election to fill such vacancy, giving at least twenty days' notice, &c.

That provided for an election in May, and authorized the judge of the county court in case of a vacancy to call an election, and the judge of one of the counties, no election having taken place at the time mentioned in the statute, proceeded, under the power given to him in that clause, to call an election which elected commissioners and who appointed a treasurer. The auditor of the State refused to turn over the funds to the treasurer thus appointed, on the ground that the commissioners who appointed him treasurer had not been legally elected, and he brought his mandamus. The court in that case had the whole subject before them; and I read the decision now for the purpose of showing the construction which they gave to the phrase "by death, resignation, or otherwise."

We consider it perfectly clear that the vacancies contemplated necessarily presupposed that the offices had been once filled, and that the provision for filling those vacancies was solely designed to embrace the unexpired portion of the term that might remain after the happening of such vacancy.

I concur with the views of the Senator from Arkansas that it is very difficult to interpret a provision of the Constitution by the interpretations that have been given to the same words in statutes, but here is the identical language occurring in a statute, with the addition of the word "death," that is in the clause of the Constitution; and the supreme court of Arkansas say that it only applies to that portion of the time remaining unexpired after the office has been filled.

I now proceed to notice very briefly the authorities and decisions in this body that sustain the views which I have presented. The cases that have been cited prior to 1825, with the exception of the case of Mr. Tracy, were uncontested cases, unobjected to; the question was never raised. The fact is, that at that period of time the difficulty of getting to the capital of the country was so great that there was some anxiety about having a quorum here to do business. I understand that gentlemen declined the honor of a seat in this body on account of such difficulty, at least I have heard of one gentleman who did so, and hence the Senate was more liberal; and no objection being made such appointees came in and were seated. There was some contention about the right of Mr. Tracy, but, as has been said, it occurred in times of high party excitement, and it was decided by a strictly party vote, and that precedent was followed without question up to 1825, when the case of Mr. Lanman came up for consideration. The attention of the Senate had been called to this question by previous discussion in the body as to the power of the President under that clause of the Constitution which gives to the President the right to fill vacancies in civil offices occurring in the recess of the Senate. As was stated by the Senator from Georgia, the discussions in 1813 and 1814 on that subject, and especially the discussion in 1822, had directed the attention of the Senate to this provision of the Constitution applying to Senators. When the case of Mr. Lanman came up in 1825, it was thoroughly discussed, and in that case a decision was reached in harmony, as I believe, with the purpose of the Constitution, and from that day to this that conclusion and that decision has remained unimpeached and unquestioned.

But it was said by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON,] it was said by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS,] and I believe that idea was concurred in by my worthy colleague on this floor, [Mr. BAYARD,] that that decision was not upon the question whether a governor had the right to fill a vacancy at its commencement; but the question decided was whether he had a right to make an appointment in advance of the happening of the vacancy to take effect when the vacancy occurred.

Mr. BAYARD. It is not perhaps very important, but I was unable from the various reports, or rather from the imperfection of the various reports of the Lanman case, to know precisely upon what ground that decision did rest. I supposed the meagerness of the debate as reported prevented me from knowing what was the exact ground. I said that Judge Story had accepted the report that Mr. Bartlett had made, but where Mr. Bartlett got it I do not know. It is said he got it from the National Intelligencer; but Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, places the decision of the Senate in the Lanman case on the ground that a governor had no power to fill a vacancy which did not exist at the date of his appointment. I did not say that was the ground on which the case was decided; I only said that Judge Story had accepted that as the ground; and that from other statements it was doubtful what the Senate did proceed upon. My colleague will note the fact that in Lanman's case the governor did proceed to fill a vacancy caused by the expiration of a term one month before any vacancy existed, and that shows how void his act was. The fact existed that the governor of Connecticut, on the 9th of February, 1825, had time to fill a vacancy that did not occur until the 4th of March subsequent.

I beg my colleague's pardon for the interruption. I will say further that he must not suppose I undertake at this day to supply the grounds upon which the Senate proceeded to reject Mr. Lanman when I say those grounds are not sufficiently stated for me to know what they were. I merely say that Judge Story adopted the ground that it was because there was no vacancy at the time the governor assumed to act.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am very glad my colleague has made that statement. My understanding of his former position, doubtless incorrect, was that the true question decided there was whether the governor in advance of the expiration of the term had the right to make an appointment. I am glad now that my colleague does not rest upon that point; but that was distinctly stated to have been the point decided in the Lanman case by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] and the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON.] I propose to meet that declaration and to show that that was not the point in controversy in that case, and that the decision did not turn upon any such question, but that the broad question was presented in that case whether the governor could fill a vacancy which had occurred by the expiration of a constitutional term of an incumbent. That was the broad question presented, and it is a total misconception of what the point in issue was to suppose that the decision turned upon the question of the date of the appointment by the governor. No such question was raised at the time, and no misapprehension of the true question at issue in the minds of the Senators who passed upon the question, because it was distinctly stated at the time by Mr. Tazewell, as will be found in Benton's Thirty Years' View. It has already been read, but I shall be pardoned for a reference to it again. Mr. Benton says, after stating the case:

> Mr. Tazewell was the principal speaker against the validity of the appointment, arguing against it both on the words of the Constitution and the reason for the provision. The words of the Constitution are: "If vacancies happen (in the Senate) by resignation, or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments, until the next meeting of the Legislature." "Happen" was held by Mr. Tazewell to be the governing word in this provision, and it always implied a contingency, and an unexpected one.

So that the question was distinctly presented and passed upon which is presented in this case.

Mr. Benton, commenting on this decision, says:

> And with this decision the subsequent practice of the Senate has conformed, leaving States in part or in whole unrepresented when the Legislature failed to fill a regular vacancy.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. Benton says that thirty years after from memory.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Iowa says that Mr. Benton wrote from memory. He is too familiar with the character of Mr. Benton to suppose or to believe that he risked his reputation for accuracy upon mere memory after the lapse of thirty years. He knows too well the care and painstaking of that eminent Senator to believe that he ever expressed an opinion upon any matter of this kind for which he was not able to show a good reason if his opinion was called in question.

Then in the Lanman case the judgment of the Senate after argument overruled every other precedent that had taken place in the Senate, and laid down the broad doctrine that the governor of a State could make no temporary appointment to commence a term, nor could he make any temporary appointment until the Legislature had acted upon the term and placed an incumbent in the seat. They had, at the time they decided the Lanman case, full knowledge of all the cases that had been in the Senate preceding that time; for Mr. Eaton, in making the report in that case, called the attention of the Senate to the case of Tracy, to the case of Cocke, to all the cases that had preceded. So that the Senate at the time it passed upon and made its decision in the Lanman case had before it all the precedents that had occurred before that time.

But my honored friend from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] yesterday in his argument substantially stated that a contrary decision was made in the Sevier case, and attempted to parry the force and weight of the Lanman authority by citing the Sevier case, which he contended was in contradiction to the principle established in the Lanman case. I speak from memory about the Sevier case, and Senators will correct my memory if I am at fault. The case of Sevier was this: Arkansas had just been admitted into the Union. She elected two Senators, Mr. Sevier and Mr. Fulton. Under the provisions of the Constitution they had to draw for the classes in which they would be placed, and Mr. Sevier taking his seat in January, 1837, drew by lot a term which ended on the 4th of March following. The Legislature in September had elected and adjourned without knowing or being able to foresee to what class either Mr. Sevier or Mr. Fulton would be assigned. Therefore they were unable to make provision, according to the idea of Mr. Grundy in that case, for the term of Mr. Sevier, which expired in March; and it was upon that ground, that it was an unforeseen contingency, that the Senate acted in that case, governed to some extent by the consideration of the very recent admission of Arkansas into the Union. But the committee in that case expressly declared in the report made by Mr. Grundy that it did not intend to impeach or to dispute the correctness of the decision in the Lanman case, and therefore the authority of that report sustains and affirms the decision that was made in Lanman's case. And while I do not believe that Mr. Sevier should have been seated, I can understand very well the reasons which governed Mr. Grundy and the Senate in that case. It was that here was an unforeseen contingency which could not be provided for. But Senators do not contend that the expiration of the term of Senator Wadleigh was an unforeseen contingency by the State of New Hampshire. Certainly none of the reasoning which could possibly have governed the action in the Sevier case can be applied to the case of Mr. Bell.

There was no unforeseen event here; there was no vacancy which the Legislature of New Hampshire could not have provided against, no element of uncertainty, as my friend from New York [Mr. KERNAN] says, in connection with the whole case. The Legislature knew the time that Mr. Wadleigh was elected for; it was known by every intelligent inhabitant of the State of New Hampshire on the day Mr. Wadleigh was elected to the Senate six years ago that at the expiration of six years his term of service in the Senate would expire. Ample opportunity, therefore, was afforded. They had full knowledge that there would be such a vacancy, and yet they failed to provide for it.

But now I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a few moments to the opinions of Senators who have preceded us on this floor upon this very question. The opinion of Mr. Butler has been cited at large by the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN.] I need not repeat it in this connection. The opinion of Mr. Badger, one of the ablest lawyers this country ever produced, who had a national reputation not only as a statesman, but as a jurist, made a clear, unequivocal expression of opinion upon the proper interpretation of this clause of the Constitution. I may be pardoned, because these were gentlemen who, in their day, were known to the whole country, if I read again their views. I do so because it is proper in a question of this kind, touching the meaning of a constitutional provision, that every man in the country, as well as every member of the Senate, should have every assistance in arriving at a knowledge of what its true meaning is, so that every one may be able to pass his judgment upon the decision which may be made in this case by the Senate. I therefore beg leave to incorporate into my remarks the opinions that were expressed by Mr. Butler and Mr. Badger, already referred to by the Senator from New York. Mr. Butler, in discussing the Phelps case in 1854, not only gave his opinion on the question then before the Senate, but expressed himself very clearly upon the power of the executive of a State to appoint a Senator upon the expiration of the constitutional term—denying emphatically the existence of any such power in the governor. Hear what he says:

It seems to be conceded, that the authority to choose a Senator to commence a new term of six years, after the efflux of a regular term, is exclusively vested in the State Legislature.

Again:

In 1825 Lanman's case came up for consideration involving both the questions. In that case, after a very full debate, it was solemnly decided that it was not competent for the governor of a State to put a member on this floor at the commencement of a term. In other words, it was decided that his power of appointment could not be substituted for the election of the State Legislature. Even if such had not been the decision in the case of Lanman, I take it for granted that such would be and must necessarily be the decision now.

On the same day Mr. Badger, of North Carolina, acknowledged to be one of the most profound lawyers this country has ever produced, not hastily, but after mature deliberation, with a strong desire to arrive at a different conclusion, expressed his opinion in language even stronger than that employed by Mr. Butler. I read the following extracts from different parts of his speech made at that time, and will hereafter quote what he said in a subsequent speech on the same question:

Now, my friend from Kentucky has suggested one or two questions which I think will be sufficiently answered by this statement. The vacancies which the executive of a State is authorized to fill are never vacancies that happen by the efflux of time; they are not foreseen vacancies; they are vacancies that "happen by resignation or otherwise."

Mr. President, from an exceeding desire to give to this clause of the Constitution such a construction as would keep the Senate always full, I labored hard, a year or two ago, when we had questions of this kind before us, to find out some method of supporting, in my own mind, the construction that a vacancy happening by the efflux of time, and not filled beforehand by the Legislature, might be brought within this limited power conferred upon the executive; but, sir, I have been obliged to abandon it.

"By resignation or otherwise" is the language. We must expound the word "otherwise" to apply to vacancies happening by similar events; that is, unforeseen events—death, resignation, appointment to an office which disqualifies—and it can never be applied to the expiration of the term of a Senator which leaves a seat vacant on this floor. My opinion, therefore, is, that the governor of a State has no power to fill a vacancy in this body which is brought about by the expiration or efflux of the time for which a Senator was elected—in other words, at the determination of his term in the Senate. It must be a vacancy in the term happening during the recess of the Legislature; it must be a vacancy in the term happening by resignation or other casualty. That I understand to have been the express and solemn decision of the Senate in Mr. Lanman's case, in 1825, overruling one or two earlier decisions, which had passed, perhaps without full consideration.

So, too, Mr. Phelps, whose case was at that time under consideration, expressed similar views. So did Mr. Foot, of Vermont; and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] who concurs with the committee and who is himself a great authority, yesterday read to us the views of Mr. Cass and Mr. Douglas and Mr. Underwood and others of the great men of that day when the case of Mr. Dickson, of Kentucky, was under consideration in 1852, all sustaining the view which is taken by the committee in this case.

I wish more particularly to call attention to another speech of Mr. Badger, in which he expressed the same opinions if possible even more strongly on this question. I do so because it is proper that the committee should strengthen their own conclusions by the opinions of the eminent men of this country who have expressed opinions on this question. Mr. Badger, in addition to what was read to the Senate by the Senator from New York, said in a subsequent speech in the Phelps case what I will now read:

Under the Constitution the power of appointing Senators is vested in the Legislature, and nowhere else; but if a vacancy happen in this body, by resignation, death, disqualification, or other unforeseen event, the Legislature not being in session, if the vacancy is to be filled, the power must, of necessity, be put somewhere else. That is the necessity. It is the necessity of devolving the power upon the executive, which necessity arises out of two facts: first, that the vacancy could not have been foreseen; and, secondly, that the Legislature is not in a constitutional condition to act; and, therefore, those two things concurring, the Constitution gives to the executive the power of making a temporary appointment.

He there lays down the broad doctrine that it is only where there is a concurrence of two conditions—first, an unforeseen contingency, and, second, that the Legislature is not in a constitutional condition to act—that the governor of a State has the power to make a temporary appointment. In this connection, too, I beg leave to refer to another very eminent and able constitutional lawyer, a gentleman in his day of no small reputation, the equal of the ablest Senators that have sat in this body, and one in whose fame his own State has always felt a just pride. I refer to Hon. James A. Bayard, of Delaware, whose opinions have not yet been cited. He discussed most fully the Phelps case in 1854, and he expressed his opinion on two questions which came up in that debate. He expressed an opinion as to what was decided in the Lanman case, and then he gave his own view and his own construction of the constitutional provision which we are now considering. Says Mr. Bayard:

You find that, in reference to the full term of a Senator, the provision is that he shall hold his office for six years and be chosen by the Legislature. The executive has no authority there. And you find, further, that if the Legislature is in session at the time a vacancy occurs by resignation or otherwise, though it may not even be known to them, yet no authority in such case is confided to the executive to appoint. You find, in other words, that within the intent of the Constitution no authority over the subject is meant to be intrusted to the executive whenever the primary power (the Legislature) is in existence as an organized body.

I am aware that at one time it was decided that even in reference to the full term the executive of a State might make an appointment until the Legislature met; but that construction was subsequently overruled by the Senate in the case of Mr. Lanman in the year 1825; and ever since the practice has been uniformly in accordance with the decision in that case.

There is the opinion of Mr. Bayard upon what was decided in the Lanman case. He said further in a subsequent part of this same speech:

In reference to the full term, it cannot be doubted that no authority whatever is confided to the executive. The negative of power in any other event than when the vacancy occurs in recess shows that it was the intent of the Constitution that the executive was merely to provide for casualties happening when the legislative power, which is the primary power, was not in existence, and, of course, could not act.

Then again, in another part of this very elaborate speech, which reviews this constitutional provision very thoroughly, Mr. Bayard remarked:

Where the seat alone is vacant, but the term has not been once filled by the Legislature, no authority is confided to the executive. The authority conferred upon the executive is to make temporary appointments in case of casualties.

Then, referring to the Sevier case, he said:

From that time the Senate have adhered to the decision in Mr. Lanman's case, which is in accordance with the manifest intent of the Constitution, with one exception. When Mr. Sevier, of Arkansas, was elected a Senator in October, 1836, for six years, he drew lots with his colleague, and the short term fell to him, making his term expire on the 3d of March following. The Legislature of the State of Arkansas, which had just been admitted into the Union, not anticipating such a result, had adjourned. The executive of the State, under those circumstances, appointed Mr. Sevier for the new term.

Then he goes on to state that Mr. Sevier appeared and was admitted to his seat; but Mr. Bayard said:

Having a clear opinion that the decision is not in accordance with the Constitution, and that the distinction upon which it proceeds is groundless, I should certainly not accede to it if a similar case should by any accident arise. But the case recognizes the principle, that where the Legislature have once had the power to appoint, and made no election, a deficiency in legislative action cannot be supplied by an executive appointment. From 1801 to 1825 the practice of the Senate under the decision in Tracy's case was adhered to, of suffering the executive of a State to appoint to a full term, unless the Legislature preceding the commencement of the term had made an appointment. That was overruled by the Senate in Lanman's case, notwithstanding a practice of twenty-four years under it, and, in my judgment, rightfully overruled.

Now, Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I intended; but this is a case of perhaps more importance than may appear to some persons in the Senate. It is a question as to the true and proper construction of the Constitution. We are not to be governed by any sympathy for the applicant, by any consideration of the condition of New Hampshire, but our decision ought to rest upon and be sustained by the constitutional provisions bearing on the subject. I have deemed it my duty to submit my views of this case not because anything I have or could say would be new to the Senate but because of the importance of the subject and because I supposed it was expected of me as the member of the committee making the report that I should submit some remarks in vindication of the conclusions of this committee.

And now I desire to say for myself personally that I have no such pride of opinion as would desire the conclusion of the committee to be sustained by any violation of the Constitution. If I were a judge rendering a decision involving the smallest right, I would rather be overruled on appeal than that my judgment should stand if it was not justified by a fair interpretation of the law. So I say here, if the views which this committee have advanced in their report are not correct, as a member of that committee I do not desire its conclusions sustained, and I think I express the wish of every member of the committee in expressing my own. But if the views of the committee are in harmony with the Constitution touching this question, then I say the reversal of their decision will not do injustice to the members of that committee, because their record will live and be judged of hereafter by those who succeed us in these Halls; but it would be unjust to the Constitution of the country and become a precedent for evil in the future; a precedent which the enlightened judgment of the country will hereafter disapprove, and the action of the Senate at no distant day disavow.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I only rise to make a short reference to one supposed authority cited by my respected colleague. I need not say with what respect I have listened to this debate throughout. It is evident that the subject is approached and is discussed in a spirit and tone eminently worthy of its importance; and that the Senate, not in name but in fact, is sitting as a court of justice deciding upon important constitutional rights. Therefore, sir, it is from the collision of honest minds that the spark of truth is struck. It is only from such collision and such honest hearts that truth can be elicited; and I hail with great satisfaction the differences between minds which occur and are expressed with such positiveness and yet mutual respect.

But, sir, my respected colleague read from the Thirty-Years' View of Mr. Benton to show what was, according to Mr. Benton's high authority, the true meaning of the decision in the Lanman case. I have said before, and it is not necessary to repeat, that the reasons for the decision in the Lanman case were too imperfectly reported for us to know precisely the weight of that as an authority upon the case before us. That I say again, because when I find as eminent a man as Judge Story reporting that the case was decided upon one ground and see an equally eminent authority reporting that the case was decided on another ground, and they both so much nearer the event than I who succeed them at the lapse of fully half a century from the time of the decision of the Lanman case, I may be pardoned if I am placed in doubt as to which of two such authorities to take.

But, sir, let me call the attention of my colleague and the Senate to all that has been said by Mr. Benton. After reciting what he believed to be the direct point in controversy which controlled the decision in the Lanman case, he goes further:

> The term "appoint" is the word applied to a gubernatorial appointment. The election was the regular mode of the Constitution, and was not to be superseded by an appointment in any case in which the Legislature could act, whether they acted or not.

If there be a rule of construction universally accepted, it is that the expression of one thing shall be held to be the exclusion of another; and where this authority, relied upon by the majority, is speaking of a case where a governor could not act, he says it must be a case where the Legislature could act; and such is the reasoning of that authority, so weighty with me, that of one whom it is my honor to call my father, who preceded me in this body. He placed that decision in the case of Lanman, in his discussion of the Phelps case, on the precise ground, and to use his language, together with that of the venerable and distinguished jurist from South Carolina who joined him in the minority report, Judge Butler, on that occasion—the report of the minority that received the approval of the Senate, the question was whether there had been an existence of power in a Legislature to fill the vacancy; not whether that power had been exerted, but whether it existed, because ex necessitate if power in the Legislature did not exist or as Mr. Benton says, if the Legislature had not a case in which it could act, then the power of appointment was admitted.

Now, try that principle by the facts of the present case. Take the authority of Messrs. Bayard and Butler in 1854, of Mr. Benton at the time he wrote this book, of the Senate's decision in 1825 if it is to be interpreted according to Mr. Benton's own rule, and apply it to the present case, and where do we stand? On the 7th of June last the Committee on Privileges and Elections containing in its then minority nearly all the gentlemen of the present majority and in its present minority several of its then majority, for that committee has been only slightly changed since the 4th day of March ultimo, when the question was put to them which Legislature (for there can be but one) had under the act of Congress, 1866, power to fill the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of the term of Mr. Wadleigh, gave their unanimous reply in which they said that the only Legislature that could fill that place was the one to be elected in November, 1878, and which cannot under its constitutional term be convened until June, 1879. If that was the only Legislature to elect, how can it be said that the power has not existed in a Legislature to elect which it has failed to avail itself of? There is, Senators, just the point in this case. You argue that the word "casualty" shall be imported as an explanation of "vacancy." You seem to consider that uncertainty can attach itself to nothing but the occurrence of a vacancy. May there not be such uncertainties in regard to the changes of a State's form of government, lawful in themselves but uncertain as to their dates, as may deprive that State under the letter of the Constitution of her proper representation in the body?

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BAYARD. If my friend will wait a moment I will answer him with the greatest pleasure. But I wish now to state simply that which has controlled my vote in this case. I have read the debate in the case of Phelps; I accept to its letter the doctrine laid down by the minority report in that case which has been so personally and forcibly addressed to me; and reading that as touching this question, my mind answers it under the instructions of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the last Congress and under the facts as known to the public. The question in my view is, did a legislative power exist in New Hampshire which could under the Constitution and laws fill that vacancy from the 4th of March to the 4th of May or June? I answer, it did not exist. I am backed by the authority of a committee of this body and by the silent vote of this body accepting that issue of fact and deciding that there was no Legislature in existence which could fill that vacancy. If such a legislative power did not exist, then by the reasoning of all these cases and by the language of Mr. Benton the Legislature could not act, and therefore the power of appointment was called in to supplement and prevent that vacancy which the Constitution did not design to occur.

Now, I beg pardon of my friend from Wisconsin; I will yield to him.

Mr. CARPENTER. I wish to ask the Senator whether in his opinion the Legislature of New Hampshire which was in session in June last had or had not the power to elect a Senator to succeed Mr. Wadleigh?

Mr. BAYARD. My friend from Wisconsin asked me that question the other day, and I said that I would refer it to the unanimous opinion of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body which seemed to be supported by the united Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator permit me one remark?

Mr. BAYARD. Let me say further to my friend that I have not been able to get over the evident force and meaning of those simple words of the act of 1866 which provide that it is the Legislature chosen next before the occurrence of the vacancy which is the Legislature to elect. I know that the honorable Senator from Wisconsin says that a Legislature means an organized body; it does not mean a number of men who may become organized into a Legislature, but he speaks of it as an organized body, and therefore to sustain his construction the act of 1866 would, it seems to me, had it meant to justify such a construction, have directed that the Legislature which met and organized next before the occurrence of the vacancy, in other words which was in existence as a Legislature next before the occurrence of the vacancy and therefore nearest to the event, was the body which alone could fill the vacancy. But Congress has not said that. The act under which we all have taken our seats since 1866 has fixed the time to qualify the body as a Legislature to elect the date of its election, the date of its being chosen, and not the date of its meeting and organization. We have, for instance, the election of Senators in advance, the election of Representatives in advance. From the nature of things a man must be chosen before he can take his seat, and there must be an interim in which, although he is a Senator-elect or a Representative-elect, he is not really a Senator or a Representative, because he is not qualified. He is not competent to act until he has been duly admitted by the body which alone is the judge of his qualification, election, and return. Therefore I think it would be as unjust and as unwarranted to say that a man elected to this body was not a Senator until a subsequent admission had made him one, as to say that a Legislature chosen was not a Legislature because it had not met and organized. That is what I mean.

Mr. CARPENTER. Now, my friend will allow me one remark; I do not propose to enter into any discussion. He has slightly misapprehended my view. I do not say that it is necessary that the Legislature should have assembled in order to be a Legislature; at least I do not think I said that. If I did, I perhaps expressed myself too strongly. But what I meant to say, and what I say now, is that there must be a body of men in existence in whom the legislative power resides, so that if the governor of a States hould call the Legislature he need not mention names but by law it is ascertained who are to answer that call.

But the trouble in my mind, and which I wanted the opinion of the Senator upon, was this, whether persons chosen, but whose term of office does not begin, can be called the Legislature of that State while there is another Legislature in actual session possessing and exercising the legislative power of that State, he agreeing as I do that there can be but one Legislature. My only purpose was to get the opinion of the Senator as to whether or not that Legislature in June last, being an unquestionable Legislature at the time, and the last Legislature that could be in session before the expiration of the term, had or had not the power to fill that term which was to be filled in consequence of an event certain to occur in the life of that Legislature.

Mr. BAYARD. I suppose that the object of Congress in passing the act of 1866 was to fix which Legislature and which Legislature alone was competent to elect a Senator. I suppose it was intended to prevent the attempt to fill vacancies in advance; that is to say a Legislature undertaking to fill two vacancies, one occurring at the lapse of one year and one of three years subsequent and so on; and therefore in order to confine legislative action to filling a vacancy, it required that only one should pretend to do it, and that only one should be intrusted with the power to do it, and that one should be the one nearest in its choice to the event contemplated, because the nearer the event the more strong is the presumption that it represents the popular sentiment at that time. And therefore Congress chose to give the power to the Legislature nearest to the necessary period so as to represent, as was supposed, the popular wish at that time. Therefore they selected that one Legislature, and it was done to prevent, as I suppose, other Legislatures from anticipating vacancies and producing a confusion by having men present credentials here or contest seats on elections by different Legislatures of the same States. That I suppose was the argument.

Mr. BECK. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to ask him this question: If any public exigency had required the governor of New Hampshire to call the Legislature of that State together at any time before the 4th of March last, which Legislature would have assembled in response to the call?

Mr. BAYARD. I understand he only was able to call the Legislature elected in March, 1878. That, I suppose, is the fact; but notwithstanding that fact you have, by your act of Congress, excluded that Legislature from the power of electing to this place, if words have any meaning. You have said that one Legislature can act and that shall be the one chosen next before the event. Now I will ask the question of my friend from Kentucky, when was the Legislature that is to meet in June chosen?

Mr. BECK. It was chosen, as I understand, last November.

Mr. BAYARD. Then, I ask, whether the month of November, 1878, is not nearer to the month of March, 1879, than the month of March, 1878?

Mr. KERNAN. I want to ask my friend——

Mr. BAYARD. I want an answer to my question.

Mr. KERNAN. The legal Legislature elected and sitting next before the occurrence of the vacancy is that which met last June.

Mr. BAYARD. That is not the question. It is which is the Legislature that can choose the Senator? The act of Congress declares that but one Legislature is to be entitled to make the choice; and which is that? The one whose election is nearest in date to the occurrence of the vacancy.

Mr. CARPENTER. I wish to make this suggestion to the Senator from Delaware: undoubtedly that act of Congress intended that the Legislature last preceding the end of the term should elect. That is plain, I think. Now, the people of New Hampshire have elected members; they have not elected a Legislature, because by the constitution of that State to-day under which they are to be a Legislature has not taken effect. Now, then, there was but one Legislature in June last. That Legislature was to continue in session until after the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term. I interrupted the Senator only to ascertain, and although it is probably my fault, yet I have not ascertained, whether the Senator from Delaware believes that that Legislature in session in June, before the expiration of the term, with full knowledge that no other Legislature could have official life until after the expiration of the term, had or had not power to act, though I infer from his remarks that he thinks they had not. Now, I wish to suggest to him that if they had not it must be because the act of 1866 stripped them of that power. If they would have had under the Constitution the power to make that election, can an act of Congress strip them of it?

Mr. BAYARD. With due respect to my friend, that is begging the question. That is putting in a question that has not yet been presented,—the constitutionality of the act of 1866. In discussing this case I assume that act to have been accepted as a constitutional act. This very Committee on Privileges and Elections, not with all its present members, but with all the members of the former minority now in the majority of that committee, and vice versa, I believe (there has been very little change at least) decided the fact that the act of 1866 was a constitutional act, and that the Legislature chosen next before the occurrence of the vacancy was the only one that could elect, and therefore the Legislature chosen in March, 1878, was not the Legislature of the State to elect. That was their report. My friend from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] has it in his hand.

If that is clear, then we come back to the basis upon which I found my opinion, that owing to what you may call a casualty, for it was a casualty, in the framing of their legislative arrangements in New Hampshire, not contemplated at all at the time of Mr. Wadleigh's original election,—owing to a casualty then existing, it so happened that there was no Legislature in existence to fill this vacancy, and, therefcre, if they were not in existence they had not the power, and if the State had not the power to elect by a Legislature, the supplementary power of temporary gubernatorial appointment is expressly recognized by Mr. Benton and I think by every other authority on the subject.

Mr. CARPENTER. I should like to ask one question further, if the Senator will permit me. About the only compensation that a lawyer gets for serving in this body is what law he can learn. The Senator from Delaware is an able lawyer. I wish to know his opinion upon the precise point, whether he now believes that the act of 1866 with the construction he puts upon it, assuming that to be the proper and necessary construction of that act, be or be not constitutional.

Mr. BAYARD. I have treated that act as being constitutional; and unless aided by the greater experience and ability of my friend from Wisconsin my opinion would not be as valuable as I should like it to be, if I gave it without the gravest and closest consideration, weighing that act against the Constitution; but I have always held it to be constitutional. Let me read from the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in the case of Blodgett made in 1871 by Mr. CARPENTER, of Wisconsin:

> This refinement of reasoning does not meet the approbation of your committee. The question is, What was the intention of Congress in passing this act? The Legislature designated by the act is the one "which shall be chosen next preceding the expiration of the time," &c. There is no such thing as choosing a Legislature except by choosing its members. The Constitution declares that Senators shall be elected by the Legislature of each State. Hence the act of Congress employs the same phrase. But your committee cannot doubt that it was the intention of Congress to provide that the Legislature whose members should be elected next preceding the expiration of the senatorial term should elect the successor. The distinction sought to be established between the words elected and chosen derives no support from popular or legal lexicography. Elected is defined chosen, and chosen is defined elected; and the words are used as synonymous in the Constitution of the United States, the constitution of every State, in all our statutes, and in all popular literature.

There is the authority of my honorable friend himself to the fact whether the Legislature which is to elect is nearer to the expiration of the term or not. That is the simple question; and examining the two dates, and discovering that the day of election in this case took place in November, 1878, I am clearly of the opinion that it was nearer to June of the year following than was the month of March previous.

Mr. CARPENTER. Lest it may be inferred that there is anything in that report inconsistent with what I am claiming to-day, I ask to explain the circumstances of that case. I adhere to the conclusion there arrived at, I adhere to its general language, read in connection with the case before the committee. In the trial of Aaron Burr, when there was passed up to the great Chief-Justice Marshall the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered by himself, in the Swartout-Bollman case, which was thought to be inconsistent with the opinion which the Chief-Justice was then delivering, he said that every opinion must be read in the light of the case which was being decided; that an opinion is not a treatise upon the subject; it is the decision of a particular case. I quote from memory only; but that is the substance of what he said.

The Committee on Privileges and Elections in 1871 were deciding a particular case, and what was that case? It was a case of a pretended election made by a Legislature at a time when by the then existing constitution and laws of the State there was to be elected another Legislature, which by the laws of the State on that day were compelled to assemble before the expiration of the term. Therefore the election by that Legislature of Mr. Blodgett was a clean jumping of a Legislature provided for and compelled to sit before the expiration of the term. His election of course was good, or good for nothing, when it was made. For the purpose of bracing it up the Legislature afterward postponed the session of the second Legislature so as to bring it after the expiration of the term; but the whole proceeding was a mere fraud upon the act of Congress, and they knew it when they took the course they did, because by the law in force when they elected Blodgett there must be elected and there must assemble that newly elected Legislature before the expiration of the term.

In deciding that case there may be some words in the report of the committee which are not accurate enough to be applied to the new facts of this case. They were perfectly correct with reference to that case, and they are correct in that for the purpose of being applied to this case. I indorse fully what was said in that report; there is not a word in it that I do not agree to to-day, except that perhaps in the phraseology of the report the expression in regard to choosing a Legislature that it means choosing its members may give in the application which is now made of it some color of discrepancy between that and the argument which I attempted to make here the other day. That discrepancy, however, grows entirely out of the fact that that case did not call for the distinction which this case does call for, because the same facts were not presented. That was not the case of a Legislature making an election when by law there would be a subsequent election of a Legislature but not a meeting of the Legislature before the term expired. In this case those are the facts. There, when they elected Mr. Blodgett, that very day, by the constitution and laws of that State, there must be elected and there must assemble another Legislature prior to the expiration of the term for succeeding which Blodgett was elected.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a single question. A Legislature has been chosen in New Hampshire before the expiration of the term of an existing Legislature. That happens, I suppose, in most of the States; it certainly occurs in my own State that a Legislature is chosen before the expiration of the term of an existing Legislature. That has been the case in New Hampshire; and the question I ask of the Senator from Wisconsin is, Which of those two Legislatures was chosen next preceding the expiration of the term for which Senator Wadleigh was chosen to this body.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is a very easy thing to answer, I think, and I have no objection to undertaking it. When you speak of electing a Legislature prior to the term, what is intended by this act, as I tried to establish the other day, is not that you have elected members who will never possess the legislative power until after the expiration of the senatorial term——

Mr. DAWES. I was trying to get what the Senator assumes to be the meaning by another process, and I asked his answer to my question in order that that might aid me in coming to a conclusion, which he assumes in order to answer my question.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. The question I asked is simply a question of fact when two Legislatures are, and to that extent——

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MCMILLAN in the chair.) The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I am restating my question so that I may be understood exactly. I know the Senator is entirely willing to answer if he understands my question, and if he does not it is because I do not state it distinctly.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator stated his question distinctly and I wish to answer it.

Mr. DAWES. Then I am more surprised than ever. Mr. President, I will restate my question. A Legislature has been chosen in New Hampshire before the expiration of the term of an existing Legislature.

Mr. CARPENTER. That I deny. I mean by the remark that that is where we differ in opinion.

Mr. DAWES. A Legislature will never exist without being chosen at some time. If the Legislature which assembles next June has not been chosen already, I do not know when it will be chosen. It is never to be chosen any more than it is now chosen. It may be organized; it may be qualified; it may be authorized to act as a Legislature under the constitution of the State; but if it was not chosen last November it never will be chosen.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Allow me to state——

Mr. CARPENTER. Who is entitled to the floor on this point?

Mr. DAWES. I have the floor.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not understand that to be the case. That is another point where we disagree.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Wisconsin took his seat; I rose and was recognized by the Chair, and stated that I should like to put an interrogatory to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CARPENTER. And I rose to answer it, and in my answer I was interrupted. I maintain as a point of order that I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Oh, we shall not differ about that. The Senator shall have the floor; I did not intend to take it from him, and I beg his pardon if I have interrupted him. I wanted to restate my interrogatory so that there could be no mistake between the Senator and myself; and if he will allow me to go through the restatement without its interrupting him, I shall do so.

Mr. CARPENTER. It being understood that I have the floor, I have no objection to the Senator's stating his question at any length.

Mr. DAWES. Acknowledging that the Senator has the floor and that by his courtesy I am permitted to state my question, I having been interrupted in the middle of the restatement, will try and restate it; and I restate it by premising that I do not suppose a Legislature can be chosen more than once. If there is any defect in its election at that time, it is fatal. If it is not called into being so far as choice is concerned at one moment, it never is; it is not a lingering birth; it is an instantaneous one. The constitution of New Hampshire prescribed that during the existence of the present organized Legislature the people of New Hampshire should proceed in November to the choice of another Legislature that should meet after this Legislature had expired. The question I asked of the Senator was, which of those two Legislatures, both of them chosen at some time, was chosen next preceding the expiration of the senatorial term?

Mr. CARPENTER. That question I shall answer. It calls for my opinion, and I will give it; but I will do it in my own way. The Senator puts to me a question which I will state as I understand it. During the official life of the Legislature of New Hampshire which is in existence to-day, and which will remain the only Legislature of that State until June next, persons have been elected by the people who will meet next June if the new constitution goes into force; that is, if the people of the State do not interfere in the mean time and alter it, which they may do. If the new constitution is left to itself and goes into effect next June, then the persons who were elected before that constitution had any effect will be the members of that Legislature. Now, the Senator put to me the question, which is supposed to be a tangler, which of the two Legislatures was elected last prior to the end of Mr. Wadleigh's term? That is a question which, if the Senator put to me in a town meeting on the Rocky Mountains, I should be afraid would overcome me. It is so cunning in mere phraseology, it is so seeming and plausible to a man who knows nothing about law and legal proceedings, that I should be afraid he would get two votes to my one on that question; but I am not at all afraid that he can do so in the Senate. Let us take a perfectly analogous case. It has been the practice from the first for Territories under enabling acts of Congress to draft and submit to the people for their approval a constitution of the State. It has been their practice to elect Senators also and send them on here with that draught of a constitution as agents to get the State admitted into the Union; and then when the State is admitted into the Union they take their seats as Senators. Why? Because the admission of the State cures that election by relation. If the State be admitted, then the Senators are received because the admission of the State cures and gives legal effect by relation to an act which had no legal effect whatever when it was performed. The men who were elected Senators from Colorado came on here before the admission of the State. If that State had not been admitted they never would have been Senators, and yet they were elected before the State was admitted.

The Senator's point is that they are the Legislature when they are elected or never. I say no; they are the Legislature when the new constitution comes in and makes them so, and then that constitution by relation in legal effect will cure the election of those men and they will then be an elected Legislature. Previous to that time they are simply elected persons, to become a Legislature by the happening of a subsequent event. If the new constitution of New Hampshire should not go into force, if the people of that State should change it in the mean time, they may not take their seats at all. They have no constitutional existence as a Legislature to-day; and that is shown by the fact, which every lawyer must concede, that if the governor of the State were to-day to call an extra session of the Legislature without specifying names or mentioning senators and representatives the old Legislature would have to assemble. A State can have but one Legislature.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Except in the South.

Mr. CARPENTER. We are speaking of the Northern States under the Constitution. Therefore if the old Legislature is to-day the body in which the legislative power of the State of New Hampshire resides, and which must assemble if the governor should call an extra session to-day, then I say there is not another elected Legislature at this same time. I understand how cunning, I do not mean it in any offensive sense, but how plausible, to the average mind is the question put. Is it not the Legislature elected last before the expiration of the term? I say no. I say, if nothing happens, after the 1st of June it will be. But when this Legislature were in session in June last and the question was whether they then had power to elect a Senator, that question ought to have been settled by that Legislature upon the state of things then existing. That was certainly the last-elected Legislature. In other words, to change the phraseology, it was the last Legislature before the expiration of the term. It was, therefore, the last Legislature before the expiration of the term which had been elected. By merely transposing the words here, will the Senator from Massachusetts maintain that an act of Congress in that way should be so construed as absolutely to deprive a State of representation in this body for three months? That cannot be maintained; and yet that is the inference from the argument which the Senator now submits. So I say, in my opinion, the Legislature which was in session in June last was the Legislature which at that time had been last elected prior to the expiration of the term, and it remains so to-day. Nobody questions that it is the Legislature at this very moment and might be called together and fill this term. Nobody denies that. Then I say that there was not at that time, in my opinion, nor is there at this time, another elected Legislature of that State.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I was convinced that the Senator misunderstood me. He supposed that I was rash enough to invite him to an encounter of wit. I shall never be rash enough to do that. He supposed further that I was asking of him which of these two Legislatures could qualify to-day and perform the functions of a Legislature. I did not ask any such question as that. Nobody doubts that a Legislature elected, organized, and by the constitution allowed to hold until a future period, is the only Legislature now authorized to perform the functions of a Legislature. No such question as that have I had the honor to present to the Senator from Wisconsin. But it being admitted that there can be under the constitution of New Hampshire a Legislature chosen during the existence of another Legislature, there would then be two processes which had taken place that go by precisely the same name and are in all respects identically the same act, namely, the act that chose the one Legislature and the act that chose the other. The statute of the United States in undertaking to describe which of two Legislatures shall do a certain act has said that it shall be that of two Legislatures which is chosen next preceding the vacancy.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to put him a question right there?

Mr. DAWES. Let me get through with my friend from Wisconsin, and then if I survive I shall try to answer my friend from Georgia. I do not promise to do it; it is only on that condition.

Mr. CARPENTER. I trust the Senator will never depart from me.

Mr. DAWES. I shall always be in good company, then. I am not inquiring, it is not an inquiry worthy to be made, which of these Legislatures can perform the functions of a Legislature to-day, because the constitution has settled that beyond any doubt. It is provided that there may be two short elections. The people of New Hampshire were called upon to make a choice during the existence of an organized Legislature. After having done that there are two choices, and the law of Congress comes in and says that it will determine which of two Legislatures, when they are Legislatures, shall do this other thing.

Mr. CARPENTER. Now, will the Senator allow me five words? I make this request of the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. I asked a simple question of my friend and he answered it by telling me that I ought to know that if the Legislature was summoned together to-day it would be another Legislature from the one to meet in June. I did not doubt that; but what I was troubled with was whether when it got together to-day it would be the Legislature defined in the law of Congress. I go to the records and I find that there is another choice since that Legislature was chosen. Then I look into the statute and I see that that choice determines which of the Legislatures shall do this act and when they shall do it. Of course they cannot do it until the constitution permits them to organize. The only trouble in my mind is whether it is in the power of Congress to define a particular Legislature as the one to choose a Senator, which Legislature does not meet until after the vacancy occurs. If it was in the power of Congress to do that thing, they have done it. I have my doubts whether it is in the power of Congress to do it; but I am not answered by any unanswerable argument, which always comes from the Senator from Wisconsin, upon a point I did not ask him, as to which of the Legislatures, if the proclamation of the governor should issue to-day, would come together.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to put him one question? I did not say he asked me that question; I did not understand that he did; he misunderstood me. I put it as a point we both agreed about, that there could be but one Legislature at a time, and that the Legislature elected in March, 1878, was the Legislature which would have to convene to-day and exercise legislative functions until next June. I put that as a premise conceded by each of us on which we were to argue. My question was this: I want to know of the Senator whether in his opinion, if the act of Congress of 1866 had never been passed, the Legislature of New Hampshire last in regular session prior to the expiration of Wadleigh's term could not fill it, and, if so, whether Congress can take away that power by any act?

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt that the Legislature could have done so. It would have been in conflict with no law of Congress; it would have been the usage of all Legislatures, except that there was a time when, in certain States, it was attempted unsuccessfully for a Legislature of one political party to elect, anticipating the power which really belonged to a subsequent Legislature; but it never succeeded. The universal usage, in the absence of all law, has been for the Legislature which meets last before the expiration of the term to elect a Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There was one instance.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Vermont corrects me in saying that it never succeeded by suggesting that there was one instance. He is always right, and I am most generally wrong. But Congress undertook, under the power given them by the Constitution, to prescribe what Legislature should elect and how it should elect. If it is in their power to authorize, to select a Legislature that does not come together until three months after the expiration of the term, they have, unwittingly I think, but they nevertheless have, described that Legislature. My argument yesterday was that they having undertaken to do that, and it having worked in New Hampshire the result of depriving New Hampshire of representation upon this floor without the governor's appointment, it was not sound policy to do it. I owe the Senator from Georgia an answer to some question, and I will make it, if I can.

Mr. CARPENTER. I want to put a question in this connection.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will say that I do not desire to ask the question now. It has been covered really by the question of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CARPENTER. I wish to put to the Senator from Massachusetts a question. We are feeling here measurably in the dark for some construction of the Constitution. We all want to settle this thing, if we can, upon principle. I concede that if there is a fair doubt in the mind of any man about whether Mr. Bell is entitled to the seat, he ought to have it; but we want to ascertain what the law is. Let me put the Senator a question which seems to me to be a test of the whole matter about which we have been differing in opinion. Concede for the purpose of the case that the appointment of Mr. Bell by the governor on the 13th of March was a legal appointment because there was then a vacancy (leaving out now the word "happen") in the recess of the Legislature. Concede that Mr. Bell came here and when his case was presented yesterday morning we had admitted him. Suppose the governor of that State should call an extra session of the Legislature to meet day after to-morrow, there being in this Chamber a Senator sitting from that State under an appointment from the governor, I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the old Legislature assembled in extra session day after to-morrow could not fill the vacancy? The Constitution says that a vacancy happening in the recess of the Legislature shall be filled by the governor by appointment temporarily "until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancy." That is the Constitution. As applied to this case, is it possible for Congress to say that if the governor makes an appointment in the recess of a Legislature and the appointee is admitted to a seat and afterward the Legislature is convened by the governor, that Legislature cannot fill the vacancy, when the Constitution says it "shall?" The Senator can only claim this in virtue of the act of 1866. If that be true, if he be sound in the construction which he gives to that act, is it not perfectly plain that the act is unconstitutional?

Mr. DAWES. I will try to show the Senator that he begs his own question.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is not an answer.

Mr. DAWES. Whether the Legislature called together to-morrow by the proclamation of the governor could proceed to elect a Senator, would depend upon the effect you give to the law of 1866, because the law of 1866 describes the Legislature which must fill the vacancy. If that law controls, the Legislature chosen next preceding the occurrence of the vacancy would not be that Legislature which would assemble to-morrow, and therefore the Senator, in putting his question in another form, comes right back to the question which I put to him as to which of the two Legislatures has been described in the statute. The answer which I gave to the question pending here was, has Congress the power to designate the Legislature with regard to the time when the vacancy shall occur? If they have that power, then they have described another Legislature from that; if they have not the power, then the Legislature which meets to-morrow would be the Legislature which ought to fill the vacancy. It depends upon that power assuming to control both the mode and manner and the Legislature; but the act of Congress describing one of two Legislatures, which, to that extent could exist at the same time, must be followed if that is controlling. Whether it be controlling or not, New Hampshire followed it. The result of her following it is the condition of things that we find to-day.

Mr. CARPENTER. If, under this provision of the Constitution referred to, Congress can determine which Legislature of a State shall make an election, then it may provide that the Legislature elected three years after the term expires shall choose a Senator. It may be said that would be an abuse of power; but the framers of the Constitution did not leave this subject open to such an abuse. The Constitution does not leave it open to such an abuse. Really, as I understand the last position taken by the Senator, it comes right down to the question whether the Constitution shall control or whether the act of 1866 shall control. I differ with him in that dilemma, because I think the act of 1866 properly construed does not conflict with the Constitution; but if it does, then the question is, as I understand, whether the Constitution shall be obeyed or the act of 1866. With all deference to Congress and with all deference to the act of 1866, if it must be construed so as to conflict with the Constitution, it must go down in my opinion, and the subject stands where it would stand if the act of 1866 had never been passed at all.

The Legislature in June last clearly could have made the election if the act of 1866 never had been passed. It was a constitutional right of the legislative power of the State of New Hampshire to fill that vacancy which would occur by the expiration of Mr. Wadleigh's term, and if Congress had not interfered the Legislature in session in June last would have chosen a Senator for the succeeding term, as all the States, since the Government began, have filled the terms in this Chamber expiring in that way. They know that the Legislature need not wait until the term expires. They elect in anticipation of the expiration; they elect because it is known that under the Constitution the term must expire. Without any legislation of Congress it is perfectly plain that the legislative power of New Hampshire could have filled at the regular session in June of last year that term, which was to begin next after that session and before any other Legislature could either be elected or convene.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose they had not had a quorum?

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator from Vermont says, "Suppose they had not had a quorum?" I suppose, of course, they had a quorum or they could not act. We are not talking about whether the minority of that Legislature could make an election; we are speaking of the Legislature, and of course I mean a quorum of the Legislature.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood the Senator about that; but I was asking a question with a view to this point: Suppose the Legislature of last June without this change in the New Hampshire constitution, there being a normal condition of things there, had been unable to obtain a quorum down to the 4th of March and had adjourned without it, would not that have been a casualty within my friend's meaning of the Constitution as he interprets it, an unforeseen event, that deprived the State of a Senator and therefore left a vacancy for the governor to fill?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not think so; I think that the phrase "by resignation, or otherwise," upon which a vacancy is to be filled by the governor, means a vacancy caused by something that applies to the Senate. It may be a Senator's resignation, it may be his death, it may be his expulsion from this Chamber; it is not an accident occurring to the State. The State may never have a quorum in its Legislature and of course then could never elect Senators; but that is not at all material as applied to this case, because here I understand they had a quorum of the Legislature and were in session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is only a matter of illustrating the question, and my friend will pardon me when I ask it with a view to the illustration of another question, because as the Senator says we all want to get at the merit of this case.

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose the Legislature of New Hampshire at the last June meeting, having the lawful right to do so, I take it for this purpose, had elected a Senator? Suppose before the 3d of March that Senator elected, whose office had not begun of course, should resign or die. Now, then, the Legislature having adjourned and the 4th of March coming, what could the governor of New Hampshire do then—anything?

Mr. CARPENTER. Of course in giving an answer to a point that a man had not thought of for a moment and which never has occurred in the world, I would not consider myself bound by the opinion I expressed, but at the first blush my impression is that the governor would not have the right to appoint in the case supposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what the Senator's argument comes to.

Mr. CARPENTER. My impression is that it would have simply taken the Legislature to fill the term. Suppose further that they had elected John Smith in June last to fill that term and it turned out that John Smith died the night before the election. There would have been an honest attempt on the part of the Legislature to fill the vacancy; and then there was another honest attempt on the part of the Legislature to elect a man who was alive that day but who died the next. They could proceed the day after and fill that term, could they not? Then if they had done so, that man would be entitled to a seat. If they had not done so, then the Legislature having the power to fill the term, having been in session and having had the opportunity, the governor could not appoint, as I believe we all agree.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think my friend from Wisconsin is perfectly correct in the result to which he comes from his starting-point. If he is right on this question he is right as to the fact that supposing Mr. Wadleigh had been re-elected and had died on the 2d day of March the governor could not have filled the place. If my friend is right that the governor could not fill in this case, I think that position follows.

Mr. CARPENTER. Of course I must answer the Senator's question from my stand-point and not from his.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; I say I think the Senator sticks to his opinion.

Mr. CARPENTER. I stick to the text.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator goes the full figure.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have endeavored to ascertain what the true rule was here, and I shall endeavor to follow it throughout.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not know, seeing that this debate is going on, but that I should like to say a single word. First, I want to say—because I shall be very brief indeed—that what the Senator from Wisconsin has stated as to the value of judicial opinions and what they mean, as tested by being applied to the case they have in hand, referring to his report in the Blodgett case, is of course an axiom in the law. Applying that axiom to the cases which have been cited on the nosciur a sociis notion of "resignation or otherwise," then I think my friend from Wisconsin will see if he looks at it, and the Senator from Georgia will see, that the decision of the supreme court of the State of Wisconsin which is supposed to be a conclusive authority on the meaning and effect of the words "resignation or otherwise," is not an authority which supports the position that they assume it to have supported here. There the statute of Wisconsin said that the power of the aldermen or some body in a city might remove an inspector of streets, or whatever he was, for incompetency or any other cause satisfactory to the board. I have not covered all the words, but the "any other cause" I am pretty sure was to be satisfactory to the board. Then they removed him for a cause that they stated to be satisfactory to themselves, and he resisted. The supreme court of Wisconsin said that there must be the cause; if they removed him without any cause at all they would have no right to do it; and the cause must have some relation to the public interest that they were called upon to defend, and that was in respect of his conduct in the office. That was sound law beyond all question. There it was "cause" which was the governing word. Applying it to this case, what is the governing word here? What is the thing we are trying to dispose of? It is a vacancy in an office that everybody agrees ought to be filled in some constitutional way. There is the subject upon which the Constitution speaks, just as this removal from office for cause was the subject upon which the law of Wisconsin spoke.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If the Senator will look at the decision in Wisconsin he will see that in the decision in that case the word "cause" was not the main word; it was the kind of cause. The court said that it must not only be a cause, but there must be a cause like that enumerated, that is, a cause affecting the competency of the incumbent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly, Mr. President.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It must be some other like cause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had stated before that it was a cause in reference to the public interest, the administration of the office. I had endeavored to state that, and now I think I have stated it so that my friend will understand me.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is exactly what the supreme court of Wisconsin do not say. They do not say it is a cause affecting the public interest, but it is a cause affecting the public interest for a certain reason, and that is the competency of the party. There might be a great many other reasons why he should be removed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now if my friend from Georgia will yield me the floor a little while, by his grace I will go on. I repeat that what the supreme court of Wisconsin said, as I understand it, (I do not doubt the Senator from Georgia understands it the other way,) was that here must be a cause, and that that cause in the relation in which the word stood must be a cause that affected the public interest in the administration of the office. Those are the very words I used before. I do not know that the supreme court of Wisconsin used a single one of these words, but if I am capable of understanding the English language they expressed that idea, and I understand the Senator from Georgia to express that idea. He says competency to fulfill its duties; I say a correct administration of the office. It is a mere verbal difference, then, at which we arrive.

Now what have you got in this case? What is it here that is required to be administered? It is the office of a Senator of the United States, which never expires but which is to be filled from time to time by the choice of successive persons or the same person over and over again. The Constitution says that when there is a vacancy in that office for one reason, by one event, "by resignation, or otherwise," that vacancy shall be filled up temporarily, and then completely by another power, does it not? I take it that it does. What then becomes of all this authority that is pressed upon us to defeat the object of the Constitution, as we all agree that the object is that these places shall be filled if they can be in some regular way? What becomes of this sort of talk? Instead of being authorities against the exertion of this power, you have got by the express language of the Constitution an event wherein the Constitution says the governor of the State shall act provided you make out that this event has happened "by resignation, or otherwise,"—I am coming back to the meaning of the word "happen" presently—taken place, I will say now "by resignation, or otherwise." My honorable friend from Georgia says (and my honorable friend from Wisconsin seems to fall in with him, though he would not state it that way, I suppose) that "otherwise" means "likewise," and that we ought to read it, "and if vacancies happen during the recess of the Legislature by resignation, or likewise, (by other events like a resignation,) then the governor may fill them up." The men who made the Constitution chose the word "otherwise" instead of "likewise," and I suppose, therefore, that they meant "otherwise" instead of "likewise," and that they intended to have a vacancy, which was what they were talking about, filled up when it should occur, (I am not now on the word "happen,") when it should take place, when it should be within the limitations that they prescribed as to the duration of the power of the governor's appointment, from a cause other or in a manner other than by a resignation.

That there is a vacancy here everybody agrees, I believe,—a vacancy in the constitutional sense and in fact which must be filled, and when the Legislature come to fill it they will fill a vacancy, because to say that they elect for the full term is a mere contradiction in terms, a mere absurdity in respect of that part of the term which has gone by. You cannot appoint a person to an office that has ceased to exist; you cannot appoint a person for a period of time that has gone by; it is a mere nullity. I suppose there will be no objection on the part of the republicans of the United States to elect Mr. Tilden President from the 4th of March, 1789, four years; it would not hurt their views at all; and I presume the democratic party would be very glad to elect Mr. Hayes for the same term if he would give up the present one. Of course I only speak of those great illustrations to show how absolutely absurd it is to talk about electing or appointing any person to perform the duties of an office for a period that has gone by. Therefore, by whatever name you call it, when you come to the substance of the thing, the man whom the next Legislature of New Hampshire chooses as a Senator from that State, whose term will expire on the 4th of March, 1885, will be a man who was appointed, or chosen, or elected, by whatever name you call it, to fill up a vacancy that now exists.

The only power that the Legislature of the State has to choose a Senator in the first instance, in the exertion of its original appointing power, is in the first clause of the third section of article 1, which says they shall choose him "for six years." That is the language, and there cannot be any mistake about the meaning of it. Failing to choose him for six years they must choose him for the unexpired period of some term of the class to which he belongs to fill a vacancy that then exists. It is impossible for me to look at it in any other way.

Then, Mr. President, we come to the question whether a vacancy does exist by having happened in the recess of the Legislature. The word "happen," it has been said by Senators who argue on the other side, means a casualty, a contingency. So it does. It also means anything that takes place, or occurs, that comes to pass. By what authority do constitutional lawyers, when a word of several meanings is used, which includes several particulars within those meanings, say that it only means half of what it means by the dictionary and by the common understanding of mankind now as it was then? By what species of logic or of law is it that we are to be told that a word is to be shorn of half its meaning, being a general one that includes several particulars, instead of giving to it all? The Constitution does cover the case of a death undoubtedly. That happens. It happens much more than a resignation does. A resignation in the sense of chance does not happen at all, in that sense of the word "happen," because a resignation does not come by chance; it comes by the free will of the person who is competent to make it. Therefore, in order to give "resignation" any force in that sense as having happened, you must take some other meaning of the word than chance or casualty, because it is neither chance nor casualty. It is just as much the definite and public act of the person who has the right to make it as the passage of an act of Congress is by this Congress; precisely. It is an act of deliberate free will, and if it were not it would be void; it would be no resignation at all.

To what point do we come then, Mr. President? We come down to the proposition that here is a vacancy in this office, as everybody agrees, and a vacancy which the Legislature of New Hampshire will have a right to fill when it meets, and which it must fill if it does anything, because it cannot choose a person for six years; it can only choose for that part of the six years which is allotted to the particular man whom it may now choose, precisely as it would have to do if somebody had been elected and had now resigned or died. They can only choose him for the time that is left; they cannot choose him "for six years." They can only choose him, therefore, to fill up the vacancy that exists when they come to act. Where does the Legislature of New Hampshire get the power to fill a vacancy at all? The first grant of power, as I have said, is only a power to choose for six years and nothing else, neither more nor less. Where is the next grant of power? It is that a vacancy having happened in the office of Senator, not in the person as has been suggested by one of my friends here, as a personal thing, but a vacancy in the office—persons are not named—the governor of the State, if it be in a recess of the Legislature, is to make a temporary appointment until the next meeting of the Legislature, when the Legislature "shall then fill such vacancy," that is to say, precisely the vacancy, and no other than the one, that the constitution authorizes the governor of the State to fill temporarily. There is not any rule of interpretation which would allow gentlemen of the other view of this case to say that the word "such" in empowering the Legislature to fill a vacancy, does not refer to the vacancy that the governor either had or might have filled under the power that is conferred upon him. The consequence is, therefore, that if the governor of the State of New Hampshire has no power to fill this vacancy, if it is a vacancy, the Legislature has not any power, for its power expressly granted by the Constitution follows the exertion or the right to exert his power, and is confined to such vacancies as he for the time being has a right to grant a temporary commission for. That is the way it looks to me.

Now let us see where is the harm, what is the danger to the Constitution, to the public interests, to the general welfare, to hold that view? It is said that the Legislatures are the constituency. Suppose they are—I do not think they are in a correct sense, but I shall not waste time by going into that—where is the harm, the danger of the misrepresentation of a State if when a Legislature on the first occasion when it ought to have elected in advance of the time when the term begins, in order to provide that its representation may be always full, the governor of the State elected by the people, and as we all know is the practice for very short terms, the representative of the people just as much as the body of the Legislature is, shall do it, and allow the people of that State to have their representation in this Hall for the time that the Constitution has limited, until the Legislature can meet again and try it. I agree that the letter of the Constitution is such that after he has once appointed and the Legislature has again met, his power is exhausted, because the same vacancy cannot happen twice. Whether that is wise or not, I cannot help it; there it is. But here on this doubtful question as it is claimed to be by some of the gentlemen on the other side—I think it is clear,—here on this point, within the limit that the Constitution makes to his power, is there any motive for such strained constructions cutting off one-half of the meaning of the word "happen" if you please, applying a strict and limited rule that is usually applied in penal statutes and for the protection of private rights, to construe away this power of a governor representing the people of his State to place their representative on this floor when either by accident or design the Legislature that ought to have chosen in advance did not do it?

It might indeed be said, Mr. President, that even this conduct of the Legislature under the circumstances, this omitting to try to elect was a very great chance; it has so happened by a casualty, by misinformation, by misunderstanding what the decision of this body was supposed to be, as some say they did, or understanding it correctly, so that it would fall within the strictest meaning of the most extraordinary chance in the world that they should have been so misled as it is now said they were. But that I admit is not a sound argument, for they were bound to know the law, and if the law gave them the power to elect they might have elected. But my point is that failing to do their duty within the Constitution as it stands, the governor of that State had a right to fill up the vacancy until the Legislature should meet again. Then they are to fill it as it is a vacancy.

Now look at the word "happen" in two other parts of the Constitution. As to the House of Representatives, the Constitution says if vacancies happen in the representation of any State the governor shall issue writs of election to fill up the vacancies. Suppose the people (as it used to be in many of the States where a majority was required for the election of a member of the House of Representatives) fail to elect because no one of several good men can get a majority, and the 4th of March comes, can anybody seriously doubt that the governor of a State in such a case would have a right to issue a writ and that that people would have a right to find a majority for somebody for the Congress that was then occurring? I am sure that very few men would doubt it, and indeed in one instance the House of Representatives many years ago had that case and, so far as that point was concerned, it appears, as well as I can understand the report of it that there was no difference of opinion about the governor's right. He, under the statute of Mississippi, it is true, which limited this filling of vacancies until the next general election, applied such a limitation, and therefore, instead of those members having been elected for two years or for the residue of that term from the date of their election, they were elected only until the end of the next session. That seemed to be in the face and eyes of the Constitution, which said they should be elected for two years or else to fill up the vacancy, and the vacancy would be for the residue of the two years; and consequently at the next session those gentlemen were held to have no longer a right to hold, and the men who had been elected in their place were held for some reason or other not to have a right to hold. But upon the point of the right of the governor in such a case, there being no State statute to embarrass him, to issue a writ of election to fill up for the residue of the full period of two years a vacancy, so far as I know or can learn, there was not any doubt and there ought not to be.

Then take the word "happen" where it occurs in the Constitution in another place. The President of the United States, the Constitution says, shall fill up all vacancies that happen in civil offices of the United States during a recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session. The office of marshal, the office of postmaster, the office of judge in a Territory, scores of offices necessary to carry on the operations of the Government fall by the expiration of the period for which those persons by law are appointed during recesses of the Senate, and they have ever since the Government began. The President of the United States from the beginning until now has exerted the power of filling up those vacancies by granting commissions of the character described in the Constitution, because the word "happen" was construed to mean just what the dictionary says it does, to be an inclusive term that means not only casualty but occurrence; and, for once, one of the powers of the Executive has never been disputed or criticised by anybody, that one of filling a vacancy which occurred by the expiration of a term of office during the recess of the Senate.

When the fathers who built up this Government used the word "happen" in these three connections, and when the fathers and all their descendants in the executive branch, and with the concurrence of both Houses of Congress without criticism, have always understood the word and acted upon it with that meaning, why should not we? I think everybody will agree that if you read the word "happen" in the senatorial clause as "occur" so that it would read "if a vacancy occurs, or takes place in the office of Senator during a recess of the Legislature, by resignation or otherwise, the governor of the State may grant a temporary commission until the Legislature meets," there would not be any great doubt as to the power of the governor to appoint. I doubt if anybody would maintain that there was any question in regard to it.

So, then, Mr. President, I have no difficulty with this case myself, after hearing all that has been said on this subject, and thinking about it; and I believe if we decide it in favor of this candidate—a matter of very little practical consequence of course because the Legislature is to meet so soon—we shall have established a just and wise decision in favor of giving the people of every State, who are the persons who are really represented, the fullest opportunity in one way or another to have their seats here kept full.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a little while and only on one point. The Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] in his speech the other day, used this language:

> I suggest to the honorable Senator from Georgia, whom I do not now see in his seat—

And I do not see the Senator from Delaware in his seat now—> that if it had intended that nothing but a vacancy by resignation should become a case for a temporary appointment by the State executive, why not say "a vacancy which shall happen by resignation and not otherwise."

It is very strange that such a remark should have been directed to me. I never said the Constitution meant that a vacancy could only be created by resignation. But the Senator goes on:

> Is it possible that "otherwise" means "the same?"

Nobody ever said it meant "the same." I never said that "otherwise" meant "the same." I do not use language so bunglingly as that, although I may not use it as well as it ought to be used. He continues:

> Does not "*other*wise" mean "other ways?" Does it not mean "not in a similar manner?" I despair of appreciating the force of the English language if I am told that "other" means "the same," and that "otherwise" means "likewise or similar." I confess my inability to grasp so surprising and strange a meaning of the word "otherwise" as it occurs to me.

The Senator from Delaware is a very considerable man, and I think very highly of him. There is no man I think more of. I am only sorry that his great mind is so surprised at the use of the word "otherwise" to which I called attention; but to satisfy my friend on that subject I have been looking since into the record, and I have found that I have authority upon the point which I had not before known, and I will call my friend's attention to it.

Mr. Badger, of North Carolina, is conceded by those who knew him to have been one of the greatest lawyers this country ever produced. That is his character and reputation to this day. There are some who believe a greater lawyer never lived on this continent than Senator Badger, of North Carolina. He certainly stood high among all the great lights of his day. Now, upon this direct question hear what the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. Badger, said on the 20th of February, 1854:

> "By resignation, or otherwise," is the language. We must expound the word "otherwise" to apply to vacancies happening by similar events; that is, unforeseen events—death, resignation, appointment to an office which disqualifies—and it can never be applied to the expiration of the term of a Senator which leaves a seat vacant on this floor. My opinion, therefore, is that the governor of a State has no power to fill a vacancy in this body which is brought about by the expiration or efflux of the time for which a Senator was elected—in other words, at the determination of his term in the Senate. It must be a vacancy in the term happening during the recess of the Legislature; it must be a vacancy in the term happening by resignation or other casualty.

If the gentleman will turn to the speech I had the honor to make the other day, he will find that that is the very language I used, and then I had not seen this commentary of Mr. Badger. I never said that "otherwise" meant "the same." It means "similar cause." The corroboration which I have received in the opinion of the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] ought to be satisfactory. What does the word "otherwise" mean? It means in this clause "vacancies which occur in a similar manner," that is, by casualty; that is, by unforeseen events; that is, as the Senator from Wisconsin very correctly said this morning, by a circumstance or event happening to the incumbent of the office, and which therefore cannot be foreseen by any other authority.

But I have looked into this question a little more, and I wish to call the attention of my friend from Delaware to what seems to him so surprising, that the rule to which I alluded is one of the best established rules and maxims of the law, and founded in the best reason. In fact, in the common law, it is as old as Sir Matthew Hale, and in the civil law as old as Justinian, and in all law is contemporaneous with sound sense. Let me refer to the decisions. I have here some American authorities. I now read from Bishop on Statutory Crimes, page 246:

Lord Bacon observed that, "as exception strengthens the force of a law in cases not excepted, so enumeration weakens it in cases enumerated." This doctrine is in part the foundation of the "celebrated rule" that where particular words are followed by general ones, as if, after the enumeration of several classes of persons or things, the words are added "and all others," these general words are restricted in meaning to objects of the like kind with those specified. Therefore under Stat. 29, Car. 2, c. 7, sec. 1, providing "that no tradesman, artificer, workman, laborer, or other person whatsoever"—

I call my friend's special attention to that—

"or other person whatsoever" should exercise his ordinary calling on the Lord's day, the words "other person" were held not to include a farmer, who is not a person of the like denomination with those persons specifically mentioned; for, as Bayley, J., said, "if all persons were meant there was no need of the specific enumeration."

And so here I apply that reasoning to this case. If all vacancies were meant, as you claim, there was no need for the specific enumeration of the vacancies which "happen by resignation or otherwise." Why should the framers of the instrument have said that the governor should have power to fill vacancies that "happen by resignation or otherwise" if they meant to include all vacancies? The very fact of specifying vacancies that "happen by resignation or otherwise" shows that they intended a limitation and did not intend to apply the power to all vacancies.

Another very strong case is this:

And where a statute employed the words "wherry, lighter, or other craft," the word "craft" was held not to include a steam-tug; because, although a steam-tug is a craft, yet it is not one of the same character as a wherry or a lighter.

I want to read a case from Texas, cited by the same author:

A statute of Texas made it an offense to "willfully and maliciously kill, maim, beat, or wound any horse, cattle, goat, sheep, or swine, or willfully injure or destroy any other property of another"—

That is a very strong case—and the court held, that the killing of a dog does not come within the act. Wheeler, J., said: "Dogs are not mentioned in the statute; nor do they come within either class, or description of the animals which are mentioned."

And though the general term is "all others" after mentioning "horse, cattle, goat, sheep, and swine or any other property," the court held that that did not include dogs. Why? Because dogs did not belong to either one of the classes specifically enumerated, and you could not by a general phrase enlarge the classification.

I find that this rule grew into a maxim in the days of Lord Hale and took as all legal maxims did in those days the Latin form and was expressed in Latin thus: noscitur a sociis; which means "it is known from its associates." The meaning of the words is "it may be known from the accompanying words."

This maxim appears to have been first applied to the language of the law by Lord Hale, and, it is observed, was no pedantic or inconsiderate expression when falling from him, but was intended to convey, in short terms, the grounds upon which he formed his judgment.

That is, words like men are often to be judged by the company they keep. A man who undertakes to define the word standing alone without its connection, as the dictionary defines it, will never get the correct meaning in which it is used. You must go to the law for that. I have read from Mr. Burrill's Law Dictionary, a very excellent work. Mr. Wharton in his Law Dictionary defines the same legal maxim "noscitur a sociis." He goes further, he quotes the language thus "noscitur ex socio, cognoscitur ex se." It means this: He who cannot be known from himself, may be known from his associates; that is, you are not to get the meaning of the word "otherwise" from itself in this case, you must get its meaning from its association, from its connection.

Mr. Tayler in his work defines the same legal maxim "noscitur a sociis," "he is known by his companions: it is discoverable by what precedes and follows." The meaning is derived from the association, is discoverable from what precedes and follows. The same rule is laid down in a great number of cases. I find such cases reported in East's Reports, in Term Reports, and in very many of the old English authorities since Lord Hale's day, and in numerous American authorities.

That is not all. It applies to criminal jurisprudence, to penal statutes, and to civil statutes alike. It is a universal maxim. Therefore Mr. Badger was right when in 1854 he defined "otherwise" as I have read from his speech.

Mr. President, it is settled; it is settled as well as language can settle it, just as well as decisions in America and England for one hundred years and more can settle it; it is settled by the maxims of the civil law, by the maxims of the common law, by the maxims of common sense, that when you use the phraseology "by death, resignation, or otherwise" the word "otherwise" must be construed by its connection with "death" and "resignation," and to refer to other events similar in their character. The courts have made life and property and liberty all to hang upon the correctness of that maxim, and I could now bring in one hundred authorities and more upon this subject.

This at first seemed surprising to the learned Senator from Delaware, and surprising to the erudite Senator from Vermont; they had never heard of it before; but, sir, I find that there is no maxim more common in the law than this, nor one perhaps more frequently decided. I find that, though the point has not been formally made the same maxim has been quoted with approval by the Supreme Court of the United States, once by Chief-Justice Chase himself. Therefore it is not a surprising maxim.

If this maxim be true, what is the result? That these words are words of limitation, and that they mean specifically that the governor shall have power to fill vacancies which happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the Legislature; and it is just as specific, just as definite, as if the Constitution had read "by resignation, death, or expulsion, or such like casualty." When you say it can happen otherwise than in the manner indicated, you annul the Constitution; you make that unlimited which is by the language of the Constitution made limited. I say here, with all deference to distinguished gentlemen, it is the most palpable instance of misconstruction to be found in the history of this country.

There is another clause in the Constitution which I had reason on a very interesting occasion to investigate, to study at least. It is curious that while the framers of the Constitution in providing for the filling of vacancies in the office of Senator said "by resignation or otherwise," they were more particular when it came to the filling of vacancies in the Executive. There they left nothing to intendment; there they left nothing to construction; there they expressed all they intended to be implied or understood. Therefore they give every case:

In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability—or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President, and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, &c.

They do not say "in the event of his resignation or otherwise"—

It would have been the same as if they had said, "in case of vacancy in the office both of President and Vice-President by resignation or otherwise, Congress shall provide by law," &c. The phrase in the senatorial clause, "by resignation or otherwise," is in legal meaning, is under the determination of the courts in England and America, I affirm, just as specific, just as definite, just as explicit as if it had said, "by resignation, death, or expulsion from office." And yet I am amazed to find as able a statesman as the Senator from Delaware, as able a lawyer as the Senator from Vermont, and the Senator from Massachusetts, and divers other gentlemen get up here and say that the power of a State executive to fill a vacancy under that language of the Constitution absolutely extends to a case where a vacancy has occurred by the expiration of a term.

My friend from Delaware announced to the Senate that he put his vote upon the ground that the Senate at its session last summer gave it as its opinion that the Legislature elected in March, 1878, could not elect a Senator, and as a result of that opinion New Hampshire has got into this trouble. Is it possible that the construction of the constitutional power of an executive to fill a vacancy is to be dependent upon the opinion of either branch of Congress upon any question? That would make it more uncertain than to put it upon casualty, for I think if there is anything more uncertain than a casualty, it is the opinion of Congress. Clearly "resignation or otherwise" means a casualty to the incumbent; it does not mean a casualty to the Legislature; it does not mean a casual opinion by Congress, it means a casualty to the incumbent or by the incumbent.

Gravely again the able Senator from Vermont says that "resignation" here does not mean casualty because it implies volition. You cannot hold that an office becoming vacant by resignation becomes vacant by casualty, because he says it is by the will of the occupant; but death he says is a casualty. Well, suppose a man takes a pistol and blows out his brains; that is a case of volition. I suppose he would hold that was not a casualty. Casualty to whom? What does it mean when it says "by events that cannot be foreseen?" What did Mr. Badger mean when he said it must be an event happening by resignation, death, or removal, an event which could not be foreseen? He does not mean that it is an event that would have no will, no volition about it, but it is an event which cannot be foreseen by the electing power. The Legislature is the electing power in this case; that is the constituency. They are to keep the Senate full; that is their primary duty. There may be various events that the Legislature cannot foresee which may produce vacancies. One is death; one is resignation. The Legislature cannot foresee that a gentleman they elect will resign; they cannot foresee that he will be expelled from office; they cannot see that he will die during his term; and they cannot foresee his resignation any more than they can foresee his death. Very clearly, therefore, the use of the word "resignation" by the Senator from Vermont is a most marvelous one.

Now I affirm here to-day that, taking the rule of law defining the word "otherwise" and defining the word "happen," the power of the governor applies and applies only and specifically and intentionally and by plain language to vacancies which happen by death, resignation, expulsion, or other casualty to the incumbent whom the Legislature has placed here; and a construction to extend it to any other vacancy is a construction which obliterates the Constitution.

But the Senator from Vermont asks cui bono; what harm is there in admitting this gentleman? Perhaps none. I do not know that there is any in the mere fact of admission; but are we to be told that when the Constitution is plain and explicit you are at liberty to violate it because in the instance of the violation you cannot see that any particular harm will be done? Is that to be the rule that the expounders of the fundamental law are to adopt for the guidance of the country and their own guidance? There may be a great many cases where immediate harm would not result from the violation of the Constitution or the disregard of its provisions; but is that the rule? Did we take an oath to support the Constitution except in cases where its violation would not hurt anybody particularly in our judgment? Is that the meaning?

Oh, but, gentlemen say—it has been said I believe by nobody here—that this is a good case to be magnanimous in, and I received a paper the other day with marks directing my attention particularly to an editorial or a paragraph or something in the paper saying what a happy opportunity the democrats of this body, and especially the southern democrats, had of being magnanimous. That was very kind and clever. Magnanimity is a good thing; I like it; it is an excellent thing; it rises above party. Why is it a good thing to do in this case? We could do it without any cost to anybody; it would not hurt the democrats any to let Mr. Bell in, was the idea, and it could not do the republicans any particular good to let him in, and as we could do a magnanimous thing without any cost we ought to do it.

That is the idea with some people; that is the idea of the newspaper to which I have referred. I am afraid my friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] would not appreciate that magnanimity because I expect he will agree with me that magnanimity to be valuable must be destitute of at least two infirmities. In the first place magnanimity to be appreciated must not be too cheap; and in the second place magnanimity to be respected must not be too costly. In this case, if I am to be magnanimous because of the fact that we admit a republican into the Senate and the magnanimity can be exercised safely because it cannot do the republicans any particular good or the democrats any particular harm, that magnanimity is too cheap, and the distinguished Senator from New York would laugh at it—I know he would—and so, I think, would all the republican party. But if I am to exercise this magnanimity not by simply rising above party but by rising above the Constitution, then it becomes too costly. I cannot afford that.

So it all comes back to this: What is the Constitution, what is my duty? It is a question of power; it is a question of power in the executive of the State, and I will not omit to express my astonishment that my distinguished friend from Delaware, a man whom I esteem so highly, should have quoted from that clause of the Constitution in regard to amendments, as if it related to this case, the words that no State shall be deprived without its consent of its equal suffrage in the Senate. Who is proposing to amend the Constitution here? Who is proposing to change the right of each State to equal suffrage in the Senate? With all due deference to my friend, it has no more to do with the question than with the King of the Feejee Islands. My friend from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] in his intimating way of saying good things, expressed himself shocked that this clause of the Constitution should have been invoked, the implication being, I suppose, that the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and those of us who cannot see the power here in the governor to make this appointment, are in favor of adopting a rule of construction or policy in this body that would deprive some State of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

I protest that has nothing to do with this case, and my friend could not have been more surprised at my use of the word "otherwise" than I was at his use of that clause of that article in the Constitution in relation to amendments, which simply provides that in amending the Constitution three-fourths of the States, upon a proposition by two-thirds of Congress, may amend this Constitution, but in no event by such amendment shall any State without its consent be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator understand that the language of the Constitution securing to each State an equal suffrage in the Senate has only reference to a vote upon amendments to the Constitution?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I say that clause means nothing except that no State shall, by any amendment to the Constitution, be deprived, without its consent, of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. My impression was that that was meant to secure equal suffrage in the Senate to each State on every subject, not on the subject of amendments to the Constitution alone.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I mean this: that that clause in the Constitution had reference only to this, that in making amendments to the Constitution you should not by amendment deprive any State of its equal suffrage in the Senate. That is what it meant; that is what it says. I do not mean that amendments should not deprive a State of its equal suffrage in the Senate on the subject of amendments; but I say this equal suffrage in the Senate is positively secured by the Constitution. It says each State shall have two Senators. It is fixed. Congress cannot change it. No power could change that except the power that made the Constitution, and they could only do it by amendment; and as it is provided that while the Constitution may be amended in every other respect, it shall not be amended in that, therefore it is that this right of equal suffrage in the Senate cannot be taken away at all without the consent of the State. Here is the section; take the plain reading of it:

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808, shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

That clause is in the article providing for amendments; and are we proposing to deprive the State of New Hampshire of its equal suffrage in the Senate? Does anybody here propose to deprive New Hampshire of her equal suffrage in the Senate? That is a constitutional right that nobody can take from her; and yet, according to my friend's argument, he admits that if a session of the Legislature intervenes after the vacancy, and the Legislature thus intervening does not fill the vacancy, the governor after that Legislature adjourns cannot fill it. Where then is the equal suffrage of the State in the Senate? The Legislature of the State of New Hampshire has simply failed to elect a Senator as provided by the Constitution for an original term. The question is, whether the governor can appoint to fill that vacancy? I have profound respect for all these gentlemen; I have the greatest respect for their opinions; but when the Constitution, in plain, unmistakable phraseology, says that if vacancies happen in the Senate by resignation or otherwise, and every authority of the law—civil, ecclesiastical, and criminal—in England and America says that "otherwise" there means "by other like casualties," therefore the Constitution is precisely as if it read "the governor may make temporary appointments to fill vacancies which happen by resignation, death, or expulsion." When I hear gentlemen, on either side of this Chamber, in either party of this country, take that plain language of the Constitution and construe it to apply to any vacancy that may occur by any means, by the failure of the Legislature, wilfully or otherwise, to elect a Senator, that the governor can come in and supply the vacancy, I must say it excites my profound astonishment; more than that, my sorrow. It absolutely shocks my confidence in the efficacy of written constitutions.

This is a question with which party has nothing to do. If Senators can vote to admit this appointee, very well. It will only add another illustration to me of what I believe already, that there is no validity in a political precedent. The fact of the business is, if you go by precedent you can prove anything you want in this body or any other. The House and the Senate, as parties have varied, as whims have varied according to caprice, have decided every question in every conceivable way. There is no doubt about that. We are thrown back then upon the Constitution, upon those well-known canons of construction which hold that a governor cannot fill a vacancy which occurs; that a governor cannot fill any vacancy which occurs; nay, more, that a governor cannot fill a vacancy which even happens; but he can only fill a vacancy which happens "by resignation or otherwise;" that is by resignation or by any similar method. What is a similar method, except that which relates to the incumbent, which acts upon the Senator, and which therefore was necessarily unforeseen by the electing power and could not have been provided against? That is the whole of it, and I shall not disturb the Senate any more upon the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to strike out the word "not."

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, in order to avoid interrupting the roll-call when I am called upon to vote, I desire to say now that when I had occasion to go to Kentucky last week I requested the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] to pair with me upon certain party questions, which he very kindly agreed to do. This matter was spoken of at the time. I think then neither of us knew definitely how we ought to vote, and it was excepted from the general arrangement. The Senator from Nevada is now absent; being advised, however, by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] that the Senator from Nevada expressed a desire to continue his pair with me, as he wished to vote in a particular way on this case, I have agreed not to cast my vote, although it was not embraced in the pair between us.

If I may be pardoned for taking a moment as I am on the floor, I will say that when I first thought of this question I was inclined to the opinion that I ought to vote for the admission of Mr. Bell and I desired to do so; but the more I have thought of it, the more I have heard of the arguments, the conclusion has forced itself on me that I cannot properly do so. I have come to the conclusion that the Legislature of the State is the primary constituent of the United States Senator, and it is only when the State Legislature has no opportunity to act that the governor is permitted to fill the place temporarily until the Legislature can act. Believing that there has been no contingency of that sort and that the Legislature of New Hampshire has had the fullest opportunity to act if it desired, and that none of those contingencies which would authorize the governor temporarily to fill the place have intervened, I believe that the appointment by the governor at this time is not a proper one, his power being limited to an unforeseen exigency that could not be anticipated or provided against by the Legislature. Nothing of that sort occurred here.

Everybody in New Hampshire knew, all the country knew that Mr. Wadleigh's term expired by its own limitation on the 4th day of March, 1879; every intelligent man knew that the Forty-sixth Congress was liable to be called in extra session as it has been; everybody knew that for the last quarter of a century the Senate had been convened in executive session on or about the 4th of March each alternate year. Nothing extraordinary had happened in the State of New Hampshire to prevent the Legislature from exercising its proper power; neither war, pestilence, nor famine had prevented the meeting or free action of the Legislature; the ordinary time had run, and the New Hampshire Legislature knew that an election to supply the place was needed or if an extra session was called or if the Senate was called in executive session she would have no representative here in one of her senatorial seats. In short nothing happened, nothing "came by chance," which is the primary meaning of happen.

Neither the United States nor any other State had intervened or done anything to deprive that State of her equal representation in the Senate of the United States. It never entered my mind, although a respectable committee of this body, as I understand, reported in the last Congress that the then sitting Legislature could not act, that there could be any possible difficulty in the way of that Legislature acting; and therefore I asked the question of my friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD,] which was this: Suppose the governor of New Hampshire at any time before the 4th of March had been required to call the Legislature together, what Legislature would he have called? He very properly answered that he would have called the Legislature that was in session in June, 1878. What Legislature would assemble if the governor of New Hampshire to-day was to say that an exigency had arisen in that State whereby it was necessary now to call the Legislature together to elect a United States Senator or to do anything else? All agree that it would be the Legislature that was in session in June, 1878. The members of the Legislature that meets in June, 1879, were, it is true, elected in November, 1878; but they have no more power over a question that had to be determined prior to the 4th of March, 1879, than they would have if they had been elected in April, 1879. Their term of office does not begin until June, 1879, and the date of their election gives them no additional authority. They are not in any sense a Legislature. Suppose they had been elected in April, 1879, will any gentleman pretend that they were a Legislature elected to act upon any fact that had to take effect on the 4th of March, 1879?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. You have deprived them of the opportunity.

Mr. BECK. No, sir, because the Constitution requires that the State shall have a man here on the 4th day of March, 1879, and their term of office does not begin until June, 1879; and whether they were elected in November, 1878, or in April, 1879, the newly elected men were in no sense the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire; and the Legislature that was previously elected, and whose term does not expire until June, 1879, was beyond all peradventure the Legislature last elected prior to the beginning of the term now sought to be filled by the governor. Even if a respectable committee of this body unanimously delivered a different opinion, it only proves what we all know: that there is no value in legislative precedents. I can turn to the books of contested elections in the House of Representatives and prove anything upon any subject. Personal feeling for the man, a desire to befriend him, want of time to investigate, often enters into the decision; men are led off by a thousand things and make erroneous reports; that we all know is not uncommon in either House of Congress. I suppose nobody will pretend that this body could dictate to the Legislature of New Hampshire what its rights or duties were. I may have thought differently at that time and may have sustained the committee. I know Mr. Wadleigh was a gentleman very acceptable to everybody in this Senate, and it is very likely he may have said to me or to others that in his opinion, being familiar with the constitution and laws of New Hampshire, that the report made was a proper thing to do. I believe he was one of the committee; he was chairman of the committee himself, and it is very likely his views in regard to affairs in his own State may have had a good deal to do with the report. Of all that, I of course know nothing; but I do know this, that the Constitution of the United States intended that the Legislature, whenever it had an opportunity to elect a Senator, should exercise that power, and that the governor should only intervene when that opportunity for any cause was denied to the Legislature. It never was intended that the governor should exercise his patronage except when the Legislative Assembly had no power to exercise its authority. It was thought that men who sought to come to the Senate should not appeal to the governor, before whom perhaps they were stronger than they were before the Legislature, and use their influence or his to cause the Legislature to fail to elect so that the governor might exercise his patronage and they obtain the place by reason of it.

It was intended to give each State equal representation in the Senate; and whenever there was no opportunity for the Legislature to act, and in no other state of the case, was authority given to the executive. Whether the Legislature of New Hampshire was misled by our action or for any other cause failed to elect, it is not the fault of the United States; it is not the fault of any other State; it is their misfortune that they placed a wrong construction on their power. As to the new Legislature, the men elected in November may never meet. Vermont and New Hampshire may get together and ask, if they have the power, to unite into one State to save the expense of two not very large States running two different State governments, and we might so amend the Constitution as to accommodate them. These men for some reason may never come into power; they may never hold a meeting of the Legislature. The fact that they were elected to a Legislature to meet in the future only entitled them when the future day comes, if no change is made, to be members of that Legislature; it surely cannot enable them to say "we were the Legislature last chosen before the 4th of March" to do any act prior to that date, when up to this day if an extra session were to be called they could not meet; but the old Legislature chosen before that time and still an organized body would have to meet and would to-day have to elect a Senator if the governor saw fit to call them together for that or any other purpose.

I beg pardon for having spoken so long as I have.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question, which is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to strike from the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections the word "not?"

Mr. SAULSBURY. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired as I have stated.

Mr. BLAINE, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea" on this motion.

Mr. HEREFORD, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, was called.) I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] has been called away, and is paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] My colleague, if here, would vote "nay."

Mr. DAWES, (when the name of Mr. HOAR was called.) My colleague [Mr. HOAR] being necessarily absent is paired on this question with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] Both Senators have sufficiently indicated how they would vote upon this question.

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] on political questions. This by common account and by the determination of the Senator on this floor to whom that matter seems to have been referred appears not to be a political question. I therefore shall vote; I vote "yea."

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] are paired on political questions. The Senator from South Carolina on going away left his pair with me to decide. He stated at the time this case was suggested that he did not know how he would vote upon it. I am not at liberty to state how he would vote if he were here. I cannot consent to have the question regarded as a political question. Therefore, I shall not ask that the pair be applied to this case.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] If he were here, I should vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were here, I would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Allison,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Randolph,
Anthony,	Edmunds,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Ferry,	Logan,	Saunders,
Booth,	Gordon,	McDonald,	Teller,
Bruce,	Groome,	McMillan,	Voorhees,
Burnside,	Hamlin,	Morrill,	Walker,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,	Whyte,
Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Platt,	Williams.
Chandler,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,

NAYS—28.

Bailey,	Eaton,	Houston,	Pendleton,
Call,	Farley,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Carpenter,	Garland,	Jonas,	Slater,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Kernan,	Vance,
Coke,	Harris,	Lamar,	Vest,
Conkling,	Hereford,	Maxey,	Wallace,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Georgia,	Morgan,	Withers.

ABSENT—11.

Beck,	Davis of W. Va.,	McPherson,	Thurman,
Blaine,	Hoar,	Saulsbury,	Windom.
Butler,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,

So the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the resolution as amended? The resolution, as amended, is:

Resolved, That Hon. Charles H. Bell is entitled to a seat as a Senator by virtue of the appointment by the executive of New Hampshire.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HEREFORD, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, was called.) My colleague, [Mr. DAVIS,] as I stated before, is paired on this question with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] If here, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. DAWES, (when the name of Mr. HOAR was called.) I make the same announcement of the pair on this vote that I made before. My colleague [Mr. HOAR] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] My colleague would vote in the affirmative if he were present.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLAINE. Merely to keep the record right, I repeat that I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea" on the pending question.

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Allison,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Randolph,

So the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator appointed by the executive of New Hampshire is present, he will please come forward and take the oath of office.

Mr. BELL advanced to the Vice-President's desk escorted by Mr. ROLLINS, and the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEREFORD. Before that bill is taken up I desire to say that prior to the time the Army bill came to this body I gave notice of a motion to take up what is known as the Hoar resolution. I gave notice one day last week that I would make that motion on Thursday. On Thursday we adjourned to Monday, and I then gave notice that I would call it up on Monday of this week. The subject that has just been disposed of being a question of high privilege, I gave way on Monday to that. I desire to be heard upon that resolution; and as I gave the notice I had not expected to be antagonized. I have no objection to taking up the Army bill if it can be laid aside informally so that I can be heard on that resolution. I do not desire to antagonize the Army bill; I am in favor of the passage of it as it came from the committee, and desire to do nothing to antagonize it. I have no objection to taking up the Army bill if it can be laid aside informally so that I can be heard upon the resolution as indicated by me.

Mr. WITHERS. I can only say that on the part of the Committee on Appropriations, the bill having been assigned to me to present to the Senate, I have felt it my duty to bring it before the Senate at the earliest practicable moment, without any desire to interfere with my friend from West Virginia, who, it seems to me, can make any remarks he may desire to make on the resolution presented by the Senator from Massachusetts upon the bill in the general debate which will probably spring up during its consideration. I ask that the vote be now taken on my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. MCDONALD. Is there any objection to the suggestion made by the Senator from West Virginia that the Army bill be taken up, with the understanding that it be laid aside informally so that he may deliver the remarks he has, several days ago, notified the Senate he was prepared to deliver upon the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill. The Chair construes that into an objection.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have not been as long a member of this body as some others; but I have received the impression that when a Senator gave notice of his desire to speak, unless some very extraordinary occasion arose, his wishes were deferred to. A week ago to-day, I believe, the Senator from West Virginia gave notice that on the Monday following he would move to take up the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, not for the purpose of its passage, but for the purpose of submitting remarks upon it. When Monday came round, the question which has just been disposed of by the admission of the Senator from New Hampshire was called, and he conceded that it had privilege over his desire to speak, and consequently this discussion has gone on.

Now, I fully concur with the purpose of the Appropriations Committee to bring forward this measure; but I do not intend to be a party to what I conceive to be a discourtesy to a Senator, to displace him from making the remarks that he desires to make, and which he gave notice of his purpose to make. Therefore, I shall vote against the motion to take up the report of the Committee on Appropriations for the purpose of allowing the Senator from West Virginia simply to have that privilege which has always been accorded to Senators since I have been a member of this body, and, as I understand, accorded to them long before I was a member of the Senate. This ought not to be a subject of controversy; this ought not to be the subject of debate. The Senator from West Virginia is entitled, as I understand, by all the rules that obtain in this body to make the remarks he desires to make, and then nobody will be readier than I to vote to take up the bill proposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have never known an instance in my recollection where an appropriation bill was laid aside in order to allow a Senator who had or had not given notice of a desire to speak on some topic not then before the Senate to make his remarks, because it always happens in such cases that there is one hour of every morning, when an appropriation bill is under consideration, that is open and in which remarks that are only made for the time being and not with a view to action upon the subject about which the remarks are made, are usually and almost always made. Of course we shall all be very glad to hear the Senator from West Virginia during the morning hour; but I have never known it thought a discourtesy to go on with an appropriation bill, although some gentleman desired to speak upon some resolution that was on the table of the Senate. If that resolution should be taken up, of course there are other Senators who would be glad to speak upon it and a great many who would be glad to have a vote upon it; but the Senator from West Virginia can speak in the morning hour to-morrow if we sit to-morrow, or the first day we do sit, and not disturb the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think the Senator from Vermont must know that that is a practical denial to him of the privilege of the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think not.

Mr. VOORHEES. The morning hour is always taken up by morning business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Less than fifteen minutes were taken of it this morning with morning business.

Mr. VOORHEES. That might give him a few moments more. As I said before, this is not a matter proper for debate or discussion; but I do think most sincerely that a gentleman on this floor who gave notice three or four days in advance of his desire to address the Senate on a particular question ought not to be ruled off. There are other Senators here older and better versed in the rules than I am, but I do not know that anybody can appreciate a point of this kind more than myself, and I trust the Senator from West Virginia may not be treated in this way.

Mr. DAWES. I think if the Senator from West Virginia had insisted on Monday, in conformity to the unbroken usage of the Senate, the Senate without saying a word would have postponed the consideration of the election case that the Senator might address the Senate; but the Senator did what every Senator in his place would be likely to do when such a question was up, postpone the calling up of the resolution and the making of his speech until this question was disposed of. And now it seems to me that by unanimous consent the Senate should accord to the Senator the place that he gave away at the beginning of that discussion. It seems to me that by common consent the Senator is entitled to have the resolution called up and time accorded to him to speak upon it.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to say that I gave way at the earnest solicitation of the senior Senator from the State of New Hampshire, so that a vote could be reached upon that matter at as early a time as possible.

Mr. DAWES. I came here on Monday supposing that according to universal usage the Senator from West Virginia would occupy the floor, and when the Senator gave way for the consideration of the election case I had no idea but what the Senate by common consent would give him the floor at any time he asked it. I think the Senator should choose his own time. He has the right according to custom to say whether he desires to go on now or not.

Mr. WITHERS. I simply desire to state that during my limited term of service in this body I do not now recollect that an appropriation has been laid aside for the purpose of permitting any Senator to deliver a speech upon another subject not then pending before the body. But deeming it my duty to bring this bill to the attention of the Senate at the earliest practicable moment, inasmuch as the failure of a similar bill was one of the causes which has required the presence of Congress here now, I must insist on my motion to take it up, disclaiming, however, being put in the category my friend from Indiana desires to place me in, of extending any discourtesy to my friend from West Virginia. He has indicated that he is not unwilling that the bill shall be taken up and does not desire to oppose it. I am only doing what I consider my duty.

Mr. CARPENTER. Why not have the understanding that the appropriation bill is to be taken up, and after that, by unanimous consent, the Senator from West Virginia can make his remarks?

Mr. EATON. To-morrow in the morning hour, and continue till he gets through.

Mr. HEREFORD. That is the proposition I made originally. I said that I had no objection to the Army bill being taken up and then laid aside informally until I could submit my remarks upon the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, although I do not desire to speak this evening.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER?] The Chair hears none.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next, to-morrow being Good Friday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WITHERS and others addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is not a debatable motion.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS. Has the vote been taken on the proposition to take up the Army bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair regards it as taken up.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EATON. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879, have instructed me to report it with certain amendments thereto, which I ask be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar. It will be printed with the amendments reported, as a matter of course.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Select Committee on the Finance Reports and Accounts of the Treasury Department to ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the select committee appointed to examine the finance reports, accounts, and books of the Treasury Department be authorized to have the testimony taken by it from time to time printed for the use of the committee, and also to have printed such statements as it may desire, and its report when ready.

Mr. DAWES. "Such statements as it may desire?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does that mean statements of the committee, or statements of accounts?

Mr. WHYTE. Mere tabular statements which are prepared to explain testimony.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Statements of accounts?

Mr. WHYTE. Statements of accounts.

Mr. DAWES. Has the Senator any objection to putting in the words "of accounts" after "statements."

Mr. WHYTE. None in the world. It is intended for that.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. WHYTE. Say "statements of accounts."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be so amended.

The order was agreed to.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT OVER GOOD FRIDAY.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I desire to renew the motion that was made a few moments ago regarding an adjournment over; and before I make the motion I wish to bring to the minds of Senators the fact that to-morrow is Good Friday, and that to very many members of the Senate and the community at large it is a day that has been specially set aside for religious services. In deference to the religious sentiment, and the public sentiment, and to what I believe to have been the practice in this body, I renew the motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn till Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 23, noes 32.

Mr. RANDOLPH called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Allison,	Conkling,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Edmunds,	Kernan,	Saunders,
Booth,	Gordon,	Lamar,	Vest,

Carpenter,	Hoar,	Sharon,
Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Thurman,

So the motion was rejected.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 10, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask whether according to the Journal, the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider applies to all the propositions relating to the amendment of the rules?

The SPEAKER. It does.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent to offer for reference to the Committee on Rules the following proposed amendment to the rules:

It shall be in order immediately after reading the Journal every morning to introduce resolutions calling for information from the Executive or heads of Departments, and such resolutions shall be acted on by the House at once without debate.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this proposition will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CONGER. I object, because I find that when any matter is referred to the Committee on Rules they report anything they choose without having had it sent to them by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Rules has jurisdiction over the entire body of rules, and has the privilege of reporting amendments to any part of them.

Mr. CONGER. I know they do so. But when the House sends one matter to them, they assume from that to force a vote upon an entirely different proposition which the House has never referred to them.

The SPEAKER. The committee has jurisdiction to report amendments to any rule of the House.

Mr. CONGER. Well, I object to this resolution.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask unanimous consent to go back to page 10 of the bill in order that I may offer an amendment which I could not offer at the proper time because I had not at hand the papers upon which it is based. It relates to the compensation of messengers in the House post-office.

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot consent to that.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of buildings for the use of the Pension Office and office of the United States pension agent, and for the Bureau of Education, $23,200.

Mr. ATKINS. I move to amend by inserting after the word "education" the words "and for the geological survey," and by changing the amount of the appropriation so as to read "$24,700."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

General Land Office:

For the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,250; law clerk, $2,000; recorder, $2,000; five principal clerks, at $1,800 each; six clerks of class 4; twenty-two clerks of class 3; forty clerks of class 2; eighty clerks of class 1; thirty clerks, at $1,000 each; nine copyists; one draughtsman, at $1,600; one assistant draughtsman, at $1,400; nine assistant messengers; six packers, and twelve laborers; in all, $277,070: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to use any portion of said appropriation for piece-work, or by the day, month, or year, at such rate or rates as he may deem just and fair, not exceeding a salary of $900 per annum.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee who has this bill in charge whether the amount of clerical force provided in this bill is the amount which was fixed in the bill agreed upon by the committees of conference at the last session?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let me ask the gentleman one further question. In the bill which failed at the last session, was there not a provision that a certain portion of this money should be immediately available?

Mr. ATKINS. I think not. My recollection is that such was not the case.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope the gentleman will admit an amendment to that effect. In the debate in this House at the last session it was stated, as the gentleman will remember, that the business of the Land Office is very much behind. Those of us who represent on this floor the States of the West are fully aware of that fact. Parties who for twelve or eighteen months have been entitled to their patents under the homestead or pre-emption law are unable to obtain them because there is not clerical force enough to write them out. I wish the gentleman would consent to an amendment providing that a certain amount of this appropriation shall be immediately available.

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot see the practicability of the gentleman's suggestion. Here is an appropriation for clerical force for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880. If any part of this appropriation were made immediately available, the appropriation would have to be increased as a matter of course; because we are in this bill appropriating simply sufficient to run the clerical force for the next fiscal year. If you make it available from now to the end of the fiscal year, as a matter of course it will increase the appropriation. I have not heard there was an application of that kind at all. The gentleman's suggestion might come in well as a deficiency, but certainly is not in order to the regu lar appropriation bill for the next year.

Mr. DUNNELL. One single remark further, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ATKINS. I trust the gentleman from Minnesota will allow us to go on with the bill, so we may get through with it as soon as possible. If, however, he is determined to move the amendment, then I shall have to make the point of order on it that it is matter which belongs to a deficiency bill and not to this legislative bill for the next fiscal year. Here is the salary for the assistant justice of Dakota. Six hundred and forty dollars was asked for him. That belongs to a deficiency bill and does not belong to this bill, and ought not to be put here. We ought not to put deficiencies into this bill. I made the point of order on my colleague from Tennessee a moment ago when he desired to put a deficiency on this bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. This is not in the nature of a deficiency. It is quite customary to provide a certain proportion of the amount appropriated shall be made available at once. I am told by the gentleman from Kansas there are nine thousand cases now pending in the Land Office where patents ought to be issued and would have been issued if there had been sufficient clerical force.

I can tell the gentleman from Tennessee that I know the Land Office did expect some of this money to be available at once. I know the year draws to a close, but to allow a portion of this appropriation to be made available will be of great benefit in the cases I have mentioned.

Mr. SPARKS. The fiscal year begins on the 1st of July next, and how could it help the gentleman to make any portion of this appropriation available before then?

Mr. DUNNELL. If we pass this bill to-day there will be ten or eleven weeks before the present fiscal year expires.

Mr. SPARKS. The appropriations here only begin on the 1st of July next.

Mr. DUNNELL. I propose, in line 1532, to add the proviso that $25,000 of this amount shall be immediately available. Of course if this work, as has been suggested by the gentleman during the present fiscal year—if this $25,000 is made available before the next fiscal year the work for which it has been expended will not have to be done next year. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not object to the amendment. There is no increase of amount. It merely makes $25,000 of the amount available at once.

Mr. ATKINS. I am compelled to raise the point of order on the amendment. In the first place it is in the nature of a deficiency and therefore is not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to see the force of the point of order of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ATKINS. If the Chair does not see it, of course I cannot help it. The gentleman's amendment proposes an appropriation of money for the present fiscal year while the pending bill makes appropriations for the expenses of the Government for the fiscal year commencing on the 1st of July next. The amendment is in the nature of a deficiency for the present fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know of any rule adopted for the government of this House taking it out of the power of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where there is no proposition to increase an appropriation, to make that appropriation or any portion of it immediately available.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it intended by the amendment that the clerical force provided for in this paragraph shall stop during the next fiscal year at some time to the extent at least of the amount of the appropriation which the gentleman now proposes to make available? As a matter of course the appropriation in the bill is for the next fiscal year, and is intended to run through the whole of that fiscal year; and, therefore, if a portion of it is to be diverted to the payment of a clerical force during the present fiscal year, there will be a deficit to the extent of the amount made available in this year for the service of the next fiscal year. With due deference to the Chair, it seems to me to be a clear proposition that the amendment is not in order, as it has nothing to do with the next fiscal year, but on the contrary is a deficiency for the present year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not wish to enter into any argument with the gentleman from Tennessee. Will he point to any rule adopted by the House taking it out of the power of the Committee of the Whole to make immediately available any portion of the appropriation here indicated?

Mr. LOWE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, if I understand it, will be of great benefit to a large number of people in my district. I ask the amendment be again reported so the members may see exactly what it is.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. LOWE. Now, it is a simple act of justice to a great many of the poorer classes of our population that every facility should be afforded to them in procuring their patents, and, accordingly, that the Government of the United States should comply with its contract under the law without delay. It is not only a matter of justice, but of the greatest convenience to the parties interested, and I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. POEHLER. I trust that the amendment will be adopted. It affects a great many citizens in the Northwest, and is of the greatest advantage in enabling them promptly to have their patents attended to in the Land Office. I hope there will be no objection on this side to the adoption of the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 74.

Mr. DUNNELL. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DUNNELL and Mr. ATKINS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 71.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I give notice that I will demand a vote on this amendment in the House.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following paragraph:

For diagrams, furniture, and repairs of the same, miscellaneous items, including two of the city newspapers, to be filed and bound, and preserved for the use of the office; for the actual expenses of clerks detailed to investigate fraudulent land entries, trespasses on the public lands, and cases of official misconduct; and for advertising and telegraphing, $25,000.

Mr. DEERING. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "for" and before the word "advertising" insert "publishing maps of the United States;" and in line 1544 strike out "$25,000" and insert "$30,000."

This amendment simply proposes to appropriate $5,000 for the publication of the Land Office maps. The General Land Office has the stones for lithographing and other facilities for printing these maps.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order upon the amendment. There is no law that I know of authorizing the printing of maps by the Government. I suppose the object is to have these maps for distribution among members of Congress. Is that the object? If not, I do not know what it is for.

Mr. CONGER. The plates for these maps have all been made and they are published continually. This is for an additional publication. I myself, and I presume other members, have applications for those land maps very frequently from the people, who desire them even if they should have to pay for them; and I found upon inquiry that the maps have all been used and there is no further supply for those who need them for any purpose. They cannot even be got for public libraries or for our friends who have gone to the western Territories. I think the Government can republish these maps at a very slight expense, and I believe the people desire to have them. No point of order certainly can hold good against the amendment because this is part of a publication authorized by law.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not understand that the maps referred to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] are the same as are provided for in the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CONGER. I am advocating the additional sum to publish additional land maps for the use of the people of the country, and the amendment covers precisely that object.

Mr. ATKINS. I have made the point of order and ask the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BROWNE. Did we not on yesterday adopt a rule that documents should not be republished unless the matter was referred to a committee and reported favorably to the House?

Mr. NEAL. That referred only to bills and joint resolutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will restate his question.

Mr. BROWNE. I am informed I am in error. I thought we had adopted a rule yesterday which provided that no document should be republished unless the question was referred to the proper committee and a favorable report made to the House. I am informed that that referred simply to bills.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DEERING] tell us how these maps are published?

Mr. DEERING. These are what are called the Land Office maps, and as I understand they are published under the direction and control of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The map has been published for a number of years. What my amendment proposes is simply a republication of these maps. I appeal to gentlemen on the other side and on this side of the House whether these maps are not sought after by the public libraries and the clerks of the county courts in every part of the country, and the supply is entirely exhausted.
